The second stage, taking the road on to Kosti, is expected to be finished towards the end of 1981. The completed project will include five bridges carrying the road over major irrigation canals. The unusual geological nature of the area also necessitated the laying of an 80 km stretch of five per cent lime to provide a stable base for the road. This required 5,000 tons of lime and the construction of 24 lime kilns.

Some £13.5 million was provided by British aid. The London-based consulting engineers, Roughton and Partners were consultants to the project, which was undertaken by the Corporation.

One important side effect of the scheme, said Mr El Amin Hassan, the project manager, was the gaining of expertise and on-the-job training by more than 1,000 local staff. High school graduates would in the future be trained in the special techniques of road maintenance.

With the President forced by the pressure of events to return to Khartoum, his place at the foundation stone ceremony of the 286 km Sennar-Sinja-Ed Damazin road was taken by Mr Abul Gasim Hashim, the governor-designate of the proposed central region. Under construction since February 1958, the road is being built by Osman Ahmed Osman's Arab Contractors. It is being constructed in two parts: the main 230 km stretch, and a 56 km spur linking it to the Wad Medani-Gedaref road.

The estimated £s31.5 million cost is being financed by the government, the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development and the Kuwaiti Fund.

Other developments in road construction have also been announced by the RBPC. Studies were completed last month of the proposed Kosti-Umm Ruwaba, Umm Ruwaba-El Obeid and Gedaref-Suki roads. The studies are now with the Ministry of National Planning to seek financial backing for the projects.

Plans have also been completed either to upgrade and widen the Khartoum-Wad Medani road, or to build a new road on the eastern bank of the Blue Nile. The Corporation also announced last month that construction of the Jebel Aulia-Ed Dueim road would begin after the rainy season. With World Bank financing, the road is being built by West German constructors. West Germany is to finance the Ed Dueim-Rabak road, tenders for the second phase of which are being invited this month. ■

PHALANGE SECTARIAN PARTITIONIST PLAN ASSAILED

Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 14 Jul 80 pp 1, 11

[Article: "Countering the Isolationist Plan in Lebanon"]

[Text] Contrary to all initial estimates that viewed events of the last few days in the eastern areas of Beirut as a mere war of liquidation within the Lebanese Front over control of the political and military leadership of this front, all advance indications are that the campaign of liquidation launched by the Phalange Party against the positions of the National Liberal Party [NLP] is just the first phase of an integrated plan to assemble rightwing forces under the control of one party with a single political and military leadership. The purpose is to impose "de facto" control over part of the territory of Lebanon in preparation for establishing a sectarian partitionist entity constituting a base and launching pad to impose domination of fascist forces over Lebanon as a whole, and to resolve current political and social conflict over Lebanese territory by eliminating the legitimate authority and imposing the Camp David plan on Lebanon, after liquidating the Palestinian resistance and striking a blow at the Lebanese nationalist forces.

The statements of Bashir al-Jumayyil, the official spokesman of the Phalange Party, unveiled this plan following the end of the meetings of the Phalangist Political Bureau the day before yesterday. His statements contained three main points:

First: Jumayyil felt that the Phalangist militias have imposed security and legitimacy over the whole eastern area and urged the authorities to complete this task by deploying its army in the western area and other areas under the control of the leftist parties and what he termed the occupying forces, meaning the Palestinian resistance and the Arab Deterrent Forces.

Second: The official spokesman for the Phalange Party announced that it is intended to "consolidate firepower" by dissolving the armed militias of the Lebanese Front within a month at the utmost, and replacing them by "the national guard" which will handle the task of "liberating" the various parts of Lebanon!"

Third: Al-Jumayyil reaffirmed his rejection of the "2,000 square kilometer Christian" state, insisting that the whole of Lebanon would scarcely suffice for the ambitions of the Fascist plan!.

All of this was accompanied with a wave of actions abroad, such as the opening of 16 political and information offices in 16 American and African countries. The only thing left for the Fascist partitionist plan is to announce the establishment of the sectarian mini-state which would view itself as the sole substitute for the legitimate authorities. The perception of the isolationist forces is that objective conditions are now ripe for the success of the partitionist plan and for moving on to the stage of imposing total control over Lebanon.

During recent years, the legitimate authorities have dragged their feet in pursuing their unifying role and their duty of directing the dialogue between the various political forces on the basis of the announced principles for an entente in order to emerge with a common bottom-line program to save the unity of the country and people. Moreover, they have faltered in taking practical steps to rebuild state institutions and machinery capable of imposing their influence on the partitionist, isolationist entities. This helped to undermine the role of the legitimate authorities in bringing about a national entente. It also allowed the Fascist forces to exploit the position of the authorities; continue to reinforce their military capabilities; and receive various forms of outside support for the areas they control. The purpose is to complete the marshalling of their forces and begin their strategic offensive to dominate the whole of Lebanon.

In contrast, the National Front facilitated the tasks of the authorities, and did not hang on to any of the positions it had to control during the armed conflict to protect vital services to the citizens. It continued to seek a comprehensive political solution as an alternative to a military solution, and it expended much of its resources in confronting the Israeli invasion and aggression against Lebanese territory. There was an absence of effective action in this domain by the Lebanese army and by the forces of the Palestinian revolution. [Shortcomings] in this regard, though limited, cannot be justified by any criterion.

The Fascist forces feel that conditions are suitable for falsifying the essence of the existing crisis on the Lebanese scene, and portraying it as a Lebanese-Palestinian crisis on one hand, and a Lebanese-Syrian crisis on the other. These forces believe that Syria is preoccupied with countering the forces of the counter-revolution domestically and confronting the Camp David conspiracy externally. Therefore, they feel that an eruption of the armed struggle on the Lebanese arena on a broad scale would provide propitious circumstances to escalate the reactionary-imperialist conspiracy against Syria and expose its southwestern flank to the Zionist enemy.

These movements, which have quickly exploded in an attempt to impose a de facto situation, find a suitable cover in the unusual low-key coverage in the western or pro-western information media, as if the world is no longer concerned about the crisis or interested in its impact. This dangerous conspiracy will place major responsibilities on the Lebanese nationalist forces, which oppose the Fascist plan, to preserve the integrity of Lebanon and its Arab people.

The Lebanese National Front is called upon to overcome any incidental differences within it, and unify its ranks on the basis of a uniform nationalist program of action and efforts to establish an alliance of forces opposed to Phalangist hegemony over the nationalist Christian community itself. This community has reaffirmed its patriotism and Arabism at all times. The front should thus pave the way for forming a national salvation front, including all forces opposed to the authors of the racist, Fascist plan to restore the political unity of the country. The legitimate authorities are responsible for achieving this through active assistance, as long as they are capable of doing so.

Achieving this goal, which Arab Syria has sought to accomplish through its call to establish "the broadest possible front of Lebanese forces," would ensure the creation of a nationalist antithesis of the isolationist plan and would defeat it.

If the isolationist forces are placing their bets on the assumption that Syria would stand by impotently looking on at the plan to destroy Lebanon and wreck its Arab affiliation, such bets are sure losers. Syria, which has borne many burdens and sacrifices in recent years to preserve the Arab character of Lebanon and to rescue it from fighting, destruction and partition, and has not lost its clear perspective of the nature of the threats facing the Arab nation because of the Lebanese crisis--Arab Syria will not stand idly by while attempts are made to revive the isolationist partitionist plan aimed at placing Lebanon under Zionist-imperialist control. Syria has sided and will side with all forces interested in the unity of the territory of Lebanon and of its people, and will remain capable of choosing the opportune moment and means to keep Lebanon a unified Arab country in its own way, not as desired by its enemies who are setting the crisis in motion and standing behind the isolationist plan.

MINISTER OF INFORMATION ATTENDS AL-SHA'B ANNIVERSARY CEREMONY

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 13 May 80 pp 8-9

[Article: "Celebrating the First Anniversary of AL-SHA'B"]

[Text] The Socialist Labor Party (SLP) hosted a ceremony at the Engineers Union building Tuesday evening to celebrate the first anniversary of SLP's organ, AL-SHA'B.

The ceremony was attended by engineer Ibrahim Shukri, leader of the SLP; Mansur Hasan, minister of state for culture and information and assistant secretary general of the Democratic National Party; Kamil Zuhayri, dean of journalists; and representatives of other parties, journalists, members of the diplomatic corps and members and friends of the SLP.

Journal of the Free and Honest Word

At the outset of the ceremony, Hamid Zaydan, editor of AL-SHA'B and member of the SLP executive committee, delivered a speech in which he welcomed the assembled crowd and noted that AL-SHA'B, from the very first day of its publication, has always sought to make its voice heard without equivocation; to be true to its message of speaking freely, honestly and objectively; and to be faithful to its commitment to the principles and aspirations of the Egyptian people and the Arab nation. Hamid Zaydan affirmed that he will continue to abide by the rules of objectivity and responsibility as long as he is the editor of AL-SHA'B.

Ibrahim Shukri, the Living Martyr

Zaydan hailed engineer Ibrahim Shukri and described him as the living martyr who was picked by destiny to be the conscience of free opinion in Egypt and the Arab nation. He also described him as a patriot who has never abdicated his national responsibilities at any time of his life, and who is now as giving to the homeland as he has always been.

Zaydan then reviewed the national history and the struggle of the Young Egypt movement, and said that the SLP roots go back to that movement which gave Egypt scores of intellectuals who enriched the Egyptian struggle, including such persons as Ahmad Husayn, Fathi Radwan, Mustafa al-Wakil and Ibrahim Tal'at.

The Party of All Honest Men

The editor of AL-SHA'B emphasized that the SLP opens its arms to all the honest strugglers and believes that it is the locus of all honest groups of the Egyptian people. We even welcome those who left us on a given day, he said, because the SLP struggles every day to embrace all struggling and honest men, and believes that it is the party of anyone who has an objective statement to make either via the party or its newspaper.

At the end of his speech, Hamid Zaydan pointed out that AL-SHA'B worked hard throughout the past year in order to carry the word of the party and other opinions to the masses of the Egyptian people. Despite its limited resources, he said, it has managed to express the party's thought. He added: I promise you once again to be true to the honest and free word.

AL-SHA'B's Age Is Figured by the Number of Its Battles

Kamil Zuhayri, president of the Press Syndicate, also spoke at the ceremony. He lauded AL-SHA'B and said that the age of this newspaper is not measured in years but by the number of battles that it has waged. For the newspaper has repelled the assaults of the Nile, discussed the Law of Impropriety and defended the freedom of the press and the journalists. Its pages were positions, he said, its lines the pulse of the Egyptian people.

Courageous Press

Zuhayri said: "I welcome you on this great occasion. For a whole year now, Egyptian journalists were busy searching for a definition of the press and debating the various press bills and the various definitions of the press--wondering if the press is a popular mandate or authority or a heavy or light industry, or if it is perhaps a precision industry. He went on to say: But after having read everything, I still believe that the press is courage, that the mission of the press is to present correct views and true news to the reader. The first loyalty of the press should be to the reader because he has the first right to know the truth. The press cannot reach the readers unless journalists have moral courage."

From that perspective, Kamil Zuhayri went on, I salute AL-SHA'B for its moral courage. I am aware of the effort that a national, responsible journalist requires to put out a newspaper such as AL-SHA'B so that it may give expression to the other view courageously and responsibly.

The dean of journalists saluted engineer Ibrahim Shukri and said: I do not salute him because of what he writes only, but also because of his position in 1951 when he submitted a draft legislation opposing another draft legislation which would have restricted the press. He added that were it not for the motion of struggler Ibrahim Shukri and a motion submitted by the late 'Aziz Fahmi, the designs which were being connected against the press would not have collapsed.

Zuhayri also lauded all the members of the editorial staff of AL-SHA'B and said: I look forward to a day when there will be tens of papers like Al-SHA'B, all representing the other view.

AL-SHA'B Throbs with Thought and Opinion

Kamil Zuhayri was followed by Mansur Hasan who expressed his delight to participate in the ceremony and said: We are not celebrating AL-SHA'B from a professional point of view only, but we are also celebrating a free newspaper which pulsates with thought and opinion. And this is what we hope for the press in Egypt. He added that the press has begun to perceive its real position and prestige. This is what we mean when we call the press a popular authority which we hope to see occupy a proper place. He pointed out that this is the goal of the committee for press codification.

He added: I attend this ceremony as a respresentative of the National Democratic Party because no matter how much our political stances and trends differ, we differ, as we coordinate, for the sake of Egypt. Egypt is the more eternal.

Mansur Hasan praised AL-SHA'B saying that it has represented a positive pulse, defended freedom and the honest word and has taken the initiative in giving expression to the other view. These are all qualities which we all hope for our party and national papers.

He emphasized that the real value of the other view springs from correcting a wrong view and underscoring a correct view, and said: In that sense, I appreciate the vigilance of AL-SHA'B.

Engineer Ibrahim Shukri, leader of the SLP, then spoke. He greeted all those present and asserted that AL-SHA'B would not have achieved any success had it not been for the integrity and honesty of many honest writers who want to give true expression to the other view. He noted that many of those writers volunteer their contributions for free so that AL-SHA'B may be the journal of free opinion for all Egyptians. I have always tried to be candid in my writings, he said, and to get to the point as briefly as possible.

Ibrahim Shukri said: I welcome Mansur Hasan, not because he is a minister. Ministerial portfolios come and go, but human relationships prevail. I am also delighted to see among the guests colleagues from the other parties and other brethren who had played a role in Egypt's political life. This means that AL-SHA'B does not only gather writers, but also men of different views who are all ultimately working for the good of Egypt.

Shukri pointed out that this makes him look forward to a broader goal--to a time when the SLP and AL-SHA'B can play a wider role on the pan-Arab level which does not please anyone nowadays. He said: We will try to bring views closer and offer ideas on how to remedy what has happened among us and on the need to exert more efforts to cure the malady that plagues inter-Arab relations.

STUDENT HOUSE FINANCIAL FRAUD EXPOSED

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 13 May 80 p 9

[Article: "Financial Malfeasance in the Student Housing Project at the University of 'Ayn Shams"]

[Text] AL-SHA'B has obtained two extremely important documents which unmask serious fraud in handling funds earmarked for the student housing project in the student city at 'Ayn Shams University.

The first evidence is a bill of payment in the amount of 143,000 pounds recommended for disbursement by the adviser to the president of the university. He is the engineer who designed the project and who collects a fee amounting to 5 percent of every bill of payment. Since the bill includes costs of cement, iron and other construction material which were reportedly used in building the student housing project, the university's director general of engineering affairs had to review the bill.

We found the following comments made on the document [by the director general of engineering affairs]:

One--During my inspection of the construction, I noticed that the porches were built of reinforced concrete at higher cost--a violation of the specifications. The porches could have been built of bricks, as usual.

Two--The prices of the reinforced concrete were exaggerated.

Three--There are no steel pipes at the construction site. All that is there are cast iron pipes which do not conform to the specifications.

Four--The quantity of concrete used in stairways should be revised.

The second document is another bill of payment signed by the same advisor on 31 December 1978 for the amount of 261,000 pounds. Comments by the university's director of engineering affairs have also been added to the document. They are:

One--In the course of inspection, I found that the reinforced concrete had not been used in previous university projects. This would quadruple costs and increase the burdens on the university. Brick could have been used instead.

Two--The bill says that drilling was made under the (water table). There is, however, no water table in this area.

Three--Sand filling operations used sand dug up on site. This means that the sum of 2,400 pounds cited by the builder as the coat of sand trucked in from outside for filling purposes is untrue and has not been disbursed.

Four--The water pipes which have been removed with all their supplements, according to the bill, should be handed over. The bill says that 200 meters of underground pipes have been dug out at a cost of 200 pounds. These pipes have not been delivered to the engineering administration and their value has not been deducted from the total value of the bill.

Because we found a lot of deletions in the quantities and costs of materials as originally entered in the bill, we talked about them to engineer Banub Sam'an, who had some comments and observations. He said: "The deletions in the quantities and costs were made with the knowledge of the person who approved the payment of the bill. The deletions were made when he learned of the comments I wrote on the bill. For example, I wrote that the quantity of the reinforced concrete used in the stairways was greater by one for every 100 meters--and later by one for every 50 meters--than it was in the previous bill. This adds up to a cost differential of up to 55,000 pounds which would be wasted and which would be paid out of the project appropriations for nothing in return."

There was also a comment to the effect that the quantity of concrete used for the roof of the project was adjusted upward in the bill so that it came to 96 cubic meters more than the figure cited in the previous bill. This means an additional cost of 10,000 pounds.

AL-SHA'B presents this case to all officials who are protective of the people's money, so that public funds may not go to brokers whose coffers would then bulge with money stolen from the people.

GOVERNMENT SCORED ON CAMPAIGN AGAINST JUDICIARY, PRESS

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 27 May 80 pp 7, 15

[Article by Dr Muhammad Hilmi Murad: "Are We Headed For a Massacre Against Judges and Journalists?"]

[Text] President Anwar al-Sadat has twice lashed out fiercely at members of the judiciary who expressed disapproval of the Law on Morality. The first time was on 14 May, when he was delivering a speech to the People's Assembly in his capacity as president. In the speech, he regarded his action as a political one. The second time was on 19 May. On this occasion, in his capacity as the head of the new government, he issued instructions to the ministers and governors at the first meeting of the new cabinet, and asked the minister of justice to deal with the situation by setting up a committee on values from within the judiciary.

At the same meeting, he called on the minister of state for information and culture to prepare the new press law on the basis of the pertinent constitutional amendment, so that the bill may be presented to the People's Assembly before its summer vacation. The bill would turn the Higher Council for the Press into a custodian over the press. The president also asked the minister to attach to the bill another bill which would require the re-registration of journalists.

These two directives brought back to mind the massacre of judges which took place in September 1969 and other incidents in which some journalists were reassigned to positions in fish and shoe companies.

People are now asking: Are we headed for a new massacre involving judges and journalists by orders of the highest authority in the state, in a regime which raises the slogan of democracy and the sovereignty of law?

Judges Entitled to Views on Morality Law

It is truly ironical that some members of the judiciary are being accused of carrying out political activities when all that they have done was to exercise a right. Indeed, they exercised a duty provided for in Article 173 of the present constitution which requires the government to sound out the Higher Council of Judicial Bodies on any bill dealing with judicial affairs.

The Law on Morality provides for the establishment of new courts to be called Courts of Values which, in addition to judges, would include public personalities for the first time in the history of the Egyptian judicial system. The law also concerns itself with the jurisdiction of the Socialist Public Prosecutor which is related to the jurisdiction of the office of the Attorney General. Constitutionally, this requires the government to seek the views of the Higher Council of Judicial Bodies. Indeed, the minister of justice made a statement to this effect at a press conference, and a similar reference is included in the preface of the law entitled "The Law of Protecting Values from Impropriety."

It goes without saying that the members of the higher judicial council feel that when they speak out they do not simply expresss personal views but represent the views of the judicial groups for which they act. The president of the Court of Cassation cannot express an opinion on a serious bill which involves functions and jurisdiction of the judiciary, such as the Law on Morality, until he has referred the matter first to the general assembly of the Court of Cassation. By the same token, the head of the state council has no right to express an individual opinion on such an important matter, except after hearing the opinions of his colleagues, the members of the council. Consequently, judges are entitled in general to discuss among themselves the various aspects of a bill which concerns itself with the judicial system and involves their work, life and careers. Such discussion cannot be construed as political action.

Why Is It That Judges Are Permitted to Praise Political Decisions?

Why is it that the action of judges in expressing opinions on bills related to the judiciary--action which is constitutionally permissible--is found to be improper simply because it is not in accord with the desire of the government and the ruling party? Also, why is it that the authorities have been blessing favorable opinions which praise political decisions? Can we deduce from this that what the government wants is to receive constant approval of its actions and to blot out any views which disagree with the positions of the ruling authority?

When the decision to abolish the state of emergency (the martial law) was taken, so-called nationalist newspapers published the views of some members of the judiciary in which they expressed satisfaction with the decision to abolish martial law and return to normal life where the provisions of the public law and the constitution prevail. In fact, on 23 May, some of those papers published the text of a cable sent by the president of the Judges Club to President Anwar al-Sadat, who is the leader of one of the political parties and the head of the present government, greeting him on the occasion of the May revolution anniversary and thanking him for putting an end to the state of emergency. Does the president consider the cable a judicial act or a political one?

What if a member of the judiciary expressed a different opinion on the abolition of the martial law? What if he said, for example, that the codification of many extraordinary powers established under the emergency law into permanent laws, such as the Law on Morality, which permits the arrest or confinement of citizens and the impounding of their properties and assets, and the Law on State Security Courts, which permits military magistrates, who can be discharged and who are not independent of their executive office, to sit alongside civil judges, are measures which strip the decision abolishing martial law of a great deal of its significance with regard to promoting freedom, judicial safeguards and normal legal procedures to which the people have been aspiring? Would a judge who says such things be in the same category as judges who express complete satisfaction with the abolition decision?

Minister Abu Sihli Responsible for the Misunderstanding

In my view, the minister of justice, Anwar Abu Sihli, is the cause of the misunderstanding of the facts. He considered that those who have expressed a different opinion on the Law on Morality have defied his authority as the political minister who is responsible for the passage of the law. He therefore fought that group of judges in the by-elections which were held to reelect those whose membership had lapsed. He fought them in different ways. In his meetings with members of the judiciary and visits to courts before the elections, he would announce that the success of certain candidates would anger the ruling party and thereby prevent him from meeting the demands and needs of the judiciary. In the leaflet or statement which was mentioned by President al-Sadat before the People's Assembly, members of a group cited the minister's attitude toward them, although they did not refer to him by name. Actually, no one from this or any other group is either with or against the ruling party. They are all neutral judges detached from politics and political ends.

We hope that history will not repeat itself, that minister Abu Sihli will not cause another judges massacre similar to the massacre caused by minister Abu Nusayr, God forgive him, in 1969 under the pretext that he was carrying out a reform movement and a purge in the ranks of the judiciary.

I do not want to talk in detail about the methods which are being used by minister Abu Sihli, the minister of justice, in this particular period--methods which lend themselves to misunderstanding and which are in fact unacceptable in view of the prestige and sanctity of the judiciary. I refrain from doing so in deference to and out of respect for the members of the judiciary. I am confident that all those methods will in no way affect the independence and neutrality of the judiciary.

I will confine myself, however, to a report by AL-AKHBAR on 23 May, 1980, about a meeting between the minister of justice and members of the judiciary in the Judges Club in the presence of engineer 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman, the dean of engineers, to discuss housing problems involving judges. At the meeting, the minister announced that he is considering a plan to extend the service age for judges to 65 years, but that the extension will only be applicable to judges with high qualifications. This condition and stipulation are rejected, because they imply an attempt to influence the judiciary through the option of extending or not extending the age ceiling. This is unacceptable in the case of those judges who are 60 and have reached the top of their careers. In fact, this option of extending the service age to 65 is nonexistent in the case of university professors.

Inadmissibility of Consultative Council's Tutelage Over Press

Turning to the press and members of the press, the old image of the Socialist Union's ownership of press establishments seems to hold sway. In his instructions to the minister of information and culture, Mansur Hasan, President al-Sadat said that the owner of the press in Egypt is the Consultative Council [Shura Council] in its capacity as the council of the family, in accordance with the latest constitutional amendment, and that the Higher Press Council represents the press. The president also suggested that the press syndicate be converted into a club like the judges club.

The Consultative Council cannot constitutionally or legally own the press in Egypt. The constitutional amendment which has been put to a plebiscite recently provides that the ownership and funding of the press should be subject to the people's supervision. It did not say, as it was said in the previous plebiscite, that it should be owned by the Consultative Council or by the people. It also said that its ownership by public and private legal persons and by political parties is guaranteed under the law (Article 209, which is added to the constitution).

Even if we are to assume that the so-called nationalist press is owned by the people, the Consultative Council is not the people's representative. One third of the members of this council are appointed by the president in his capacity as the chief of the executive branch. The council, furthermore, is of a purely consultative nature and has no binding powers (Articles 194, 195 and 196, added to the constitution).

In the book by the able legal scholar Mustafa Mar'i, which was published this week under the title of THE PRESS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND RULER, the author notes that Article 29 of the constitution recognizes only three kinds of ownership: public ownership, cooperative ownership and private ownership. Since the papers known as nationalist papers are not privately or cooperatively owned, they should become public property. The government is the highest executive and administrative authority in the state, and not the Consultative Council. Therefore, the government alone is responsible for managing and protecting the public wealth (pages 84 and 85 of the book). Is the intention then to turn those papers officially into government papers? Is it not better to turn these papers into companies where citizens would be able to buy shares, provided that first priority be given to those working in these papers and that any one holder cannot own more than a certain number of shares so that the company would be truly owned by the people?

The journalists' right to the continued existence of their syndicate is one guaranteed by the present constitution--Article 56--and it is inadmissible for the law to interfere to arrogate that right. It can, however, intervene to safeguard it, as clearly mentioned in paragraph one of that article.

There are no grounds of similarity between the members of the press and the judges. The members of the press are members of a free profession, the same as doctors and lawyers, and not public servants of the state, as judges are.

The judges are members of the judicial branch which, like the legislative and executive branches, constitutes one of the three authorities of the state. The "press authority or estate," which is cited in the constitutional amendment, is not a state authority but an "independent, popular authority" (Article 206, added to the constitution). That is to say, it is an authority in the figurative sense only, since it has no jurisdiction or power to make binding decisions. It is likened to a state authority because of its profound influence on the public opinion, as was explained in the report of the committee set up by the People's Assembly to look into the constitutional amendment.

Since the latest constitutional amendment, under the heading of "The Press Authority," provided for the freedom of the press in more than one instance, control of the journalists by anyone outside their own ranks can be construed as an act of subjugation to the ruler--in other words, as restrictions on the freedom of the press.

Re-Registering Journalists A Wasting of Acquired Rights

Re-registering members of the press is tantamount to an inadmissible act of frightening journalists. The legal course of bringing to account those of them who have overstepped the bounds of permissible criticism is to take them to a criminal court, if the violation constitutes a criminal offense, or to a disciplinary court, if the charge against them is violation of the profession's code of ethics.

Re-registration is similar to the act, undertaken during the judges massacre, of re-organizing the judicial bodies as a means of eliminating certain judges from the judiciary. The Court of Cassation has condemned that action and regarded it as a blatant aggression against law and the constitution. Furthermore, re-registration would subject certain journalists to the prospect of being deprived of their profession, which is the source of their livelihood, and would clear the way for partisan retaliation and political tyranny.

The plea of bringing to account journalists who have overstepped their bounds abroad cannot be used as a pretext to impose this shattering measure. Failure to re-register these journalists will not affect their positions abroad. Indeed, non-registration would drive those journalists to intensify their attacks on the policies of the regime and would drive the host governments to take greater care of them. Furthermore, this would give those states a new cause and added material for attacking and deriding the Egyptian government.

What I fear most is that the declared intention of penalizing journalists working abroad would be a mere facade for denying registration to those journalists at home who do not enjoy the approval of the regime and the ruling party.

Such a precedent would be extremely serious, for it can be applied to members of other professions as well. And if we are to assume the worst, how can we be sure that a day will not come when opportunists, climbers and self-serving toadies will advocate that education certificates and degrees should be reconsidered so that the non-loyalists can be deprived of their degrees and qualifications?

The ease of issuing legislation because of the sweeping pro-government majority in the People's Assembly cannot be used as a justification for the adoption of a legislative measure without first pondering its consequences and repercussions.

It is our hope, finally, that the remarks made by President al-Sadat about judges and journalists were no more than views which can be debated at the level of the cabinet and not orders to be carried out. It is our hope too that cabinet ministers should participate in drawing up the important policies of the state. Every citizen should fear God in discharging his duties, for the Day of Reckoning will inevitably come.

FORMER WAR MINISTER DEFENDS SELF AGAINST SADAT

[Article: "Lt Gen Sadiq Defends Himself and Declares: Defense Line Was Ready Since 1969"]

[Text] In a special interview with AL-SHA'B, Lt Gen Muhammad Ahmad Sadiq, the former War Minister, responded to President Anwar al-Sadat's speech of 14 May before the People's Assembly in which the president accused him of treason. The treason charge stemmed from the president's belief that "the Israeli ground barrier east of the Suez Canal was higher than the Egyptian barrier west of the Canal. This made the Egyptian military positions exposed and weakened our defense capabilities."

There Was No Danger

Lt Gen Sadiq categorically denied the charge. To prove his argument, he emphasized that the Egyptian defense line was ready and completed since 1969. The Egyptian armed forces, he added, were highly trained in carrying out their duty and the line was in no danger. It had been erected after a thorough study of all eventualities and contingencies and on scientific bases, and was the result of the efforts of efficient officers. Our defense was active so that during the defensive period, our forces carried out more than 100 crossing operations into enemy territory to reconnoiter the enemy's defense lines. All the crossing operations were successful and provided the information on which the attack and crossing plan was based.

The Story of the Ground Barrier

Lt Gen Sadiq then recounted the story of the ground barrier. He said: The Egyptian command decided to erect a ground screen west of the Canal because the eastern bank of the Canal was higher than the western, thereby enabling the enemy to watch our movements on the west bank. The general command of the military units stationed in the area was therefore commissioned to set up the screen so that the frontline soldiers may be able to carry out their chores and duties without interference by enemy snipers and to prevent the enemy from watching our positions and movements easily. The enemy resorted to the same tactic. Any commander realizes that the screen does not seriously hinder the other side from reconnaissance and exploration. For there are mobile towers, binoculars, balloons, aerial reconnaissance and various kinds of electronic reconnaissance, and all these have been successfully used.

No One Was Remiss

The former war minister affirmed that no one was remiss in protecting our movements and positions west of the Canal from enemy reconnaissance. If anything of the sort had happened it would have been the responsibility of the local commander or the immediate commander, but there was no evidence that any such commander had been remiss. They had the means to enable them to continue to add more soil to raise the ground screen in any area in which the enemy's ground screen was higher.

We Were Preparing for the Attack

In his speech, President al-Sadat said that he had given the sum of 20 million pounds to the war minister who succeeded Lt Gen Sadiq to use them in raising the Egyptian ground barrier. Responding to this, Lt Gen Sadiq said: The president and the commanders who were members of the higher council of the armed forces know that it was I who had asked for that sum of money. But I wanted it to use it to equip the positions from which the attack would begin. The Egyptian armed forces at the time were preparing themselves for the attack, in terms of planning, training and preparing the theater of operations. Equipping the positions from which the attack would begin was part of the plan to prepare the theater of operations. Since we were preparing for the attack, it follows that we had already completed our defense and defensive arrangements a long time before that. If Israel felt for a moment that it would have been able to penetrate our defenses, it would not have hesitated to do so.

Those Who Misinformed the President

Lt Gen Sadiq said that those who told President al-Sadat that an enemy ground barrier that is higher than ours would mean the collapse of our defense lines, which scared and worried the president and deprived him of sleep for a long time until the new minister informed him that the Egyptian barrier has been raised, have not been honest with the president and have misinformed him. Lt Gen Sadiq explained his view as follows: Those persons should have told the president that defense lines depend on well-equipped and fortified defense positions. They may depend on water or artificial obstructions or both. Furthermore, they depend on a computation of the quantity of ammunition per square meter, either in terms of small weapons, mortars, various kinds of artillery, missiles and aircraft missiles which the forces can muster and use to protect these positions from penetration. Behind these positions lie other positions to deter penetration. The forces operating through those positions are called anti-penetration forces. Then there are the positions of the mobile counter-offensive forces of all levels. After all that, there are the general reserve forces whose task it is to plug any loophole or gap which may develop.

No Justification

What I have already recounted means that there was no reason for President al-Sadat's concern and worry about our defense lines. The president, he said, can ask any of the present military commanders--whose combat efficiency, knowledge and patriotism I fully trust. They were all commanders who had assumed big responsibilities during that period and were fully aware of what was going on at the time.

Lt Gen Muhammad Sadiq had a few remarks to address to President al-Sadat. He said: His excellency is a man who strictly adheres to the morals and values of the villager and who has propounded the law of protecting values from impropriety. In view of this, I had not expected him to say that he has fired a minister. Can a president who espouses all such values and morals speak of a minister in this manner? The minister is a colleague who shares in bearing the responsibility of national action. Whether he succeeded in his mission or not and whether the president or any other political powers approved of him or not, he has every right as a citizen to be addressed in a manner that would not injure his dignity and pride.

Lt Gen Sadiq had more to say to President al-Sadat: The occasion which the president has chosen to accuse him of treason and to reproach him severely, despite the silence and isolation which he [Sadiq] has voluntarily imposed on himself since he was relieved of his duties, was the anniversary of the corrective revolution. President al-Sadat and our good and honorable people remember that during that extremely critical period of our history, God inspired me to stand by the president and to settle the dispute in favor of the president. The president has not used the term "treason" to describe the actions of the centers of power which had plotted against him, although he was making his speech on the 9th anniversary of the defeat of their plots against his regime. The president has not also leveled the charge of treason against any of the ministers who were tried and convicted in cases involving dishonorable actions. Why then am I singled out and accused of treason despite all that I have done for Egypt? Praise be to God for thanks to Him I have always chosen to take the side of right and truth.

SUGGESTIONS FOR SOLVING THE HOUSING PROBLEM

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 27 May 80 p 13

[Article by Engineer Muhammad Hasan Durrah: "A Study on the Housing Problem; Contradictory Housing Policies Do Not Serve the Cause"]

[Text] In a previous edition, we explained the dimensions of the housing problem as delineated by studies undertaken by the National Housing Committee (NHC), which has been set up for this purpose, and the NHC's own ideas on a solution of the problem. We also reported that after the cabinet's adoption of the plan on 13 April, we were surprised to see that the plan proposed by the National Party has resurfaced with a conception that is totally at variance with the studies conducted by the NHC for the solution of the problem. We have showed that the National Party's housing committee should have presented its own plan to the NHC when it was in session, since the NHC was specifically commissioned by the National Party leadership to prepare a national plan for housing that does not change with the change of cabinets.

In the policy statement delivered by the prime minister of the previous cabinet, Dr Mustafa Khalil, before the People's Assembly on 15 December 1979, he said--and the housing minister later confirmed--that negotiations were going on with a number of European firms to build 100,000 housing units, in addition to the units provided for in the annual national plan, in order to bring up the number of housing units per year to 200,000.

In the preceding article, we warned that any new recommendations which are not in keeping with the reports submitted by the NHC will have adverse effects which would impede the housing plans prescribed in the plan, for several reasons. Here they are:

1. When the NHC formulated its report, it took into consideration all available capabilities in Egypt. Next to financing, the most important capabilities that had to be considered were mapping and preparing lands that are suitable for building and providing them with various utilities and amenities, labor and construction material and equipment, skilled labor and experienced technical and specialized talent. It believe that, given the present condition of those capabilities, we cannot build the originally planned 100,000 units, unless we replenish and reinforce these capabilities, stop emigration, work at full capacity day and night or use advanced factories and factories producing prefabricated materials. These factories, however, are operating now within 5 percent of their capacity.

2. With regard to lands suitable and ready for building, I would like to point out that there is a shortage of land suitable for building and equipped with the necessary utilities. This shortage constitutes a major obstacle in the way of solving the housing problem. If within a year or two we can provide some lands suitable for building according to the scheduled plan or part of it, it would still be very difficult to equip lands that can absorb additional housing units without first planning the new townships and suburbs, providing them with utilities and re-designing the utilities networks of present cities and towns to cope with the large increase in urban development. All this requires intensive efforts in terms of financing, manpower construction materials and time. We will return to the subject of building lands to discuss it in greater detail later on.

3. With regard to construction materials and labor, it may be said that the European companies with which negotiations were taking place will supply the necessary iron and cement and would use advanced factories to cut down on the need for labor, but does that mean that these companies will supply the necessary professional and technical skilled workers and experts? And if the answer is yes, how much would such imported labor cost? No doubt, it will cost very dearly and will have a clear effect on the wages of local labor, which are already high and seek any opportunity to get even higher. It is well-known that Egypt is presently facing a severe shortage--indeed, a scarcity--in technical labor, especially in the building and construction profession, and the necessary technical expertise required to operate the machinery and equipment. This has been a major cause of the delay and retardation in the implementation of the construction and development plan which in turn caused a large and growing increase in wages, by dint of the law of supply and demand. This became quite obvious when work began in rebuilding the cities and towns along the Suez Canal at the beginning of 1974. Wages continued to increase until they amounted to 8 times or more what they used to be in the year before. With the scarcity of skilled and professional labor and the inability of the present manpower to implement the plan or a part of it, it is regrettable that the emigration of professional workers to various Arab countries continues in full swing without control or rationalization.

4. It thus becomes clear that if foreign companies were engaged to build 100,000 housing units above and beyond the units provided for in the original plan, the cost will be too high in view of the high cost of imported construction materials and ancillary local products, in addition to the high level of wages and the lack of adequate labor, which will have a bad--indeed, serious--effect on the implementation of the original construction plan set forth by the state. The inevitable result will be an inflation of wages and prices on the level of the state.

Actually, we are in dire need for those foreign companies, but only in the field of building new townships and only through the grant of concessions by the state to those companies. We will discuss this subject in detail when we examine the question of building lands and new townships. The truth of the matter is that all opinions and ideas are welcome and deserve praise. If they can be implemented, they would decisively help solve the problem, but ideas are something and the application of these ideas is something else.

The problem has been going on for 25 years. It has never abated during that period. On the contrary, it deteriorated year after year. The population flood continued to grow until it reached 1.2 million persons a year at the present rate. The solution is no longer a simple one, nor can it be obtained by statements, reports or special ideas. The experience of the past years is a lesson for us. Let me cite some examples drawn from operations which are being implemented or which we are promised will be implemented.

In 1976, a company was assigned to produce 5,500 housing units in the Nasr city. Not a single unit has been delivered to date. In 1977, the Nasr city company announced plans to establish 4,500 housing units. A foreign company was contracted to undertake the project and the Nasr city company announced that the apartments will be ready for delivery toward the end of 1978. 1978 and 1979 have already passed and nothing has been implemented. In fact, the foreign company has ceased operations. In the past two years or more, the foreign company only managed to set up the concrete framework of 300 units out of the total of 4,500 units. As a result, the Ministry of Housing was forced to withdraw the concession from that company and to invite new bids after the loss of three years of almost total waste. Moreover, since 1976, various housing ministers have announced plans for the construction of tens of thousands of housing units annually. In fact, 9 firms which own factories producing prefabricated building materials were asked to build 10,000 units each over a period of 10 years, that is 2,000 units annually which the capacity of each plant, on the assumption that work would start at the beginning of 1979. Years have passed, however, and nothing has happened. The production of the aforementioned plants thus far has not exceeded 5 percent of their capacities. Actually, most of those plants have not even begun producing. These are some of many examples. This does not mean, however, that there are not successful companies which have completed their commitments.

The Remedy We Propose

The problem is urgent and persistent. If we are really serious in our efforts to solve it within a plan that would produce safe results, we should then proceed along the path charted by the report of the NHC and consider the problem of housing and housing utilities as the problem of all Egypt. Furthermore, the new government, which has declared that it has come into being for the sake of relieving the suffering of the citizens, should throw its weight and use all its material and manpower potentialities to salvage whatever can be salvaged of the urgent plan which had been designed for 1980, namely, to build 100,000 fully equipped housing units for the first 5-year plan, as the NHC has proposed in its report. While we are aware that it is too late for the 1980 plan to be fully implemented, let us nevertheless rededicate ourselves to the task of completing the 100,000 units in question as of the beginning of the amended fiscal year, which is the beginning of July, God willing, and let us try by all means to have them occupied during the 1980-81 fiscal year. For we must all know that the fulfillment of the 100,000 units was no easy task and that it needs extraordinary and intensive efforts. When the state geared all its material and human energies to undertake the formidable task of rebuilding the Suez Canal cities and towns--and despite the fact that there was adequate financing at the time and that 50 percent of the construction cost was advanced to the pertinent companies ahead of schedule so as to provide them with financial liquidity, a basic factor in the implementation of any project, and that lands and construction materials were also available--the state managed only to establish 34,000 new housing units and their utilities in the years 1974, 1975, 1976 and 1977, that is about four years, in addition to repairing about 40,000 units which were damaged during the enemy shelling of those cities and towns.

Reports citing new amendments by the state also reported that the NDP's housing committee has announced plans for a housing project in the October 6 town through the acquisition of an area of one million square meters which will be divided into economy, medium and superior classes housing 20,000 units. The units would be built without government financing, on the assumption that income from the superior class of houses will offset the cost of economy class housing. I believe that this experiment will be a test for the success of that kind of concept, but such a plan should have no effect on the implementation of the original national plan.

In sum, it is still possible to salvage the situation by creating a powerful revolution in the construction sector and by mobilizing that sector to solve the housing problem by establishng the largest possible number of economy-class housing and some medium-class housing in accordance with the demands of the masses which are reeling under the impact of the housing predicament. The government should commit itself to that kind of housing and should give that plan a priority and cease work on operations that are not considered to be urgent so as to spare financing, labor and construction materials. This would be similar to the 1965 experience when the housing sector was mobilized to meet urgent housing needs and the 1970 experience when the government pushed through plans to build missile bases and offered various facilities to the private sector to tempt and encourage it to participate in the building effort.

Do we have the will and determination to work? And will our capabilities enable us to operate rapidly and complete our task quickly, or will the situation remain the same as it is now? And will the report of the NHC see the light of day or will it meet the same fate of previous reports?

Time alone will tell and provide the answers to these questions. In the meantime, we will have further encounters to discuss some of the present shortages, bottlenecks and negative factors which impede solution, in the hope that our discussions will light the way before the government and the people. May God grant us success and lead us to a path which would serve the well-being of our beloved Egypt.

OPPOSITION LEADER CALLS FOR SUSTAINED COOPERATION WITH SUDAN

[Article by Ibrahim Shukri, Leader of the Socialist Labor Party: "Sudan, the Nile and the Future; Integration Policies Should Be Maintained"]

[Text] I write this after the return of the Socialist Labor Party's (SLP) delegation from a visit to the Sudan on the anniversary of the 25 May revolution. I took part in the celebration of that revolution. Our delegation's visit to Khartoum was a modest attempt on our part to tell our Sudanese brethren that we stand with them at all times and under all conditions.

I say a modest attempt because I believe that there could have been other official and popular delegations representing our national government and the majority party. This would always earn the appreciation of the Sudanese people and government. But I do not wish to get into the details of the circumstances which caused Egypt's popular and governmental representation at that anniversary celebration to be small. Those circumstances, after all, would not benefit the eternal fact which we always seek to underline and in which we always believe—that the peoples of Egypt and the Sudan who live along the banks of the Nile and its tributaries are bound by strong ties throughout history. Transient circumstances might blur the external surface of that fact, but the substance always remains strong, solid and full of hope.

We do not, however, like to surrender to that fact simply because it is a fact which may be invulnerable and immune against any external onslaught. The change of circumstances, an overlapping of interests among nations and great power rivalries and conflicts throughout the world might individually or severally threaten many facts and strongly held beliefs which have remained strong and cohesive for generations but which eroded or were undermined by subversion and ambitions as a result of neglect and the lack of maintenance.

The relationship between the inhabitants of Egypt and the inhabitants of northern Sudan is not only a question of sentiments and familial ties. This is an indisputable fact. I have even heard it told of President Nimeiri that he once said that of every three marriages in northern Sudan one marriage at least involves an Egyptian spouse or a spouse descended from Egyptian parents. It is no coincidence, too, that since the Egyptian revolution in 1952, two of the three Egyptian presidents--President Muhammad Najib and President Anwar al-Sadat--have Sudanese blood in them.

The question, I say, is not one of sentiments and family interrelationships, for this is not unique to Sudan and Egypt, and many Egyptian families have ties with families in various Arab countries, either to the east in what is known as [greater] Syria, Hijaz and Yemen, or to the west in what used to be known as the greater Maghreb. These ties emerged as a result of economic relations, trade and mutual benefits as well as the fact that all or some of these countries at one time or another in history fell under a single, unified political influence.

In the case of Egypt and the Sudan, it is far more than that. They share the same reason for their neutrality, namely, that they depend on the same river--a great river which supplies its banks and delta with elements that once were the mainstay of the oldest civilization. In the sound and light display in Khartoum, I heard names of old kings of Sudan, such as (Ba'ankhi), the noble king and (Tirhaqa), the mighty king. This has tempted me to visit the national museum in Khartoum which I found to be part of the Egyptian Museum in Cairo. The old dynasties which reigned in eras preceding the birth of Christ are the same dynasties whose remains are exhibited in the Egyptian Museum. The subsequent Christian and Moslem eras are also displayed in the Coptic Museum and the Islamic Antiquities Museum at Bab al-Khalq in Cairo.

Even in the modern era we both jointly suffered under British colonialism. Colonialism exploited us equally, and there was even a similarity in the outward manifestations of the colonial government. In Khartoum, the white palace of the British governor was situated on a river bank shaded by Bengali (Phicks) trees. In Cairo's Garden City, the High Commissioner ruled from his palace which sat on the river's bank shaded by Bengali (Phicks) trees.

As colonialism turned Egypt into a large farm to supply its factories in Manchester with cotton, the major crop of Egypt, and organized the irrigation system in Egypt to fit this goal, the same thing was repeated in Sudan. Al-Jazirah became the largest cotton plantation in the Sudan and irrigation was organized in such a way as to service that major crop.

The Egyptian people, like the Sudanese people, struggled to get rid of the yoke of British colonialism and ultimately triumphed. Colonialism was purged from the soil of Sudan and the soil of Egypt as well, and we both faced the tough test--the test of development for the well-being of all the people. There was no longer a privileged minority and a vast majority which hardly maintained a subsistence level. Instead, a decent life for all became the aspired goal.

We find the economies of Egypt and Sudan undergoing changes and incorporating various industries which depend on available crops and raw materials. The textile plants and mills of Al-Mahallah al-Kubra and Kafr al-Dawwar for years processed and manufactured Egypt's cotton, while the textile mills of Khartoum Bahri and Port Sudan are manufacturing Sudan's cotton. There are many other factories in Egypt and Sudan dealing with several products from tires to canned foods and food materials.

But the volume or output of those factories is far below the consumption requirements of the people as well as the export requirements of both countries. We already see the early signs of a race in both Egypt and Sudan between raising the standard of living and increasing the people's consumption ability, on the one hand, and the general increase in prices caused by low supply and high demand, on the other. This creates severe hardships for a majority of the people whose incomes cannot keep up with the increase in prices.

I spent a few days in Khartoum with my colleagues as guests of the Sudanese Socialist Union. During those days we attended all the ceremonies commemorating the May revolution. Most of these were ceremonies inaugurating new important projects for economic and social development. This year's celebrations were marked by the presence of Ethiopia's President Mengistu. Indeed, many ceremonies were characterized by manifestations of welcome for the Ethiopian leader and praise for the friendship and spirit of peace which prevail between the Sudanese and Ethiopian peoples. I found this to be a logical state of affairs. Relations between two neighbors sharing long borders and common interests deriving from their dependence on the same river should be based on cooperation and friendship, not estrangement or hostility.

But when I returned to Cairo with my colleague Dr Hilmi al-Hadidi--indeed, even before my return--I heard some remarks about the effect of Sudanese--Ethiopian rapprochement on the Egyptian-Sudanese relations, despite the fact that Egypt issued a statement a few weeks before welcoming the improvement in relations between Sudan and its Ethiopian neighbor. It could be that the memorandum Ethiopia had distributed among African states with regard to Egypt's use of the Nile waters was directly responsible for stirring fears over Egypt's right to the waters of the Nile. It so happened that the Ethiopian memorandum was the first order of business which faced me at the People's Assembly after my return from Khartoum. Prompted by the Ethiopian memo, the Minister of Irrigation delivered a long statement detailing the rules and bases which govern the use of the Nile waters by the nine countries within the Nile basin.

I hasten to say to anyone who feels any sense of fear that the Ethiopian-Sudanese rapprochement is in keeping with the correct line which safeguards our right to the waters of the river. The agreements relating to Ethiopia which were cited by the Minister of Irrigation were agreements which were signed between Ethiopia and the British government acting on behalf of Sudan. These agreements define the borderline between Ethiopia and Sudan and also define Sudan's rights with regard to the Nile waters. Sudan's interests in the Nile waters are tied in with Egypt's interests, and it is a far-fetched idea, for economic reasons, that Ethiopia would undertake projects on the Nile which would hurt Sudan before hurting Egypt.

It is entirely unlikely that Ethiopia would hold up large amounts of river waters for irrigation projects. The Egyptian agriculture is the least costly agriculture, and irrigation projects are relatively costly because they are unnecessary. This leaves power-generation projects involving the building of bridges and waterfalls. This would affect the supply of waters at certain times and might have some effects on irrigation projects in Sudan.

So we see in the end that the mainstay of life in Egypt and Sudan in particular is organically and strongly interconnected and that our similar problems require greater cooperation and solidarity. This is what is meant by the word "future" in the title. This future which I hope will be full of prosperity in the Nile valley requires integrated development and planning to exploit the vast resources of Sudan and Egypt. Since we have chosen the formula of integration, we should keep going by implementing all the projects that have been studied and initiated or those that are still under consideration. What Egypt and Sudan need is increased production of all kinds of crops and livestock. In that connection, joint coordination and planning to achieve quick results in providing all crops will be very beneficial not only for the future and future projects but also for the immediate present. I have noticed that prices of vegetables, fruits and cereals in Sudan have been rising. The same goes for Egypt.

The situation does not require long years to set things straight. Lands are abundant in Sudan and are not lacking in Egypt, in addition to the fact that water is available whether from seasonal rains in Sudan and southern Sudan [sic] or from permanent projects along the river.

The policies of complementarity and integration should go on because I consider infrastructure projects--primarily roads connecting Sudan and Egypt--to be extremely important for the success of cooperation and integration between Egypt and Sudan. I will not rest until I see a land route that would occasionally run along the river and follow the trail of the old caravans (Darb al-Arba'in), with wells here and there along its course to provide travellers with water, I would like to see that road used by camel caravans and small and big vehicles driving from the south and used by Sudan-bound Egyptians using all kinds of transportation means, including donkeys, and even walking. I would like to see that road begin at a point in southern Sudan, connecting all the central African states surrounding it then heading north to Khartoum and eventually to Cairo and Alexandria, thereby connecting the heart of the African continent to the shores of the Mediterranean, some of which fall in Europe. That project is the one that preeminently deserves to be implemented and considered by all international and African organizations or by the various banks and funds which are concerned with the development of Africa and the well-being of its peoples--indeed, the well-being of the area surrounding it. Sudan, north and south, with its six provinces (according to the new reorganization plan) and Egypt with its countryside and delta, east and west, can truly be the wheat, vegetable, fruit and flower basket for all the rich countries surrounding us, whether they be the oil-rich countries to the east and the west or the technologically advanced countries of Europe where the level of consumption keeps growing and the patterns of consumption keep getting more diversified day after day.

To those who talk about establishing prosperity in Egypt and Sudan, I say: We have no choice, by God, except to muster our capabilities and mobilize the resources of our countries and cooperate with our Arab brethren. This is the right path which can enable us to weather all storms and greedy ambitions.

On to work. Long live Egypt. Long live the Sudan. God is the greatest and glory be to the Arabs.

MILITARY ASSOCIATION WITH U.S. OPPOSED

[Article by 'Abd al-Rahman al-Jabiri: "Egypt's Economic Security Before American Security"]

[Text] In a statement to the WASHINGTON POST, President Anwar al-Sadat indicated that he was ready to grant the United States defense facilities. Tom Reston, the spokesman for the American State Department, has stated that the American Administration is presently discussing with Egypt issues related to the common security of the two countries. He noted that the discussion is based on the suggestion made by President al-Sadat in his aforementioned statement, namely, the proposition that the United States stockpile advanced weapons in Egypt, including F-15 fighter aircraft, but without the stationing of American forces in Egypt.

The spokesman pointed out that the United States does not plan to manufacture F-15's or any other types of aircraft in Egypt, but that it is seriously studying the question of using those facilities in times of crisis in the Middle East. The spokesman said that the United States has previously used facilities provided by Egypt for the training of AWAC reconnaissance (spying) aircraft. If we add to that earlier reports that Egypt has provided facilities to the United States during the abortive attempt to rescue the American hostages held in the American embassy in Tehran, it becomes clear without doubt that there is some kind of military cooperation between Egypt and the United States. Neither party has denied the existence of that cooperation.

The United States and the Department of Defense have responded quickly to President Anwar al-Sadat's offer to provide defense facilities for the American forces. The official spokesman for the Department of State promptly announced that talks are under way between Egypt and America over President al-Sadat's suggestion. Earlier, however, President al-Sadat had repeatedly asked President Carter for large-scale economic aid to help Egypt overcome its economic problems. Our press talked profusively about a "Carter Plan," which was likened by America to the Marshal Plan, for the rescue of the Egyptian economy, and spoke of billions of American dollars which will be flowing into Egypt. Soon, however, these news disappeared and were replaced by news of the military cooperation between Egypt and America and the defense facilities which Egypt will be providing for the American forces.

We wonder why has not the United States hastened to respond to respond to President al-Sadat's request for a "Carter Plan" to rescue the Egyptian economy, similar to the Marshal Plan which was instituted by the United States in Europe after World War Two. President Anwar al-Sadat was optimistic when he called upon America to provide Egypt with an aid program that would salvage the Egyptian economy and provide prosperity for Egypt and the Egyptian people. But instead of responding quickly to the President's request for a Carter economic plan, the United States is trying to drag Egypt into the policy of military pacts which Egypt has rejected for more than 25 years under extremely difficult political, economic and military conditions.

After having recognized Israel, ended the state of war with it, signed a peace treaty and declared time and again that the October war is the last war, we now allow ourselves to be dragged by the United States into a policy that serves only its oil and investment interests in the Middle East and the Gulf region.

Military association with the United States will provide us with no benefits. Our problem today is economic not military. Military association with the United States will widen and deepen the rift between Egypt and the Arab states and deprive us of the huge financial, investment and economic resources which these states (which the United States and all West European countries are trying to woo and deal with) can offer to us. Military association with the United States will weaken Egypt's position among the nonaligned states. Egypt was one of the founders of positive neutrality and nonalignment, and remained for a long time a leader of positive neutrality and nonalignment. Egypt has benefited politically and economically from its strict adherence to that policy and used to receive aid and loans from the two superpowers in appreciation of its role in international politics.

We are against military association with the United States or any other state. We do not want to involve ourselves in problems and conflicts between the two superpowers. We have enough of our own. If the United States is seeking its national security in Egypt, it should first seek with us our economic security.

LACK OF APPARATUS TO SUPERVISE DEVELOPMENT

[Article: "Dr 'Abd al-Razzaq 'Abd al-Majid Admits Lack of Apparatus to Supervise Development in Egypt"]

[Text] Dr 'Abd al-Razzaq 'Abd al-Majid, the deputy prime minister for financial and economic affairs and planning, has admitted that for three years as planning minister in previous governments he knew nothing about development projects in Egypt.

In remarks he made at his first meetings with the People's Assembly's Planning and Economic Committees, the deputy prime minister said that there is no apparatus for development in Egypt at the present time and that all the figures and statistics that he used to receive about the various projects were wrong and inaccurate.

He went on to say that some $6 billion in foreign loans remain unused, the reason being that the loans were contracted to finance projects that were not listed in the economic and social development plan and therefore remained in abeyance. He said that this has also caused the arrival of equipment for projects which were initiated somewhere between 10 and 16 years ago but which remain unfinished, such as the Al-Mansurah Hospital and the Asyut University Hospital. The equipment has been sitting in boxes for years and has remained there without any local financing.

Dr 'Abd al-Majid said: "The wrong planning policy which has been adopted caused the suspension of many projects. I cite as an example the Al-Fayyum sewage project. The governor of al-Fayyum asked for 4 million pounds this year for the implementation of that project, but the state allocated 50,000 pounds only for the project. The governor has refused to receive that sum of money and the project remains unimplemented as a result."

Dr 'Abd al-Razzaq 'Abd al-Majid also said that he admits all the errors that have been committed in the planning policies of the past few years, on the grounds that ministerial accountability is a joint one. He also admitted the complications which have developed as a result of those errors. He noted that redressing the complications and repercussions was more serious than redressing the problem itself.

The deputy prime minister went on to say that rationalizing the economic course of the country involves more than just shifting the prices of commodities. It also involves the banking system, the public sector and the rationalization of foreign trade. Finding remedies for all those problems, he said, would go a long way toward solving the problem of inflation. The decrease in the size of deficit in the budget does not mean that the problem has been resolved.

He pointed out that there is no apparatus to supervise and oversee the process of disbursement of funds allocated for the development plan. The Investment Bank, he said, would reinstate the confidence that has been lost as a result of channeling funds to purposes other than those specified in the plan and would insure that each project would get its due, nothing more nothing less, and that funds earmarked for a certain project would not be spent on another behind our backs. He said that he would not endorse any check for any project unless the project touches all bases.

The minister referred to projects that have remained unimplemented since the 1960's, citing as examples all the hospitals that had been begun, the faltering pace of building schools and the expiration of the (presumed) durability or age of factories and the need to undertake urgent efforts to rejuvenate and replace those factories. He said that the major reason behind this problem is that projects are tied to specific annual budgets.

SLP CALLS FOR SUSPENSION OF NORMALIZATION WITH ISRAEL

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 17 Jun 80 pp 4, 5

[Article: "Ibrahim Shukri Declares at a Popular Rally in Port Sa'id: Socialism Is the Right Path for Solving the Problems of the Masses."]

[Text] Engineer Ibrahim Shukri, leader of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP), said that the price decreases announced by the government recently have not included basic commodities needed by the people such as fava beans, oil and sugar, and that there is a shortage in many of these necessary commodities. The problem of prices, he said, is not the concern of the National Democratic Party (NDP) alone, but is a problem that concerns us all. The disappearance of commodities from the marketplace pushes their prices up. The correct way to reducing prices, he said, is to follow a real socialist policy, especially since the average income per capita in Egypt is no more than $350. The SLP leader was speaking at a popular rally sponsored by the party in Port Sa'id Thursday evening.

Engineer Ibrahim Shukri wondered how an Egyptian whose annual average income is so small can afford to secure his necessities while prices are constantly rising. He explained that socialism would define the most important problems from which the masses suffer and draw up a scientific plan to solve those problems with our own efforts.

He said that the SLP is prepared to support the NDP if it drew up such a plan, but although the ruling party calls its philosophy a socialist democratic philosophy, its conduct is not in accord with socialism.

An Opposition Party

The SLP leader referred to claims that the SLP emerged because the ruling party wanted to set up a new opposition party, and said that the SLP was established because there are men in Egypt who believe in democracy not in single opinions. When President al-Sadat called for a new party which he would lead instead of the Egypt Arab Socialist Party, I wanted to do something that others may refrain from doing. I said to myself that Mamduh Salim, the former leader of the Egypt party, is a man who did not have a major political history before the corrective revolution, and yet his party attracted so many people. So when a man like President Anwar al-Sadat, the leader of the corrective revolution and the crossing [that is the 1973 war when Egyptian forces crossed the Suez Canal] and a man who has had a notable history before and after the [1952] revolution, calls for the establishment of the NDP, how can there be a chance for democracy then? The overwhelming majority of the people would join his party and there would be no other opinion to correct mistakes and offer options, especially given the kind of things that were being said about the opposition parties that existed at that time. The Neo-Wafd party was described as a party that wanted to push history back and the National Grouping Party was described as suspect opposition.

Guided by my conscience and out of a conviction that I am part of this people, I stepped up to form the SLP. I knew very well that I would not be accused of a desire to push the revolution backwards, for I have taken part in paving the way for the revolution. The Socialist Party's newspaper is the biggest witness to our struggle against the monarchy and colonialism. When the revolution broke out, I was incarcerated in the Cairo Prison on charges of slandering the person of the king. After the revolution I was always one of the defenders of democracy and the people's freedom. From the very first minute of the corrective revolution, I supported it because I was in favor of democracy.

In the light of all that, I decided to call for the formation of a new party. There were, however, legal obstacles over which I had no control. The law stipulated that 20 members of the People's Assembly should agree to be members of the party before the party can be legally sanctioned. This legal obstacle did not prevent me from continuing to realize all those things that I believe in. I told myself that all political parties were dissolved after the revolution under the pretext that they have corrupted political life in the country. But a popular referendum excluded the National Party and the Socialist Party from that corruption.

Without getting into any comments on referendums, the referendum legally annulled the previous decision to abolish the Socialist Party in 1953. At any rate, I proceeded with God's blessings and the support of sincere men, to form the SLP. In the process we were gratefully surprised by President al-Sadat's decision to ask the NDP members of the People's Assembly to sign the declaration documents required by the political parties' law. But, for the record, the SLP did not depend on that declaration to apply to the Arab Socialist Union. We waited for a number of days until enough members of the People's Assembly joined us so as to meet the legal requirements for the formation of the party. As soon as we had enough members of the People's Assembly to meet the legal requirements, we applied to the parties committee at the Socialist Union. The documents we submitted were those signed by 20 members of the Assembly, not those signed by hundreds of other members who deserve our gratitude for seeking with President al-Sadat to help proclaim the SLP.

A Statement of Account

Despite all those efforts by men who are concerned with democracy in our country, rumors continued to say that the SLP was formed to put an end to the other opposition. Those who knew me and know my career are fully aware that I can never be used as a bludgeon to put an end to the other opposition.

Now, nearly two years after our initiation, we say that, through speaking out freely and honestly at the People's Assembly and on the pages of AL-SHA'B, we have exercised objective opposition which defends the people's interests. We are not afraid of expressing opposition if what we say is in keeping with our principles and program.

Engineer Ibrahim Shukri noted that "there are many examples to sustain that. Immediately following our establishment, we opposed the donation of 16,000 pounds by the General Union of Land Transportation to the NDP because such a donation is in violation of the parties' law. We were not worried that someone would say that such a measure was an unfriendly gesture toward the ruling party, for the law is the law. This is how we understand democracy.

From that time on we spoke out against any action that was not in accord with the homeland's interests. We criticized reports in OCTOBER that Egypt would be sending Nile waters to Jerusalem. I spoke about this subject at the People's Assembly and pointed out the serious repercussions of such a measure on our relations with the African states. We hear nowadays of an Ethiopian memo about the question of how the Nile waters should be used. Although the memo does not mention Egypt by name, it is clearly directed at us, and this has prompted the minister of irrigation to make a statement at the People's Assembly reaffirming Egypt's right to use the waters of the Nile. We could have done without such a statement if only we pay attention in our actions to national issues."

"Furthermore," engineer Shukri went on, "the SLP criticized the Egyptian government's statements on sisterly Sudan. It is not proper for us to say: if the Sudan wants to sever its relations with us, then let it do so. I have reaffirmed in the People's Assembly that Egypt and the Sudan are one country and that the future of Egypt's food security is interwoven with our relations and cooperation with the Sudan. All scientific estimates show that we cannot meet our food needs no matter how much we increase our agricultural production. We import 40 percent of our food needs and 70 percent of the wheat we need. Our own wheat production can only sustain us for three and a half months. We may be getting food products from the United States, but we have to remember that those food deliveries are meant to hitch us to the United States. We have to remember that when the United States wanted to punish the Soviet Union following the Afghanistan developments, it embargoed wheat shipments to it. So food products, especially wheat, have become a weapon in the hands of the food producing countries in the field of international relations."

The SLP leader added that "if the independence of our national will is really the goal of the ruling party, as its slogan indicates, then we should rely on our own production and on cooperation with the Sudan and the other Arab countries. It would be improper for anyone to say in reply that our view is at variance with the country's national policy. The SLP understands national policy as one seeking to promote the interests of this country. In accordance with this concept and understanding, our party demands that our ambassador be immediately recalled from Israel, that the Israeli ambassador be expelled from Cairo and that the process of normalization between us and Israel be suspended. Our party also demands that the Egyptian peace negotiators not go to Washington to discuss the suspension of the autonomy talks. Israel is still refusing to implement the second part of the peace treaty and to grant autonomy to the brotherly Palestinian people. It is still waging a battle of elimination against the Palestinian leaders in the West Bank and Gaza, building settlements on Arab lands and issuing laws claiming that Jerusalem is the capital of Israel. It is doing all this to further rip apart the unity of Arab ranks, which was responsible for the great October victory, and to further isolate Egypt, the largest Arab country, from the rest of the Arab nation, because it knows that Egypt is to the Arab nation what the head is to the rest of the body, that Egypt's defeat spells defeat for all Arabs and its victory means victory for all Arabs.

Therefore, the SLP, which advocates in its program the establishment of the United Arab States, affirms that we cannot base our national policy on a permanent quarrel with the Arab nation and individual Arab governments, and that we have to look for a way to repair damaged inter-Arab relations and dress our wounds, lest Israel realize in peace what it has failed to realize in war.

The leader of the SLP concluded his speech by saying that the SLP will continue to represent the conscience of this nation truthfully and honestly regardless of the difficulties.

The popular rally in Port Sa'id had started with a recital from the Koran. Then engineer Ibrahim Shukri and the delegation accompanying him greeted Nabil 'Abd al-Latif, the rapporteur of the SLP's Information Committee in Port Sa'id, lawyer Ahmad Husayn, member of the Higher Committee and Fu'ad Hidiyyah, secretary of the SLP in the governorate.

Artist Hamdi Ahmad, member of the SLP's Higher Committee and Parliamentarian Committee, then spoke about the role of art in serving the issues and problems of the masses. He criticized the foreign television serials which are showing in Egypt nowadays such as The Green Man and the Six Million Dollar Man. He said that such programs distort the thinking of our children and bring violence into our homes, whereas the message of art is to enlighten people and give them a sense of security and comfort.

Artist Hamdi Ahmad gave an objective analysis of art and politics and how they both should involve truthfulness, integrity and purity. True art, he said, should be virtuous and upright, and so should the honest politician.

Stop Normalization

The floor was then given to Rif'at al-Shahawi, secretary general of the SLP, who demanded that the Egyptian government expel the Israeli ambassador from Cairo and stop the normalization process so that Israel may understand that we will not allow it to persist in its procrastination and deception with regards to the rights of the Palestinian people. He then said that the SLP was established to deepen the concepts of freedom and democracy in Egypt and defend the interests of the broad masses of the people, and that the party's struggle is dedicated to the sole purpose of serving the people.

The SLP secretary general reviewed the career and struggle of engineer Ibrahim Shukri. He said that President al-Sadat once said of engineer Shukri that he is a man who has earned the medal which we all covet, namely, the wound which he received from a bullet during the 1935 demonstrations in favor of democracy and a constitution. He thus gave of his blood to Egypt and is today resuming his march. Al-Shahawi said that we are exercising democracy for the sake of the Egyptian people and that we oppose anything that is against our views and party program and against the interests of our homeland and the Arab nation.

PRIVILEGES GIVEN TO FOREIGN INVESTMENTS ATTACKED

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 17 Jun 80 pp 8, 9

[Article: "Economic Study Warns: Egypt Will Revert to Financial and Industrial Feudalism; Exemptions Given to Foreign Investments Destroy National Projects and Create New Centers of Power and Influence"]

[Text] The present Investment Law will create in Egypt a kind of financial and industrial feudalism which will be no less harmful and dangerous than agricultural feudalism. This warning was sounded by a scientific study conducted by Dr Muhammad 'Ali Rif'at, the former secretary general of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization.

The study shows that Investment Law No 43 for 1974 as amended by Law No 32 for 1977 is based on the principle of "exemption" which only benefits foreign capital. According to that law, foreign capital is exempted from Egyptian public laws. Despite all those exemptions, investors are not satisfied and demand more concessions because they know that they will get what they want as long as the country's options are limited and demand for foreign investments is growing. The study cautions against the serious danger which threatens national projects as a result of this, especially if the government continues to ignore dealing correctly with this anomalous situation.

The major consequences of this situation can be summed up as follows:

1. Blatant discrimination between privileged and unprivileged projects operating in the same field which would eliminate competition among them and cause the deterioration of unprivileged projects which make up the bulk of the national economy, in the face of unfair competition. The losses which would be caused by such a situation cannot be recouped by the profits and gains expected to accrue from investment projects. This, in addition to the emergence of groups of profit-seekers--adventurers, brokers and agents--who will try to make quick profits by all legitimate and illegitimate means in the shadow of a law that is solely based on exemptions. Moreover, we will see talents and skills being snatched by foreign investments, especially rare and unusual skills. Privileged investment concerns have been known to tempt production workers with high salaries, thus adversely affecting the efficiency of the public sector because it is difficult to replace such talents and expertise.

2. Limited-term material concessions and privileges tempt investors, especially foreign investors, to favor quick-profit projects so that they can recover all their investment before the end of the concession period and return with their profits to their respective countries. In fact, those limited-term material privileges could have more serious consequences if the projects fold after the end of the concession period.

3. Privileged treatment tempts those responsible for privileged projects to squander resources and pay little attention to cost factors. This might lead to the emergence of high-cost industries that would be unable to compete in foreign markets.

4. The excessive reliance of privileged projects on loans to meet investment costs at the rate of 45 percent would overly burden these projects and seriously affect their future in view of the astronomical level of interest costs.

5. Discrimination in treatment on the basis of legal provisions often leads to deviation and corruption and encourages the emergence of financial and economic centers of power and influence.

6. Concentration on negative measures through exceptional treatment in addition to a fascination with privileged projects lead to laxity in searching for alternative positive measures.

7. Discrimination in treatment in the field of investment creates economic dualism which is one of the most serious and damaging maladies that can afflict the national economy, because such discrimination was the royal door to economic dualism whereby [line dropped]. The establishment of economic sectors or projects which become exclusively theirs, leaves for the helpless citizens backward traditional sectors whose remnants still plague the economies of developing countries. Economic experts rightly consider these to be the mark of economic backwardness.

The study calls back to mind the long suffering of Egypt when foreign capital controlled its economy for generations under the system of privileges for foreigners. The study expresses amazement that someone would contend that the law endorsing all such exemptions embodies a general policy laid down by the state. Is it logical, the study wonders, that a host of exemptions from public laws be an expression or a part of a public policy?

What is worse is that such a policy is meant to represent an economic open door policy, since an open door policy would not normally promote and uphold special exemptions, and that the allegation is made by the government apparatus which is entrusted with the implementation of the investment law.

They Laughed at Us and Said It's an Economic Open Door

The study emphasizes that neither Law No 43 of 1974 as amended by Law No 32 of 1977 nor any law preceding them contains the words "open door." If anything, the term "open door," in the context of the contemporary Egyptian state of affairs, means a transition from one condition to another--from artificial obstacles to the disappearance of those obstacles and the return of public confidence in the laws which regulate economic projects.

Open Policy Innocent of Investment Projects

The study concludes that projects which emerge as a result of the investment law forfeit their claim to being part of the economic open door policy, in content and application. To demonstrate the veracity of its conclusions, the study reviews the report put out by the Investment Authority, which claims tutelage over the open door policy, about its achievements and the projects which it had approved since its establishment in 1971 and until 31 December 1978.

The report says: The number of projects at home approved by the Investment Authority was 591 projects with a total capital of 1,664 million pounds, 41 percent in local currency, 59 percent in foreign currency, while investment costs for all those projects was 3,045 million pounds.

The study points out that the report did not make it clear whether the foreign capital was actually received and investment expenditure has actually occurred, nor was it clear about the basis on which the exchange of foreign currency with Egyptian pounds was made.

Investment Breeds Banks

The study sheds more light on some aspects of the Investment Authority's report, saying that the most important part of the report was the one which dealt with the value of real production realized by the privileged projects which have begun production. The study says that the report cites extremely amazing statistics on production in 19 sectors, led by the banking sector with 78 percent of the total production of all projects. Behind it came the sector of professional industries (6 percent), tourism (4 percent), chemical industries (4 percent) and housing (2 percent).

The study says: The amazing thing in this official report is that the activities of the banks benefiting from the Investment Law added to the GNP 940 million pounds, or 78 percent of the output of all the investment projects. If these illogical figures are true, then there should have been as much efforts as possible to increase that strange banking activity.

The study wonders how can one interpret the statistics mentioned in the report, namely, that 21 banking projects which have begun operating or are about to do so, have had a total investment expenditure of 112 million pounds while their real production amounted to 930 million pounds, that is about seven times as much as its total capital. What makes it more amazing, the study goes on, is that the new banks, either the exclusively foreign banks or the joint banks all of which have found a good and stable grazing grounds in Egypt, have invested only a fraction of their new huge assets in new Egyptian projects. It is a well known fact that most of those banks invest the greater part of their assets in financial markets abroad which do not benefit Egypt in any way, not even in taxes on profits. Why then, the study asks, are those banks exempted from all kinds of taxes and in whose interest is this being done?

The Investment Authority's Report

The study says that the data and statements contained in the report of the Investment Authority are not enough to draw reliable conclusions with regard to the accomplishments of the investment projects, especially the performance of the authority entrusted with the implementation of the Investment Law.

The study expresses amazement about the report's contention that the Investment Authority is the apparatus which is responsible for the implementation of the economic open door policy, although the authority was established in 1971, the open door policy was officially endorsed in the referendum which took place on 15 May 1974 to vote on the October Paper and the Investment Law was issued in June 1974 without a single reference to the open door policy.

The study emphasizes that the problem of foreign investments cannot be detached from the environment and climate of national investments because such a detachment would involve serious dangers.

The study comes to the conclusion that the question of foreign investments is a question of climate and that national investments share the ups and downs of that climate. Also, the practical value of foreign and national investments depends on the degree of stability they enjoy which would convince savers and investors alike that their interests are safe.

The climate should also be healthy, allowing movement toward economic development and advancement. Indeed, the term investment in modern societies is now synonymous with the development of production activities through the use of technology which requires large investments.

The study also stressed that a proper and healthy climate should be accompanied by an atmosphere of stability. This principally requires a rational social and economic policy and a capable economic management. These two elements provide the right indicator which would tell us about the future of foreign investments in Egypt, in particular, and the Egyptian economy, in general. The study says that this cannot come about unless we adhered to the correct concept of the economic open door policy. In accordance with such a concept, the economic situation in Egypt would be treated through liberating the means of productive activities from fetters, restrictions and obstructions. When this is done, a serious investor--foreign or national --would not need special privileges.

HOUSING PROBLEMS ANALYZED, REMEDIAL MEASURES PROPOSED

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 17 Jun 80 pp 10, 11

[Article by Engineer Muhammad Hasan Durrah: "A Study on the Housing Issue; Egypt's Area Is Vast and Yet a Crisis Exists in Building Lands"]

[Text] A million or about a million square kilometers--this has been the size of Egypt for thousands of years. It has not increased or decreased. A single thin green strip along the Nile--the Nile valley and the delta--accounting for one percent of the total area is the only area that has been exploited for thousands of years.

From a few million people, the population has soared to more than 40 million. It has been a huge explosion occurring in a few years and months. Indeed, it is occurring every second. All you have to do, to quote a favorite advertisement phrase, is look around you. Is it not a difficult and bitter formula by any standard?

Once again we take a look at one aspect of Egypt's national question, or actually the core issue in Egypt, namely, the question of housing. This time we look at it through research and study in order to devise, through sound planning, immediate implementation and careful followup, a solution which would eradicate the problem entirely. A temporary palliative would not eliminate the crisis, or silence the voices that are talking about it. Nor will the problem be solved by statements that are made for local consumption. Several recommendations have been made and several views have been expressed. Plans have been drawn up on paper and have earned their share--actually, more than their share--of discussion and debate. But they fade away soon enough and remain confined to files for years and years--mere ink on paper. While these plans remain locked up in desks and files, problems deteriorate, voices rise in anger or agony, and controversy and debate re-emerge. And after this storm subsides, things return to where they were before--mere ink on paper.

Change, movement and reform in our country are unavoidable. The problem, however, is that they are moving too slowly, that the age is pressing on at great, viciously crushing speed while we are poorly equipped or unable to cope and catch up with it. The alarm signals are flashing and screaming all around us and all we do is respond with the speed of a turtle. We turn our full attention to the symptoms and manifestations of a disease but ignore the genesis of that disease and yet think that we have cured the malady.

This is the problem of our country--more precisely, this is the problem of most of the countries of the Third World.

Back to Our Problem: The Housing Plight

Next to financing, which is the propulsive power behind housing projects, one of the most serious elements of the housing crisis has to do with lands which are unsuitable for building and are equipped with the necessary services and utilities. We cannot, of course, build a housing unit while ignoring water lines or the sources of water, healthy drainage and work and services opportunities for the inhabitants, as human beings who are in need of all those amenities.

As the prime minister said in this regard: "Hope is pinned on the building of new towns and the establishment of new communities for the solution of the problem of coming up with the necessary lands for the housing plan." I have reviewed the comprehensive statement delivered by the minister of housing at the People's Assembly on 7 February, 1976, that is more than four years ago, in which he dealt with all the problems of housing, including financing, utilities, employment, construction, building materials, availability of lands, the syndrome of speculation in land prices and housing laws designed to encourage the private sector and push forward work on building new towns. The minister said that the planning of some of these towns was begun in January 1975 and he mentioned other matters. If these matters were faithfully and carefully implemented in their time, we would not have reached the situation in which we find ourselves.

We regretfully repeat what we have said before, namely, that words and deeds are two different things.

The 20-Year National Plan

In that part of the report of the National Housing Commission (NHC) which pertains to the questions of lands and new townships, we find that the land needs of the plan over the next 20 years, that is until the year 2000, amount to 144,000 feddans which can accommodate 3.6 million housing units. This is what is specified in the plan, as we have pointed out in the preceding part of this study. These lands have to be made available from the following resources:

1. Neglected lands within the urban areas in the governorates.

2. The urban extensions around the major cities.

3. The new townships and communities.

Actually, an area of about 38,000 feddans, or 26 percent of the required total area, was found within the framework of the existing cities and around those cities. As for the 9 new cities which have been approved, namely, 10 Ramadan, 15 May, Al-Sadat, Al-'Amiriyyah, 6 October, Al-Amal, Al-'Ubur and two other cities within the framework of greater Cairo, the total area of those cities amounts to about 28,000 feddans, that is about 19 percent of the land required by the plan. Thus, the total area of lands which have been found by the state came to about 66,000 feddans, or about 45 percent of the total required area. This area can accommodate 1.6 million housing units only. That is to say that the rest of the plan, namely, the construction of some two million housing units, requires about 78,000 feddans which must be found in areas that are being built up outside the Nile valley. These areas have to be found to accommodate new townships and communities which have to be equipped with utilities immediately throughout the length and width of Egypt.

If we bear in mind that the expected increase in population by the year 2000 will be nearly 24 million people, and that the present cities and towns are already incapable of absorbing more than 6 million persons, it means that the new cities and communities which have to be built must be able to accommodate at least 18 million people until the year 2000. This is the only way to solve the housing problem. The prime minister referred to this serious matter in September of 1979.

We know that the first five-year plan, 1981-85, requires 27,000 feddans. Of these, only 18,000 feddans were made available within the present cities, the new suburbs and the new cities and townships. It is thus necessary to provide immediately 9,000 extra feddans in open lands within the urban framework in the governorates and around the cities. It is also necessary to press on with work in the new cities to absorb larger ratios of the population.

Expected Confrontation Between Housing and Development Ministries

After having studied the situation and inspected the progress of work in the areas located within the around the cities, which constitute 26 percent, and the new, announced cities, which constitute 19 percent of the required surface land, we discover that the plan to provide these areas with utilities and services, which is a vital and difficult phase which requires many years has not been implemented on the required level. Actual implementation has actually begun in only three cities:

1. The 10 Ramadan city, along the Cairo-Alexandria road, whose potentialities depend on industry and agriculture. Work has already begun on this city more than three years ago and it has gone some ways. But there are still no large factories and plants which can absorb the working force which is the nucleus of this city and the core of its productive capacity. True, the city has several small plants, but we notice that the large factories still prefer to be situated along the northern and southern approaches to Cairo, which adds to the congestion in the capital.

2. The 15 May city in Hilwan. Work on this city is proceeding at a pace which is proportionate to the small and limited funds allocated for it. Perhaps the greatest justification for the building of this city is that it is designed to serve the workers in the present industrial city of Hilwan.

Some of the obstacles include the imbalance between the incomes of workers and the rents of the housing units.

3. The al-Sadat city. This city primarily depends on industry and modern advanced agriculture. It is situated near the Cairo-Alexandria desert road. Work on the city began in 1978 when some roads and administrative buildings were built, wells were sunk and utilities were begun, but the means of industry have not been established there yet. We are not sure whether this year's allocations will permit work to begin on public buildings and housing alongside factories.

All those new cities, as well as the areas established in present cities and the new suburbs surrounding them, lack the necessary plans to provide them with new utilities or at least to renew the old and exhausted utilities in the great cities.

As for the city for al-'Amiriyah, which is located along the Cairo-Alexandria road, it also depends on industry and agriculture and has the elements of an independent city quite separate from Alexandria. Work has not begun of that city yet, with the exception of the building of some roads leading to the city. Funds are being raised to spend on providing the city with utilities. Factories to be built in Alexandria are supposed to be catering to this new city so that it may get its share of development. As for the other cities, they have been merely planned on the ground, nothing more.

Huge Projects and Limited Allocations

The fact which emerges from the way in which work has been proceeding in the new cities, as we have shown, is that the national housing plan cannot be met. This is not due to negligence or laxity on the part of the ministry of development and new communities but due to the lack of adequate allocations for those planned cities, in addition to the lack of coordination on the question of building and establishing the means and bases of industries in those cities.

What is peculiar is that the sum of 32 million pounds was allocated in the 1980 budget under the heading of new cities and communities although the plan aims at the implementation of huge projects which cost some 156 million pounds. Can there be anything more inadequate than that? Even more peculiarly, the sum of 32 million pounds, after deductions pertaining to chapters one and two and various facilities, has dwindled to about only 8 million pounds of local currency which would be spent on various aspects of development in the new cities. Would such a miniscule sum of money bring about any aspect of the ambitious plan of the ministry of development and new communities? Therein lies the seriousness and truth of the situation.

How then can we solve this variable formula for the cities--a formula which involves a difference of at least 200 million pounds? As we take another look at the sums of money earmarked for the establishment of utilities in all the new cities, we wonder in whose interest we are laughing at ourselves and taking lightly questions and matters which are most serious.

As a result of the lack of new lands equipped with utilities, officials were forced to issue instructions ordering the erection of additional floors on present buildings and permitting the exhaustion of open lands in important areas. Buildings were raised from 20 to 45 floors, in violation of the housing law. This excess overtaxes the water, drainage, health and electric utilities. This, in addition to several other transgressions, such as the encroachment of new buildings on agricultural lands adjacent to cities in a haphazard manner which led to the exhaustion of present utilities and sent land prices to fantastic heights. Can one imagine that the price of land per meter in Imbabah, Bulaq al-Dakrur or (Al-Alwiyah al-Hamra') rose from one or two pounds 15 years ago to one hundred or two hundred pounds at present. The same situation exists in the rest of the governorates. Land prices have increased in the same ratio due to the decrease in land supply and an enormous demand for land because of the slowness of planning which should have been implemented some 30 years ago at least.

The Proposed Cure

The recoup some of what we have missed and to cope with our housing plans, we must necessarily invite international establishments of expertise and know-how which are specialized in the construction of cities to join Egyptian consultation bureaus which specialize in planning to set forth a new planning concept for the new cities and communities which would be in accord with the 20-year national plan.

The following steps are also needed:

1. All funding efforts should be consolidated. Egyptian, Arab and foreign capitals should be involved in the plan, and concessions should be given to world companies and Egyptian and foreign investors who are specialized in this field in order to build new cities and communities, as we have seen happening in the Cairo area. The government became a partner with a certain percentage in return for providing the necessary lands.

2. Pushing forward the work now going on in the new cities with the knowledge of the government, by providing the necessary large allocations, provided that factories required for the industrial cities be established. This could be done by means of selling lands to companies and coops which are able to undertake immediate construction, in addition to willing individuals. The revenue from all this would be used to support the allocations for such work.

3. Expanding renewal projects by means of demolishing the old decrepit areas in cities and re-utilizing them in a better economic fashion.

4. Transferring buildings occupying and housing military activities and training facilities which are located within the urban bloc in the Nasr city, Masr al-Jadidah and elsewhere to desert areas and re-inhabiting and re-utilizing them after planning them anew and providing them with the necessary utilities.

5. Abstaining from establishing more factories in Cairo and the major cities and to obligate those interested in setting up such factories to do so in the new cities.

6. Encouraging collective professional migration for young Egyptians so as to develop the new communities, especially those in the remote and desert areas, and to enjoy the fruits of the land.

7. Showing an interest in developing a concept of the regional planning required for the first 50 years of the 21st century so as to create new areas that would attract people.

In this regard, we have learned that one of our specialists in city planning has presented a detailed study on this problem to the higher authorities. He is Dr Ahmad Mukhtar, professor of planning at al-Azhar University's college of engineering and a former dean of the college and a member of the Higher National Committee for Housing. I appeal to the competent authorities to turn over such studies to the National Housing Commission (NHC) which should be in a state of continuous session so that important issues pertaining to housing may be referred to it.

8. Conducting a study, for long-term implementation, of the locations of cemeteries in the major cities, similar to the study which was the basis of the decision to move the cemeteries of Bab al-Nasr to desert areas removed from populated areas. This would make available vital lands for housing while also avoiding the effects of the presence of such cemeteries amidst densely populated areas.

9. Establishing government office complexes in the new suburbs after remapping and re-planning those areas so as to vacate the buildings used by government agencies which are scattered in various locations, on the one hand, and to make it easier for citizens to conduct their business in complexes located in the same place.

Can this approach enable us to save the situation and make up for the drawbacks and shortcomings of the past? More important, we should pose our usual question once again: Are we really serious in our intention to deal with the housing problem in our country?

This is a matter that is open for discussion by the public and our specialized scientists. It is part of the overall problem of housing which should be constantly debated.

In a future edition, God willing, we will examine the nerve center of the problem--financing.

May God guide us to the well-being and prosperity of beloved Egypt. God is the grantor of success.

SLP VIEWS ON ELECTION SYSTEM, PRESS SYNDICATE, AUTONOMY TALKS

[Article: "Important Political Decisions by the Higher Committee of the Socialist Labor Party: Boycott of Consultative Council Elections and Complete Support for Maintaining the Press Syndicate and Freedom of the Press"]

[Text] The Higher Committee of the SLP has issued a number of important resolutions at the meeting it held under party leader Ibrahim Shukri on the afternoon of 17 June. The agenda included the following points:

1. The party's position on the Consultative Council's elections.

2. The party's position on the status of the Egyptian press and the press syndicate.

3. The party's views on the Egyptian-Israeli negotiations.

The party leader and a number of the parliamentarian members of the party presented a summary of the deliberations which took place at the People's Assembly's session earlier in the day to debate the Consultative Council bill. They also summarized the objections made by representatives of the SLP to the bill and to the election system by party ticket which was proposed by the National Democratic Party (NDP). The NDP insisted on this system without regard to proportional representation. This would insure that the NDP would have all the seats on the State Council.

Most members of the Higher Committee criticized this distortion of the system of election by party ticket, which is followed in some democratic countries where seats are distributed in proportion to the votes received by any one party. That system would enhance the multi-party system, while the method proposed by the NDP would reassert something akin to the one-party system by insisting that the ticket which receives a majority of 50 percent plus one, would win all the seats.

Members of the Higher Committee agreed that it was important to issue a statement in the name of the party to show why the party would boycott the elections for the Consultative Council.

Conditions of the Egyptian Press

Discussions then shifted to the conditions of the Egyptian press. The conferres insisted on the need to maintain the press syndicate, and stressed the need to support it, grant it all the jurisdictions to which it is entitled in the regulations, protect journalists and secure press freedom.

The Higher Committee said that it adheres to that part of the SLP platform which said that there can be no tutelage over the press and the press syndicate by any authority or by the Higher Press Council whose establishment is opposed by the SLP.

The conferees also underlined the importance of turning the ownership of national newspapers to the people by turning them into joint-stock companies whose ownership would be shared by the public and those working in newspaper houses and the press syndicate within certain bounds and percentages which would prevent any one group from controlling the national press.

The Higher Council feels that the abolition of the Socialist Union in accordance with constitutional amendments is an opportunity to liberate the Egyptian press and that the Consultative Council or the Higher Council of the Press should replace the Socialist Union in controlling the destinies of the Egyptian press.

The Higher Committee decided to issue a statement on the conditions of the Egyptian press which would express the party's support of the principle of keeping and maintaining the press syndicate and safeguarding the freedom of the press.

Negotiations with Israel

The SLP Higher Committee discussed the faltering Egyptian-Israeli negotiations on autonomy for the Palestinians. It expressed the SLP's reservations over the Camp David accords and the Egyptian-Israeli treaty and said that positive steps should be taken to confront the intransigent Israeli policy and the Zionist terrorism in the West Bank and southern Lebanon.

The SLP's Arab Affairs and Foreign Relations Committee will hold an urgent meeting to prepare a study on the party's position in this regard.

Forthcoming Meeting

The SLP Higher Committee will resume its meetings on 30 June at the SLP headquarters.

SLP DECIDES TO BOYCOTT CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL ELECTIONS

[Statement by Ibrahim Shukri, Leader of the Socialist Labor Party: "The SLP Decides Not to Participate in the Consultative Council Elections"]

[Text] Great people of Egypt, the SLP came into being to reaffirm democracy and cement the multi-party system, thereby contributing to the abolition of one-party rule and the totalitarian system, so that all citizens may participate in constructing the political edifice of our great Egypt.

In the program it proclaimed on 12 October 1978, the SLP recorded the following:

The multi-party system is a safeguard against the dictatorship of the individual or the single political organization. Restrictions imposed on the formation of parties should be abolished, leaving it for the people alone to oversee these parties. No quarter should be permitted to impose tutelage over them, and if they were to deviate from the democratic, constitutional path, then they should be liable before the civil law.

Parliamentary opposition is a safeguard. Legislative provisions which guarantee the right of the opposition to express its views on all matters, especially matters of national importance; enable it to carry out its role; and protect it from pressure and aggression should be drawn up and set forth.

1. Out of its belief that free and honest elections are one of the basic components of democracy, the SLP participated in the People's Assembly elections of June 1979, only a few months after its inception officially.

Despite the transgressions which took place in the People's Assembly elections and the interferences made by officials to insure the success of the ruling party's candidate, the 176 SLP candidates who participated in the elections worked hard and campaigned energetically. The people supported them remarkably. They were thus able to receive about 30 percent of the total vote--about the same percentage received by the ruling party's candidates who took over the majority of seats in the People's Assembly, after a number of independent candidates and SLP candidates went over to the ruling party. Despite this, 30 members of the People's Council continued to lead the opposition members. They committed themselves to the principle of being the other view, to objective solutions for the problems of the masses, and to monitoring the executive branch within the means available to them.

2. Furthermore, the SLP agreed to participate in the elections of the local people's councils, despite the fact that a large number of SLP members expressed the desire to boycott those elections in protest against what had occurred in the People's Assembly elections.

3. Out of a belief that the SLP should participate in all political activities, especially those of going into the street and fusing with the masses to defend their interests and present the party program to them, the SLP began to consider the idea of participating in the elections for the Consultative Council despite all our reservations about the manner in which the elections would be held.

Despite difficulties which deprive political parties of equitable opportunities to wage the elections battle, the SLP Higher Committee and its parliamentarian representatives held a series of meetings to discuss the question of participation in the Consultative Council's elections.

The party began to examine an electoral procedure based on a party ticket coupled with proportional representation to insure that the votes of electors are not wasted in vain, because a large number of candidates lost by a very thin margin. Actually, the loss was by a few voices which went to the winning candidate who may be representing 51 percent of the voters without regard to the 49 percent who did not vote for him.

The study showed that conduting the elections on the basis of party tickets and proportional representation would give each political party entering the elections an opportunity to win a number of seats proportionally equal to the percentage of votes received by the party. This would insure that any one party would not command an overwhelming majority after winning only 51 percent of the votes.

The NDP decided, however, to stick by its belief that the Consultative Council's elections should be conducted according to a system which was innovated by the NCP and never before applied in any state. The NDP insisted that the elections be conducted on the basis of party tickets but without proportional representation, so that a ticket which receives 51 percent of the votes would win in its entirety while a party receiving 49 percent of the vote would not be represented. Indeed, the NDP imposed a further restriction which provides that a party that does not receive 5 percent of the total votes in the governorates of the Egyptian Arab Republic would not win any seats in the Consultative Council even if one of its tickets won in a certain governorate. This is unprecedented in any democratic country.

4. The SLP records that the government which will conduct the elections is a partisan government formed by the NDP and that NDP ministers control the machinery which will run and oversee the elections. This, is in addition to the fact that all the regional governors in Egypt belong to the ruling party.

5. The SLP also records that the NDP government controls all the information media although the law specifies that the national press should be owned by the people and that political parties should be entitled to express their views and positions on the radio and television, especially during elections.

6. The SLP repeats its position that the NDP has exclusively taken over all the premises that belonged to the Arab Socialist Union (ASU) which was abolished by the recent constitutional amendments. It was normally expected that the various offices and premises of the ASU would be redistributed among the political parties in a fair and equitable manner so that the parties would have places and forums to hold meetings, practice political activities, meet with citizens and hold debates and panels between party candidates and voters.

The SLP also records that constitutional amendments involving Article 194 to 205 of the constitution which created the Consultative Council had defined the council as "an advisory council of the Egyptian family, expressing the views of all groups and organizations of the people on public issues."

It is clear from the statements which accompanied the emergence of the idea of the Consultative Council that the council was meant to be established on bases that differ completely from those of the People's Assembly. In that sense, it would be closer to the concept developed by some socialist systems (professional socialism) which provides that various groups can be best represented through elections within those groups. Therefore, the SLP was surprised when the bill pertaining to the proposed Consultative Council was couched in completely different terms which would not fulfill the objective prescribed by the constitutional amendment, namely, that the Consultative Council would be a representative of the Egyptian family, expressing the views of all groups and organizations of the people.

7. In view of all those impediments which might lead to the exclusive control of the Consultative Council by the NDP by shutting out the other political parties, the SLP cautions that such an action might drive citizens to despair of the success of the nascent democratic experiment and might lead to the reemergence of one-party dominance with all its tragedies, encroachments and dangers to constitutional life.

8. Accordingly, the SLP most regretfully announces that it is compelled to boycott the Consultative Council elections.

God is great. Long live the people.

[Signed] Ibrahim Shukri, Leader of the SLP.

NPUG DECIDES TO BOYCOTT CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL ELECTIONS

Cairo AL-SHA'B in Arabic 24 Jun 80 p 4

[Article: "The National Progressive Unionist Grouping Party Decides Not to Participate in the Consultative Council Elections"]

[Text] The NPUG has issued a statement in which it announced that it will not participate in the elections for the Consultative Council. The statement included the following:

The meaning of election by party ticket without proportional representation and the additional proviso that for a party to be represented in the council it should receive 50 percent of votes in all of Egypt, is that the ticket of the ruling party will win in its entirety and that no other party will be able to slip into the council, unless the ruling party condescends to allow it to do so. The upshot is that the Consultative Council will be a new kind of one-party dictatorship.

To this should be added the fact that the ruling party has ignored the rejection by the masses of the so-called Consultative Council and of the nature of that council which makes it indistinguishable from a parliamentary council, a trade union or even a charity. For the council has no decision-making role or a role of serving the masses and defending their rights, nor does it have any ties to the masses.

To this should also be added the fact that masses have been boycotting general plebiscites and elections, especially after the bitter experience of the 1979 People's Assembly elections which were marked by a glaring falsification of the will of the masses.

There is also the fact that repressive measures have been in ascendence and that there is an increasing tendency to suppress any opinion that does not agree with the opinions of the rulers, in addition to the fact that all the media--the printing press, radio and television--are controlled by the machinery and authorities of the ruling party.

If we add up all the preceding points, it becomes obvious that the NPUG's decision not to participate in the Consultative Council elections is a realistic necessity affirming the soundness of the principled position of the party, especially since the regime is seeking, through the elections whose results are determined in advance, to obtain a false popular mandate that would reaffirm its claims, which are believed by no one, that it enjoys an overwhelming majority and popularity.

Our party cannot agree to participate in giving the regime this cover, which it needs to show to its allies and to justify the continuation of its policies, which are rejected by the people of Egypt.

VIEWS ON HOUSING PROBLEM APPEARING IN THE PRESS SUMMARIZED

[Article by Engineer Muhammad Hasan Durrah: "A Study of Press Headlines and Inquiries into the Population Problem: A New City for One Million Citizens Every Year Is Impossible"]

[Text] I apologize to the readers who are following the series of my study of the various components of the housing and population problem in Egypt, because I have to postpone my discussion for a few weeks. But I will stay with the population problem in this article, for the population problem is always on our minds. In view of the profusion of inquiries and sensational comments which have been appearing in the press lately, and which usually increase in tempo when cabinets change, about the housing problem which is generally perceived to be deteriorating, we saw fit to present to the readers some of these important inquiries and opinions on how to solve this problem. We do this because they spotlight various aspects of this multifaceted problem, and because the presentation of these views and our comments on them might clarify the vision of the officials responsible for housing and make it possible for them to seek ways to deal with the problem.

Wanted: A New City for a Million Citizens Every Year

Under this sensational headline, AL-MUSAWWAR reports in its edition of 16 May 1980 on an academic seminar sponsored by the Development and technological Planning Center at Cairo University. Among the participants in the 5-hour seminar were brother engineer Hasaballah al-Kafrawi, the minister of reconstruction, housing and land reclamation, and a number of our honorable scholars in planning, management and research.

Discussing one of the causes of the housing problem, the brother minister says: "The problems of population growth are increasing at a high rate in Egypt. The population of Egypt has doubled in less than 40 years, at an annual rate of growth of 2.5 percent. This represents a heavy burden that weights down on any development projects. Egypt still lives on 4 percent of its total area, that is about 40,000 square kilometers out of a total area of some one million square kilometers. Despite all those interrelated and complicated problems which are due in part to the neglect of efforts to expand the size of urban development and promote the expansion of population centers for a long period of time, and in part to the behavioral pattern of the Egyptians who cling to their customs and traditions despite the intensity of the population problem--despite all those problems, 96 percent of the land of Egypt is not entirely useless desert. There are many areas in Egypt's eastern and western deserts which are rich with vast natural resources that can be immediately exploited, and this is what the state is seeking to do now."

The minister goes on to say: "The development plan is targeted on 5 development areas in which studies have begun. These studies have now concluded that priority should be given to projects of development and natural exploitation in areas that are considered to be potentially attractive population centers. The other line of action is to move toward the establishment of new cities. The ministry is now engaged in planning and implementing that line of action parallel with the other line. The minister concluded that the problem of housing can only be solved through searching for and finding new areas where the natural resources can be developed and exploited and to which new populations can be drawn in accordance with a plan of two parallel lines."

Dr Subhi 'Abd al-Hakim, the Vice President of Cairo University, added that a new strategy should be drawn up to develop the existing cities and towns in Egypt, and to bring them up to the level of the new cities where housing and employment opportunities are available. This way it would be possible to distribute the population in Egypt in accordance with available natural resources and urban development plans. Therefore, the type of new cities planned for desert areas should have all the sound means of housing and construction, because it is the area which creates the city and not the other way round.

Having faithfully summed up the most important points raised in the seminar, we would like to say that we appreciate the continuous efforts exerted by minister Hasaballah al-Kafrawi for the sake of building cities and solving the housing problem. We agree with the views of all the participants in the seminar. We may not be exaggerating when we say that we had fully analyzed all the points mentioned by them in the serialized reports on our "Study About the Population Problem" which are still being published by AL-SHA'B. We also believe that the solutions proposed at the seminar are all sound, but we wish to ask: What is the means of implementing those important theoretical solutions that have been proposed at the seminar and how is it possible to build new cities that can absorb one million citizens per year, as the sensational headline of the AL-MUSAWWAR article put it? Can our limited material capabilities enable us to do so, and can we simply find lands that are suitable for the establishment of those cities and supplying them with utilities? Perhaps what is desired and hoped for is something and what is possible is someting else. In fact, it is entirely impossible to achieve all that, unless we had a miracle from heaven. Unfortunately, the age of miracles is long past and we have no other choice but to examine reality without exaggeration and without adding to the suffering of those who are living in the sheer hell of the problem.

In our detailed study, we have examined the problem of lands and new cities in articles which were published in previous editions of this paper. We followed our analyses with solutions which we consider to be realistic, serious and constructive. We believe that without those solutions, the likes of such academic seminars will be useless, except as a means to providing an opportunity for longer debates and discussions which would be fruitless and not worth the long hours expended on them. The man in the street will continue to ask himself: Can we really solve the crisis by building a new city for a million people every year? How and with what means? This is, by God, impossibility itself.

Can House Rents Be Lowered?

Under this headline, AL-SIYASI of 15 June 1980 published an inquiry into the housing crisis. Said the paper: "The housing crisis is the talk of the town today and every day. The prices are constantly rising. Young people are desperately searching for just a room to begin their careers and lives in it. And despite the expansions carried out by the state in the desert, rising prices seem to be like a long-playing movie. Is there no outlet from all this?"

To look for that outlet, AL-SIYASI canvassed the views of young people to find a starting point along a difficult route and to search for an answer to a more difficult question. Is it possible to lower house rents and apartment prices in the general climate of lower prices which engulfs the country nowadays? The newspaper interviewed several people involved in this field, including contractors, landowners, brokers, apartment building owners and tenants. The interviews focused on the statements of those who explained the difficult circumstances in which building and construction are being carried out nowadays. These include the lack of the necessary technical labor, the high cost of such labor, the problem of land availability, the high cost of construction materials, the unavoidability of having to buy such materials on the black market most of the time and other factors which clearly show that the problem has completely deteriorated and that it is impossible for persons with limited incomes to find houisng because of high rents and because those persons do not have the means to pay the required key money.

The points raised in the newspaper's inquiry are known to all of us, but the most important point which the inquiry raised was a remark made by the owner of an apartment building. He said: "The owner of an apartment building is not guilty. The contractor sets the price and I pay. And because I have hildren, I did not forsake any apartment in the building which I put up. I paid 50,000 pounds to the contractor. If I want to rent it, of course I will try to regain this sum and more.

Concluding its inquiry, the newspaper said: The truth is lost between contractors, building owners and land-zoning companies. Several housing laws have not succeeded in solving the problem thus far. It is apparent from all this that the hope of lowering apartment rents and prices requires hard work. This means that the state has to address the housing sector as it addresses the prices of basic goods. The house is no less important than the loaf of bread, for it is man's shelter where he lives, eats and dresses up.

This was the content of the inquiry. While we thank those who have conducted that valuable inquiry into an important aspect of the housing problem, we wish to emphasize, however, that the truth is not lost, as the inquiry concluded. The truth is that housing, as any commodity, is subject to the law of supply and demand. If a commodity is available abundantly, it would be easy to obtain it for proper prices and vice versa.

The housing crisis began to emerge about a quarter of a century ago and proceeded to deteriorate year after year for many reasons, primarily the lack of planning during that period of time plus the essentisl social changes which occurred in the life of the people. Many other factors and present shortcomings have helped to push the crisis to a dead-end road. One of these is the serious phenomenon of leaving buildings empty as a means to securing the biggest possible profit, either by changing the licensing designation from rent to condominium, or by getting the right key money or leaving the building empty in the name of the children, whether they be adults or minors, although the owners had received materials at government-supported prices and low cost. This situation will never alleviate the problem but will exacerbate it. In such a situation, there is no hope for persons of limited incomes that rents will come down or that they will find a suitable apartment. Therefore, the only solution--one which we have always advocated--is for the government to support economy housing and part of the medium-range housing, as it is doing in terms of supporting essential food materials, and to undertake the building of that kind of housing to help persons of limited incomes to find housing at a cost they can afford, because the house is no less important than the loaf of bread.

Winding up this review of our press, we re-emphasize that our problem cannot tolerate slogans and sensational statements inasmuch as it requires scientific discussion accompanied by a sincere and determined desire to work hard. This should be coupled by an effort to keep a periodic check on our achievements under the plan designed by the NHC which is the highest scientific and specialized reference in our country.

We ask God to grant us success and to grant our Egypt prosperity and love. We look forward to meeting you again in another part of our study of the housing problem, God willing.

DETERIORATION OF FRUIT FARMING ACKNOWLEDGED

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 19 May 80 p 7

[Article: "Ministry of Agriculture Accused of Failure to Guide Peasants"]

[Text] Dr Mahmud Daud, the minister of agriculture, has admitted that fruit farming in Egypt has deteriorated with the results that output is down and prices are up. This, he conceded, has placed heavy burdens on the consumers.

The minister added: "The country as a whole has been neglected for a long time. The proof is that anyone who used to own a garden or a grove is now abandoning the idea of having one in order to escape the various state fees." For 20 years, he said, there has not been any effort to protect and maintain gardens and groves.

Ahmad Qasim, who had questioned the minister, rejected the minister's claims, saying that the deficiency in the citrus crop reached 50 percent, as evidenced by the fact that citrus exports last year dropped from 230,000 tons to 100,000 tons. The member of the People's Assembly added: "The major reason for that is the wrong pricing policy pertaining to citrus products." He said that the ministries of supply and economy determine pricing policy without giving any consideration to the real cost of production and without caring about the well-being of the Egyptian economy. This is in addition to the failure of the ministry of agriculture to provide guidelines and advice which would enable the peasants and farmers to protect and treat the fruit crop, as well as the high cost of pesticides and immunization.

The member of the People's Assembly said that most kinds of fruits have almost become extinct, such as grapes, lemons and mango.

Lawsuit Explained

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 26 May 80 p 1

[Article by Ihsan 'Abd al-Maqsud: "Fikri Makram 'Ubayd In Court to Answer Charges of Breach of Promises to Lawyers After the Election of Al-Khawajah"]

[Text] The 'Abdin Plenary Court will convene Thursday morning to hear the lawsuit brought against Fikri Makram 'Ubayd, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of the Permanent Council of the National Democratic Party (NDP), and Ahmad al-Khawajah, the dean of the bar association. The lawsuit was brought by lawyer Amin Safwat who is filing for compensation for losses he and 5,000 other lawyers in the public sector have incurred as a result of unfulfilled promises by the deputy prime minister. He also asked that Mustafa Kamil Murad be (subpoenaed) in his capacity as the chairman of the board of directors of the newspaper AL-AHRAR and that he be asked to have his newspaper continue its campaign to unveil partisan aberrations.

In his petition, Amin Safwat said that Fikri Makram 'Ubayd, in an effort to persuade lawyers working in the public sector to support the NDP's unofficial candidate for the position of dean of the bar association, held a number of seminars and panel discussions in which he and the former minister of justice, counselor Ahmad Musa, pledged to submit to the People's Assembly a bill that would realize equality in promotions, annual salary increases and salaries between lawyers in the public sector and their colleagues in the Government Cases Administration. The bill in question would be something of a financial and compensatory system for those public lawyers which would relieve them of the deception of wayward company presidents and assure them of independence so that they would be subject in their work only to their conscience and duty.

The petition of the lawyers went on to say that on 25 July, AL-AKHBAR published a categorical statement in which Fikri Makram 'Ubayd announced that the People's Assembly will debate the project immediately after the 'Id al-Fitr holiday. On 30 July, AL-AHRAM published on an entire page, and AL-JUMHURIYAH published on its front page, statements by the deputy prime minister and his legal adviser in which they affirmed that the promised hope will be realized soon and spelled out details of the bill which were welcomed by lawyers. The deputy prime minister, however, backed down after having reassured lawyers during the elections campaign that he guarantees the issuance of the law, and after having explained to the lawyers that he has two capacities, that of deputy prime minister and that of secretary general of the party, and that in these two capacities he will work for sure to push the bill through as the party has promised and pledged to do.

The petition also referred to Ahmad al-Khawajah, the dean of the bar association, saying that he has taken an obstructive position to prevent the issuance of the law so that the issue may be used again as a trump card in the next elections.

The petition went on to say that the newspaper AL-AHRAR on 3 September reported on a major scandal under the heading of "The Party That Laughed at the Lawyers." It is this article which made us seek to call AL-AHRAR as a witness, the petition said, and to call on it to continue its campaign to unmask that partisan deviation.

Lawyer Amin Safwat said in the conclusion of his petition: "Since most companies have completely suspended promotions for lawyers under the pretext that a special law for lawyers is about to be issued and since the behavior of the first and second defendants (Fikri Makram 'Ubayd and Ahmad al-Khawajah, the dean of lawyers) is not in keeping with their party and unionist commitments, it is incumbent upon the courts to order them to pay compensation for the definite material and moral damage which has befallen all lawyers and the claimant, as one of the lawyers. Therefore, the claimant (lawyer Amin Safwat) petitions that they be obligated by the court to pay him jointly the sum of 51 pounds [sic] as temporary compensation and expenses."

[Text] The 'Abdin court has postponed until 12 June the hearing of the lawsuit brought against Fikri Makram 'Ubayd for breach of promises he made to lawyers. 'Atif al-Jawhari, 'Ubayd's defense attorney, asked that the case against his client be dismissed. He said that the lawsuit was brought against the defendent in his capacity as secretary general of the National Democratic Party, but that his client no longer holds this position following the reorganization of the state apparatus. He has now become the chairman of the permanent council of the party and not its secretary general. The court dismissed the plea of the defense and decided to defer the hearings until the plaintiff, lawyer Amin Safwat, changes the designation of Fikri Makram 'Ubayd to that of chairman of the permanent council of the National Democratic Party. The court authorized the plaintiff to include any number of co-plaintiffs he wishes.

PROMOTION OF MECHANIZED AGRICULTURE SUPPORTED

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 26 May 80 p 2

[Article by Mahmud Fawzi: "Mechanized Agriculture--Why Has It Failed in the Countryside? Can 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman Do What the Agriculture Ministry Has Failed To Do?"]

[Text] The National Democratic Party's Popular Development Committee chaired by engineer 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman has decided to set up a national company of service stations to promote mechanized agriculture.

AL-AHRAR wholeheartedly encourages that project and wishes it success because the condition of mechanized agriculture in the countryside nowadays is one of the major obstacles holding up the growth of agricultural production and the intensification of agricultural projects. The success of the project in question will lead to the following:

1. It will increase agricultural production by means of performing agricultural operations and services with high efficiency and in a short period of time.

2. It will cope with the large increase in the wages of agricultural workers. The increase in wages has reached a point where it impacted on the income of peasants from agricultural production. It should be noted that there is a big shortage in agricultural workers and that their efficiency is deficient for several reasons.

3. Free a large percentage of livestock so that peasants can use them for meat and milk. Machinery would decrease the need to use animals in farming which in turn would increase the availability of meat and milk.

4. Free large areas of alfalfa fields which were used by farming animals. These fields can thus be used to raise food security crops.

5. It would introduce modern technology into agriculture. Modern technology depends a lot on mechanized agriculture.

6. It would increase agricultural intensification by carrying out agricultural operations in a short time so that the land can be utilized to the maximum degree. For example, agricultural intensification in Egypt is about 180 percent while it reaches 300 percent in many other countries. We are in great need of such increased intensification.

7. It would cut down the expenses of agricultural operations which in turn would result in increasing the income of the farmer.

8. It would cut down the size of loss in crops, especially those crops which require threshing by hand or with the help of an animal. As a result of such threshing, a good deal of these crops is lost.

To insure that mechanized agriculture would succeed in the countryside, we should take into our account the reasons for the failure of many mechanized agricultural projects so that we may not fall into the same pitfalls again. Some examples:

1. The government mechanical stations. These were the basis of the kolkhoz in Russia. The government had established stations for M.T.S. equipment--motors and tractors--which were renting various equipment and tools to the various kolkhozes in return for a nominal payment in kind from the produce. This system has failed for many considerations which have been discussed by Leberman. Primary among these is the fact that farms failed to take care of the equipment since they belonged to the government and not to them. The misuse of such equipment did not, therefore, bother the farms.

2. Agricultural equipment companies dealing with the peasants through coops.

3. Agricultural coops. Mechanized agriculture failed in these coops, saddling them with losses of 3 million pounds. More important, the tractors and equipment in those coops did not perform their role in serving and increasing production, for many reasons which include the following:

a. Many members of the boards of directors of the coops owned or co-owned tractors and irrigation machinery (although this is forbidden by law). It was in their interest, therefore, to disable the coop's tractors and machinery so that they can force the coop to use their own tractors and equipment at a cost which profited those members. The members who did not own tractors and equipment were not interested in keeping an eye on the condition of the coop's equipment since there was no material profit for them to do so.

b. The tractor driver in the coop received a fixed salary. Therefore, he sought to:

(i) try to put the coop's tractor out of order so that he may work for one of the private tractor owners for another wage, since his wage from the coop is guaranteed.

(ii) till a feddan for a certain farmer, for example, but agree with the farmer to say that only 8 kerats were tilled. This way, the tractor driver and the farmer would split the difference.

(iii) tamper with the tractor's odometer, if one exists, by using such methods as magnet, pin, etc.

c. If a tractor needed repair work, that work would go astray between the coop, the bank and the ministry of agriculture. I recall that a tractor in the governorate of Al-Jizah was sent to the workshops of the ministry of agriculture for repair work that should have cost 15 pounds only. The tractor remained in the workshop for three years and ran a repair bill of 300 pounds. The bank controls every single expenditure by the coop as if it is the owner of the coop's funds.

d. Equipment and machinery coops. This type of coops has scored a great success in spreading mechanized farming in a sound manner. Take Algeria, for example (I worked there as a United Nations expert on agricultural cooperatives). In Algeria, village coops and farmers formed specialized coops for farming equipment and machinery. The size of the areas which these coops served depended on many considerations, primarily the kind of crops, the kind of equipment needed to farm those areas, the space required for the economic use of the machinery, access roads and other considerations. The specialized coop has a number of machines which are adequate for the area they are supposed to service. There is also a workshop for quick repairs and for annual checkups and repair work, in addition to mobile repair units. All machinery and equipment are owned by the specialized coop. If one village coop is not using a piece of equipment, that piece is loaned to another coop in the interest of the economic and effective use of equipment.

The board of directors determines the operational schedule. It is made up of secretaries of all the village coops, all of which constitute a general system. The board runs the specialized coops, and the staffers of the coop's board have to implement the decisions of the board and cannot interfere in the decisions that are taken. They can, however, raise questions before the board as a whole.

e. The success of cooperation and incentives. An experiment to organize mechanized farming began in 10 coops in the Qalyub district, including such localities as Sandyun, Tinan, Qaha and others. The experiment began in 1971 when a member of the board of directors was assigned to each single tractor in the coop and required to implement the schedule of service fully in return for 5 percent of the tractor's daily intake plus expenses. The member would collect his money on a daily basis. Each feddan that runs over the average in terms of service gives the tractor driver an additional 10 piasters. In 1970, the Sandyun coop, for example, lost 1,179 pounds in tractor operations. But after the application of the above system, tractor operations chalked up profits of 3,500 pounds. When a tractor developed trouble, the member of the board of directors responsible for it would have it repaired in a day because the tractor became a source of income and livelihood for him. The average daily intake of a member of the board of directors was one pound.

AL-AHRAR is confident that the mechanized farming project will be successful, God willing, as long as it is headed by engineer 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman because he is a serious, prctical and sincere man. Most of the credit for the bridges and large installations which are the pride of Egypt goes to him. Those installations and bridges demonstrate his ability to implement projects. Most important, however, is that this project is not a profit-seeking enterprise, but one designed for service and benefit. This is the essential difference. When the general coop entered the field of mechanized agriculture its basic function and aim was to make a material profit. Therefore, its function did not go beyond taking a certain percentage from the revenues of tractors assigned to individuals and other coops. But the coop had nothing to do with delivery of the tractors nor did it concern itself with any part of the operations. Furthermore, it did not organize the mechanical farming operations and services in the countryside so as to improve them.

Egypt's countryside and peasants are in dire need of a serious and practical project of mechanical farming and all the organizing, implementation, repair and maintenance work that go with it, so that the project can provide agricultural services by mechanical means that are better, more effective, faster and cheaper than conventional methods. This way, agricultural production can be improved and its cost can be decreased. Any means to achieve this is a sound one. Cooperation is a means not an end, the village bank is a means not an end, and companies are a means not an end. A project owner has to select the means that is sound and practical and that can spread the use of mechanized farming at the right cost and the right time. This is what we need badly.

COMMUNIST ELEMENTS OBSTRUCT WORK OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 26 May 80 p 7

[Article by Hilmi Salim: "Secretariat General of the Socialist Liberal Party Warns: Communist Elements in the Government Obstructing Resolution of People's Problems"]

[Text] At its annual meeting under the chairmanship of party leader Mustafa Kamal Murad, the general secretariat of the Socialist Liberal Party emphasized that the criterion by which any policy should be measured is the end result of that policy as felt by the masses. It said that the success of the government depends on the extent of its efforts to lower the prices of goods and services.

The secretariat pointed out that the Liberal party has preceded the government in perceiving the need to adopt a presidential system and the system of sectors in the cabinet; increase the powers and jurisdictions of local government, improve the situation in the public sector by establishing (control) companies; and delegate to the lower echelons of government authority to decide issues in matters pertaining to production and services in order to insure the speedy performance of such matters and make sure that the proper decision is made at the proper time.

Transfer of Powers

The general secretariat of the Liberal party held its annual meeting last Tuesday under the chairmanship of party leader Mustafa Kamil Murad. President Anwar al-Sadat's meeting with the ministers and governors was reviewed at that meeting. The secretariat expressed its satisfaction with the decision to transfer ministerial powers to the local administration. This is because such a measure would fulfill the desires and needs of the citizens, insure speed in making the right decisions, and help the citizens in solving their daily problems and improving the standard of services that are provided to the public. This is the criterion by which success of the government can be measured, because the majority of the people do not look at political details but are interested in whether a policy translates itself into prosperity and well-being for the citizens.

The party leader explained that the problem is that powers are concentrated in the hands of the higher and upper authorities. He said that those powers should filter down to the lowest levels so that things can be managed and dealt with quickly, instead of having things pile up in the offices of cabinet ministers, thereby retarding the ability to cope with the fast pace of life. He also emphasized that the concentration of power and the need to refer all things to the higher authorities tend to be obstructive and disruptive, which has a negative effect on services for the people. This requires a comprehensive reconsideration of the powers of government.

Guidebook on Ministerial Functions

Maj Gen Salah al-Rifa'i, deputy leader of the party, stressed that it is necessary that laws and decisions implementing them should be clear to those who are responsible for carrying them out. Since the masses of the people do not often understand the jurisdictions and functions of the various ministries, it is necessary to print all this information in a book. This book would be a guide to the functions and jurisdictions of the ministries, and would thus enable people to know where to go and what to do to conduct their business. It is also necessary, the deputy party leader said, that administrative bylaws and regulations be clear when they are implemented.

Maj Gen al-Rifa'i warned that there are communist and leftist elements in the government machinery who are impeding progress, because they do not believe in the present policies, and because they want to show that the government is incapable of solving the people's problems and fulfilling the people's aspirations. Al-Rifa'i added: "The government should exert maximum efforts to alleviate the burdens of the citizens, so that the people would feel that their government is successful in its efforts to provide the basic needs of the people and to offer an appropriate degree of services in a manner that would fulfill the people's hopes about their government."

Where Is Sound Planning?

Muhammad Murad al-Sabatasi, secretary general of the party, wondered if there is any sound planning in Egypt. He concluded that there is no such planning, saying that things in Egypt are running in an abnormal fashion. He cited, as an example, the fact that agriculture in Egypt is still not getting its fair share in the government's policies, although it is the mainstay of the Egyptian economy. He demanded that agricultural companies should be set up so that services can be mechanized. This, he said, would increase animal wealth by 20 percent as well as increase agricultural production. He also stressed the need to strengthen the river transportation system, especially since most of the populated areas in Egypt are along the Nile.

Al-Sabatasi added: "I am offering this as a counter-example to the kind of planning which looks good on paper but which is detached from the realities of life in Egypt... "[sentence incomplete due to printing error which dropped a line from the page].

Dividing Up Egypt

Maj Gen 'Uthman Radwan, member of the political bureau, advocated that Egypt be divided into only 6 provinces so that each province may have enough land to enable it to undertake and carry out various activities and projects. This would also enable the provinces to take advantage of greater manpower resources to fulfill their various policies. He said that this division is especially appropriate, because it would increase the size of natural resources in each province, thereby bettering its ability to solve its problems. He proposed that all taxes go to the province.

Maj Gen 'Uthman said that he favors that cabinet meetings be held on a weekly basis so as to keep up with new developments. He called for the abolition of ministerial committees, because their functions are unnecessary, in the sense that the operation of the executive branch is an integrated and indivisible one which cannot be apportioned. Thus, the cabinet would operate as an integrated, interrelated unit.

The Party's Viewpoint

Nafat Kamel, (deputy secretary general of the party) and member of the People's Assembly, talked about the need to step up party activities among the masses so that the people become more familiar with the party's viewpoint and its demands of the new government. She called for a quick plan of action to achieve that objective, and said that she will deliver a working paper on that subject at the joint meeting of the political bureau and the heads of party branches in the governorates. She said that the plan would also call for restructuring the economy and amending all the economic laws pertaining to the economic structure, so that it would be possible to set down a host of laws that would help build the new state and reorganize the various areas of production and services.

Elect the Governors

Maj Gen 'Abd al-Mun'im al-Sabki, member of the general secretariat, said that to equalize opportunities for the governorates and to provide the political parties with an opportunity to carry out their activities in the governorates, he proposes the following:

1. The Consultative Council should be made up of two representatives of the various groups and two representatives of the workers in each governorate. Elections should be held on the basis of a party ticket. A party that fails to receive 5 percent of the total votes will not receive any seats on the council.

2. In view of the fact that the governor is a politically responsible official, according to one of the president's speeches, a governor should be elected, so that the political parties may have an opportunity to operate in the governorates.

3. The president shall appoint the remaining third of the Consultative Council from experienced men who are members of the various parties or independent.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER ACKNOWLEDGES LACK OF CONTROL OVER FUNDS

[Article: "Deputy Prime Minister Looks Into Where Budget Funds Go"]

[Text] Dr 'Abd al-Razzaq 'Abd al-Majid, the Deputy Prime Minister for Economic Affairs, has admitted that there does not exist a government apparatus to supervise disbursement of development plan appropriations. This year, these amounted to more than 3,000 million pounds. He said that the allocations were being shifted from one project to another without the knowledge of the cabinet. Indeed, the ministry of planning did not know what the development projects were.

The deputy prime minister emphasized that the economic problem cannot be solved by raising prices or taking care of the deficit in the budget, but we should find out where the budget funds are going.

Speaking at a meeting of the planning and economy committees at the People's Assembly, the deputy prime minister announced that all the information he has received from the various ministries when he was in charge of the planning ministry for 3 years was erroneous information. He said that he regrets that Egypt does not have an apparatus to follow up the use of public funds and to make sure that those funds are being spent soundly, especially the public sector funds which amount to 3,100 million pounds.

Dr 'Abd al-Razzaq, 'Abd al-Majid said that a number of projects listed in the development plan some 16 years ago have not been implemented until now. He cited, as an example, the al-Mansurah Hospital which had been listed in the budget of 1964 but remains uncompleted. Another hospital, the Asyut hospital, was entered in the general budget 10 years ago, but is still unimplemented. The deputy prime minister said that "there are 6,000 million pounds in foreign loans on which interest is being paid. But we do not utilize those loans, because the specific projects for which these loans were obtained were not listed in the budget."

He added that "foreign banks have become a problem, because each bank operates in its own manner, and we do not know anything about them. The aim behind allowing these banks to operate in Egypt was that they would serve Egypt and the Egyptian economy. But what is happening is the opposite of that. Those banks transfer their money out of the country, and we do not benefit from their funds."

The deputy prime minister admitted that economic policy in Egypt is carried out in an erroneous manner. In previous cabinets, he said, we tried to change the economic course of the country but our efforts were insufficient, and I share in the responsibility. He said that economic policy is in need of a radical revamping in the public sector, the banking system and foreign trade.

GOVERNMENT PROVIDES INSUFFICIENT AMOUNTS OF FERTILIZER TO FARMERS

[Article by Engineer Mahmud Fawzi: "Shortage of Fertilizers Behind High Prices; Ministry of Agriculture Makes Completely Unrealistic Decisions on Fertilizers"]

[Text] The prices of food materials are constantly rising. Corn prices have reached 23 pounds per ardeb. Vegetable prices have more than doubled since last year. The prices of fruits are constantly rising. No doubt, there are many factors behind the increase in prices, and all of them boil down to the economic law that cannot be ignored or circumvented--the law of supply and demand. The price of any commodity that is in tight supply will go up and vice versa. When production of a commodity increases without a parallel increase in demand, prices will go down.

The averages of agricultural production in Egypt are far less than the averages that can be acnieved. The production slack is due to a very important factor, namely, fertilizers. The majority of agricultural products in Egypt do not get enough fertilizers. This makes their production below average, thereby pushing their prices up.

For example, 'Abd al-Hamid Malash, a vegetables and crop farmer in Sandayun in the governorate of Al-Qalyubiyah, says that the fertilizers appropriated by the ministry of agriculture for vegetables are less than half the real needs. As a result, the yield falls short of the expected average and prices go up. Take corn, for example. The ministry of agriculture allocates 62 azute units to 400 kgs of fertilizers per feddan (15.5 percent). Last year, the average yield per feddan in his fields was 15 standard ardebs of corn. To get the same yield this year, he had to use 3 times the amount of azute allocated by the ministry of agriculture, that is about 190 units of azute. He had to buy the difference on the black market at 8.5 pounds per (yurba). The official price is 195 piasters.

He also bought Egyptian lime for 3.5 pounds per (shikarah) on the black market. The official price of that commodity is 195 piasters. 'Abd al-Hamid Malash says that doubling the amount of fertilizers appropriated by the ministry of agriculture would double the production of vegetables.

'Abd al-Mun'im Subayh, a Sandayun peasant, adds that the fertilizer allocations are not adequate. He raises eggplants, tomatoes and peppers. If he had to depend on the fertilizer quantities allocated by the ministry of agriculture, he said, his production will be too low. He uses, for example, 20 (shikarahs) of fertilizers for his eggplants, when the ministry of agriculture allocates only 12 (shikarahs). The same applies to the other vegetables. He has to buy the additional fertilizers on the black market at double the price. He says that buying additional fertilizers beyond the quantities appropriated by the ministry of agriculture would double production which justifies the extra price he pays on the black market.

Farmer Fathi al-Sayyid, Wasaf, of Al-Kawadi in the district of Ashmun, raises potatoes and vegetables. He says that the ministry of agriculture allocates 7 (shikarahs) of fertilizers and 31.5 percent of nitrates per feddan of potatoes. He uses 20-25 (shikarahs). Instead of 2 (shikarahs) of superphosphate, which the ministry of agriculture allocates, he uses 10-15 (shikarahs). This way he is able to increase the yield of potatoes per feddan to 5 to 6 tons, using government fertilizers, or 8 to 10 tons, using additional fertilizers. He spends an average of 30 pounds per month for extra fertilizers per feddan of potatoes, but he averages an additional income of 300 pounds from his potato production.

As for tomatoes, he receives 6 (shikarahs) of nitrates with local fertilizers from the government. This would yield about 7 tons per feddan. When he uses 17 to 20 (shikarahs) of nitrates, he gets about 20 tons of tomatoes--an increase of some 12 tons, which means an additional income of 840 pounds. He says that the ministry of agriculture should observe the real needs for fertilizers and fulfill them so as to enable farmers to increase production, eliminate the black market and lower prices.

Farmer Sami Jirjis Tadros, of Manshat Ghali in the (Hihya) sub-district, the governorate of Al-Sharqiyah, says that the fertilizers appropriated by the ministry of agriculture represent less than half the real needs of farmers. He adds that there are many peasants who cannot afford to use more fertilizers because they cannot afford to pay the exorbitant black market prices. For example, as a result of the shortage in the corn fertilizers, the price of corn per ardeb in the village has risen to 25 pounds per ardeb and the rent of a feddan of high quality corn has reached 120 pounds.

In the village of Sandayun in the governorate of Al-Qalyubiyah, the produce of onion (laden on cotton) has reached 100 kantars for (single reed) and 150 kantars for (double reed), with good fertilization and proper care. Some farmers have sold onions, including the twig, at 215 piasters per kantar. That is to say that the intake of a feddan of onions (laden on cotton) ranges from 215 to 320 pounds, aside from the price of the cotton. This would increase the production of onion, thereby bringing its price down, which is what the state is trying to do now.

Mabruk Hasan 'Ali of the Mahjub farm in Al-Minya favors this idea. He raises mellons, saying that the ministry of agriculture allocates only 3 (shikaras) of saline fertilizers, 15.5 percent, per feddan of mellons. He needs at least 6 (shikarahs) which he has to buy on the black market at exorbitant prices. He also needs 60 ardebs of pigeon manure, at 7 pounds per ardeb delivered.

Another farmer who raises melons, Makrum Muhammad Husayn Rizq of Daght al-Khammar says that the amount of saline fertilizers which the ministry of agriculture allocates for one feddan of melons, 3 (shikarahs), is not enough to raise any melons. He says that he has to buy at least 3 addition (shikarahs) from traders in the black market at double the price. He said that the lack of adequate amounts of fertilizers this year has produced a poor quality of melons in Al-Minya. He notes that if the melon runners find no fertilizer in the ground, they will feed off the melon itself. Therefore, a great percentage of melons raised in Al-Minya are empty inside.

We sounded out a number of agricultural specialists and they told us that the appropriation of 60 units of azute for corn is completely insufficient, and that at least 30 units of fertilizers should be allocated for corn. Additional amounts of fertilizers should be used for raising the new American hybrid corn (Burner), so that it can reach its maximum yield, which is an average of 24 ardebs. Our inquiries in the villages, coops and village banks show that only 62.5 units of azute are allocated for corn and that there is no additional allocations for hybrid or any other kind of corn.

To keep quiet about the question of the insufficiency of fertilizers would be a serious matter, because it effects agricultural production and food security. The ministry of agriculture should revise its quotas of fertilizers in a manner that would insure the highest possible levels of production, so that supply would rise and prices would drop, especially in regard to vegetables, fruits, corn and other crops. This would also prevent the existence of a black market. We are in an age of full candor. The president, who is also the prime minister, would not hesitate to allocate adequate amounts of fertilizers for agricultural production, especially since the United States Agency for International Development has as one of its priorities the policy of providing fertilizers to other countries to increase the production of food in the world.

STATE LANDS USURPED DUE TO GOVERNMENT NEGLECT

[Article by Thana' Jum'ah: "A Free-for-all to Usurp State-Owned Lands"]

[Text] Encroachment upon and usurpation of state-owned lands have become a general and recurring phenomenon because of lax supervision and protection and remissness in eliminating encroachments due to the lack of adequate forces. The slowness of the competent authorities in taking legal action against usurpers due to shortage of personnel in the pertinent agencies is encouraging trespassers and encroachers to persist in their usurpation of state-owned lands.

Strangely enough, the financial administration in the governorate of Cairo is responsible for safeguarding state property and funds, but it does the opposite of that. It issues receipts to usurpers against any sum of money they pay to the treasury. On the strength of these receipts, the usurper turns into a tenant protected by law and recognized by the state.

The Railroad Authority went even further and offered lands on both sides of the Hilwan railroad line for rent at reduced prices that are quite lower than the rates set by the Cairo governorate's financial administration. The train conductors collect the monthly rents of those lands from the usurpers.

Usurpation Is Better

If it happens that the encroachments were eliminated, the land in question remains unattended and unguarded and without a fence around it--in other words, waiting for a new usurper who would be encouraged by the state. Citizens who petition to buy a piece of state-owned property at the price set by the board of a governorate or by the ministry of religious endowments or the Nasir Social Bank, are faced by the rejection of their applications, and they find it better as a result to usurp the land legally by paying a few millims to the governorate's financial administration or to the railroads authority.

The encorachments have been taking several forms, primarily usurping the land by squatting on it and acquiring it or renting a certain plot of state-owned land then encroaching upon a wider area.

And the Public Sector

The encroachments are conducted through the building of shacks or small huts. There are also encroachments on the popular housing units in 'Ayn al-Sirah and al-Abajiyah, where usurpers take over extensions close to porches. Beyond that there are encroachments that involve homes for the needy, kiosks, plants and large buildings such as the building of Jalal Abu Al-'ula near Mashrahah.

In the sub-division of al-Khalifah, large areas of land have been arrogated through the Arab Contractors Company on al-Fustat Street, the al-Jimhuriyah Company, Salem Siddiq Thabet Shakhlul and Sons and Kamal al-Tahawi on al-Fustat Street. The area of the lands that these people have taken over in this area comes to 38,000 square meters.

In the old Cairo section, there are encroachments by Faraq 'Abd al-Wahad, Rafiq Nasr, Faruq Muhammad Abu al-Sa'ud, Yusuf Ibrahim al-Laythi, Mustafa Husayn, Fathi Muhammad, Majdi Hasan 'Allam, 'Isam al-Sayyed Hasan, Muhammad 'Abd al-Hafiz and Husayn 'Abd al-Hafiz. This, in addition to the infringements of 'Ashur 'Ali Sa'd and (Art Gunther Kfeishah) on Zaynhum Street as well as the encroachments perpetrated by public sector companies. The encroachments made by the Arab Contractors Company in the Batr al-Baqarah area in al-Fustat involve an area of 70,000 square meters.

Rabi' al-Shaykh, director of the Properties Administration in southern Cairo, says: Law No 59 of 1959 has given the administrative authorities the right to put an end to encroachments upon state-owned lands. He says that when he is notified of an encroachment, he sends a signal to the competent police precinct which solicits a written pledge from the usurper to cease all encroachment activities. The encroacher, however, decides instead to complete his construction work very quickly and fill his property with people. Yet the authorities would go ahead and issue an order to eliminate the encroachment, but after that has been done the encroacher goes back and builds again.

Amending the Law

Ahmad Salit, former chief of the southern Cairo area, says that there are no penalties against encroachers upon state-owned properties. There are usurped lands where buildings up to 5 floors have gone up. A study is being prepared, he said, to confiscate those buildings and pay some kind of compensation to their owners. After that the buildings would be handled by the local authority would also collect the rent. This kind of action is being taken against 'Abd al-'Aziz al-Manzilawi and Muhammad al-Sayyed 'Abd al-Ra'uf whose cases are still pending in court. He added that at present there are encroachments in such areas as Qal'at al-Kabsh, Sur al-'Uyun and 'Ayn al-Sirah. When the utilities police try to remove the encroachment, they are sometimes physically attacked and shot at, as what happened in the case of al-Manzilawi. The present law should be amended so that a large fine and a penalty are prescribed for encroachments upon state-owned lands. In the area of southern Cairo alone, there have been 300 cases of encroachment. There are also many encroachments in the al-Madabigh area.

Strangely enough, the former chief of the southern Cairo area says that he has received requests from some politically responsible people asking that elimination and removal operations be postponed or warning him against going near the al-Madabigh area so as to avoid a tragedy.

Sami 'Ata Muhammad, chairman of the followup committee of southern Cairo's popular council, believes that the question of encroachments is due to negligence by housing officials in keeping an eye on state-owned land, and to the fact that those who are building on usurped lands are not ordinary people but powerful personalities who put up buildings and rent them.

Sayyed Khalil, chairman of the complaints and suggestions committee in the popular council of southern Cairo, says that the law empowers area chiefs to remove encroachments immediately. An area chief is required to prepare a program for the elimination of encroachments and to oversee the implementation of that program because he is primarily responsible. He said that encroachments should be dealt with immediately so that we may be able to eradicate this phenomenon altogether.

Recommendations and Decisions

The local council in southern Cairo has met to discuss this phenomenon and adopted several resolutions at the end of the meeting. They include the following:

1. With respect to the al-Madabigh area in old Cairo, the governorate should be advised to take urgent measures to set up an industrial city for hide tanning outside populated areas.

2. With respect to the housing buildings established on state-owned lands for several years in return for services rendered, they should be sold at current prices and considered permanent buildings that do not conflict with zoning plans. The owners of such buildings shall have priority in bidding on them.

3. With regard to the encroachments upon the popular housing complexes in 'Ayn al-Sirah and elsewhere, they should be surveyed and the tenants should be warned to remove the extensions and other means of encroachment. If there is no response by the end of the period of warning, removal should be administered or the houses should be vacated in accordance with the law.

4. The People's Assembly should make the usurpation of land legally punishable by issuing a law considering the usurpation of state-owned lands an arrogation of public money and property, hence a crime punishable by law.

5. An encroacher upon state-owned lands should be required to pay the estimated costs of the elimination of the encroachment.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS DEFINED AS FREEDOM FROM GOVERNMENT CONTROL

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 2 Jun 80 p 5

[Article by Mumtaz Nassar: "What Does it Mean To Consider the Press an Independent Popular Power"]

[Text] It is not important that the press be prescribed in the constitution as a popular authority. What matters is for the journalist to be as independent, immune, objective and neutral as a judge. An independent, neutral, unbiased journalist who is not subject to removal or transfer is what makes the press a popular authority.

I liked what the leading journalist Mustafa Amin said in one of his "ideas" which he included in his latest book. He wrote: "To safeguard the freedom of the press, it is not enough to just call it the fourth estate, just as it is not enough to place on the door of the Liman Turrah prison a sign saying "The Egyptian University," and have the people believe that the prison has turned into a university--cells, shackles, guards, prisoners and all. Newspapers cannot be free when they are owned by the government or by the party which is in power. Nor can journalists be free when the government can hire or fire them by decree.

"Freedom of the press means that any citizen has the right to publish a newspaper even if it had one reader. It also means that it is the people who choose the writers they want to read and who can elevate those writers by reading them or relegate them to oblivion by not reading them. It does not mean that the government should impose those writers on the people, then jail them, punish them or keep them at bay at its own discretion. Freedom of the press means that the press should be the voice of the people not the government, that it should tell the ruler what the people want, not the other way round. It means that the press should throw light on the truth, on facts, and not try to conceal facts behind a screen of lies."

It is clear from the above that what matters is not merely to inscribe in the constitution that the press is an authority, but that the members of the press should be strong to give the press the weight that it should have in the life of the nation, and make it the voice which gives expression to the will of the nation and condemns what the nation does not want. To inscribe in the constitution that the press is an authority when the word authority implies control and domination, cannot mean that the press has any such attribute, because the press is not a functionary of the state with a specific duty to perform and with powers and prerogatives guaranteed by the power of the government. Therefore, what concerns us is that the press should be free and independent, and should not be controlled by any agency of the government in any way.

Successive Egyptian constitutions have provided for the freedom of the press. Article 14 of the 1923 constitution provided that the press is free within the bounds of law, and that press censorship or the warning, suspension or proscription of newspapers is forbidden. Article 45 of the 1956 constitution says that "the freedom of the press and of printing and publishing is guaranteed in accordance with the interests of the people and within the bounds of law." Article 36 of the 1964 constitution is synonymous with Article 45 of the 1956 constitution. Article 48 of the 1971 constitution says: "The freedom of the press, printing, publishing and the means of advertisement is guaranteed, and it is forbidden to warn, suspend or close down newspapers by an administrative measure."

We recall in this regard that we have called for more than one amendment of the constitution, especially in connection with the way of electing the president, where we called for direct popular election of the president. We have also demanded that the position of the socialist prosecutor general be abolished to prevent duplication of authority, and called for a constitutional amendment that would bring about a balancing between the powers in more than one area. We have recorded all those suggestions in a memorandum which we presented to the speaker of the People's Assembly and asked him to distribute it among the members. He refused on the premise that the proposed amendment was not signed by a sufficient number of members as required by the constitution, and he filed the memo away.

We have recorded in the debates of the People's Assembly, as can be verified from the record of the 77th meeting, that we have submitted many suggestions with regard to amending the constitution and explained our position on the important aspects of amendments suggested by the majority. Accordingly, we agreed to a proposal specifying that the Islamic sharia (law) be considered as the primary source of legislation. We have also made clear our position on the amendment pertaining to the press and the Consultative Council, and expressed many reservations on that score. Yet we were not spared gentle rebuke from the eminent journalist Mustafa Mar'i. In his book THE PRESS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND RULER, he refers to us on page 68 with gentle rebuke, saying that we have agreed to the constitutional amendment pertaining to the press. He said verbatim: "God forgive the redoubtable Mumtax Nassar who agreed to the amendment as well as the report at the meeting on 19 July 1979, after he prefaced his statement with a word of thanks to the Speaker from the distinguished effort he has displayed in the report."

The fact of the matter, as can be verified from the minutes of the 77th meeting cited in the third legislative volume of 30 April 1980, is that I recorded in the minutes all my remarks and reservations about the constitutional amendment in question. As for the first meeting, which took place on 19 July 1979, there were no discussions or debate on the details of the proposed amendments. Discussion at that meeting was confined to procedure and formalities, namely, that the amendment should be proposed by the number of members required by the constitution. The details and specifics of the provisions and proposals were not debated. They were actually debated at a later date, namely, at the meeting of 30 April 1980. At that meeting, we recorded all our observations and reservations about the constitutional amendment. I cite this correction to spare the eminent Mustafa Mar'i a lot of effort since we care about his views and hold him in high esteem.

APPLICATION OF MODERN TECHNOLOGY TO AGRICULTURE DISCUSSED

[Article by Engineer Mahmud Fawzi: "Can Technology Be Introduced Into Agriculture? And Are We Serious About Increasing Agricultural Production?"]

[Text] Agricultural problems are myriad, and the need for increasing agricultural production is pressing and becoming more so as a result of the growth in population and the increase in the consumer needs of the people. The problems of agriculture are well-known and have been studied. Solutions are possible, and ongoing research comes out every day with new ideas and methods that make solutions more accessible and make the prospects of increasing production more possible and achievable. But are we serious about seeking to increase production? Is there serious, organized and planned action to introduce modern science, technology and the results of the latest studies, experiments and inventions into agriculture? Are we organized enough to accept any such possibilities and to make use of them?

The question of increasing production should receive double the attention it is receiving now, but our efforts should not be confined to drawing up plans and models without reforming the agricultural structure itself, because we cannot begin to increase production until we have reformed that system and turned it into a solid groundwork for the projected increase in production. The October war has taught us a lot. It has taught us that nothing is impossible as long as there are sound planning, solid determination, clear target and complete faith in what we are doing and what will be realized, with God's help.

So, to increase agricultural production, we have to reform the agricultural structure. The most important areas which should be immediately reformed are:

1. The system of land acquisition. The fragmentation of land ownerships has turned the tiny, scattered, and splintered acquisitions and holdings into an obstacle in the way of any real progress in the agricultural sector. They stand in the way of any sound application of mechanized farming and fly in the face of logic and reason. They also obstruct any necessary efforts to consolidate land holdings and any attempts to intensify farming and create specialization, etc. There have been many experiments designed to improve this fragmentary system of acquisitions, either wholly or in part. The ministry of agriculture made one such experiment, namely, the consolidation of the agricultural utilization of the cotton crop since 20 years ago, following the success of the (Nawaj) experiment. But the ministry of agriculture then stood still and remained in a frozen position. It has failed to do anything else. It has not tried to consolidate the utilization of other crops in order to benefit more people, nor has it tried to go on with its attempts to consolidate agricultural utilization to the extent that would enable it to deal with the Lilliputian size of land holdings, although it could do so and although the need to do so is clear.

2. Changing the agricultural cycles in keeping with modern progress. It has been established that the present makeup of the crops does not maximize returns from the natural and human resources that are available and that are being used in agricultural production operations. The growth of the present makeup of the crops was originally designed as a means to providing enough supplies of food for those working in agriculture, who did not have enough food. The only increase in the food supplies was in vegetables and sugarcane. If the present makeup of the crops continue as it is now, we will be facing very soon problems that would be very difficult to overcome.

3. The intensification of crops. By this we mean the size of different crops in an area per year. If we plant two crops in the same feddan of land per year this means a crop intensification rate of 200 percent. The rate of crop intensification in Egypt is 180 percent although it is 300 percent in many states. The rate of intensification would increase by planting early-growth crops and co-planting closely-related crops, such as onions and garlic, with cotton. Countries like ours have been able to raise wheat three times a year and raise rice more than three times a year. The rate of crop intensification in vegetables reached 400 to 500 percent. The land is not allowed to go fallow for one day.

Besides changes in the agricultural structure, there are other matters which should have been taken up by the ministry of agriculture years ago but which were left without any serious study or consideration. They include the following:

1. The crops of the Green Revolution which began in 1944 with the Mexican wheat that was raised in Mexico (by the Rockefeller Singer mission), then moved to the Philippines where it developed a breed of rice called miracle rice. These achievements turned cereal-importing countries into cereal exporters. We introduced Mexican wheat into Egypt without first studying the strains that would be suitable for us, in terms of the color of the flour, the quality of the dough and the type of chaff that remains behind. As a result, Egyptian farmers turned away from Mexican wheat, although there are kinds that can satisfy the needs of the peasants.

2. Maximization of agricultural production by increasing land utilization. (I have proposed) to the ministry of agriculture a project that would combine cotton with wheat, providing at least one million extra feddans of wheat. Fields would be planted with wheat, then afterwards with cotton seedlings. But the ministry of agriculture was not interested in increasing the wheat produce by 1.5 million tons or in utilizing one million feddans of land to raise winter crops then plant cotton seedlings in them. Indeed, the idea of crop combination did not receive adequate attention although it would realize a greater income for the peasants and the state and would provide extra crops for exportation.

There are many early-growth crops which have been utilized by various states and which have led to a real green revolution in these states. The results of all such experiments are well-known and available and they can be tried in Egypt or used as a nucleus for raising new strains in Egypt.

3. Systematization of Irrigation. Water is the most important element in our agricultural system. If, through the systematic application of irrigation, we are able to reduce the water allowance per feddan from 8,500 cubic meters, for example, to 5,000 cubic meters, we would then be able to expand the arable area as well as lessen the (word unknown--tatbil) agricultural lands, which is the factor that threatens high-yield areas with the elevation of the water table. The innundation system of irrigation must be finally changed in the interest of the producers and agricultural production.

4. Mechanized farming. Mechanized farming is the basis of introducing modern technology into agriculture. The state of mechanized farming in Egypt requires a long practical and objective study, and our hope is great that the agricultural services company which was set up by the National Democratic Party will succeed. The company plans to apply mechanized farming in a sound manner that is not intended to reap profits but to serve the peasant, increase his income and the national income and serve the needs of food security.

5. Production Coops. The desired change in the countryside heavily depends on those coops. The president himself has urged that services coops be turned into production coops. However, the ministry of agriculture has made no effort to implement that, but left the coops exposed and vulnerable to the onslaughts of the village banks.

6. Livestock Production. Livestock production requires real efforts, for the struggle between man and animal over the land should not continue. It is a known fact that Egyptian livestock is among the lowest producers of milk and meat. If there were serious studies on raising livestock to produce animals of high quality in terms of producing milk and meat, and if mechanized farming is added, half of the fields which are now planted with alfalfa and other animal feed would be spared and used for farming while the production of meat and milk would increase.

7. Agricultural Expansion. Agricultural expansion should be established on technological bases that are completely different from the methods used in the past with regard to irrigation methods, the use of chemicals, the choice of crops and the method of farming and service. We make mistakes then repeat the same mistakes time and again. We have to know that agriculture in the future should depend entirely in scientific and technological progress.

8. The Use of Fertilizers. One of the most significant obstacles in the way of agricultural production is the shortage in chemical fertilizers. In many crops, the amount of fertilizers given to the peasants is no more than one third the quantity that has to be used. There are general complaints about this. Take corn, for example. To raise 30 to 32 ardebs of corn, a peasant needs at least 150 azutic units, but what he gets is 62 units which can produce no more than 9 ardebs. The entire world has expanded the use of necessary fertilizers, including compound--instead of simple--fertilizers.

The world is speeding ahead in agricultural production, but we are not able to move at the same pace or move with the speed and tempo required by the growth of population and the increase in the level of need. Since the president himself has taken over the role of prime minister and since the ministry of agriculture is held by an efficient and capable scholar and practical man, Dr Mahmud Dawud, our hope is great that the ministry of agriculture will begin to work seriously to take advantage of the scientific progress in the world.

FICTITIOUS PRICE REDUCTIONS BY MINISTERS EXPOSED

[Article: "Imaginary Reductions in Prices; Three Charges Against Officials in Industry and Supply Ministries: 1) Forgery, 2) Insulting the People's Assembly, and 3) Deceiving the Masses"]

[Text] AL-AHRAR has exposed the most serious ruse designed to deceive the masses and mislead public opinion and the political leadership in Egypt; the ministries of industry and supply have announced fictitious price reductions to alleviate the plight of the masses.

The two ministries have issued lists that occupied full pages in the national papers over a period of three days within the past two weeks. The lists contained the prices of 183 items produced by the canned foods companies of Qaha and Edwina. The ministers of industry and supply Muhammad Zaki Taha and Ahmad Nuh proclaimed that the reductions run to as much as 40 percent, and they deposited the reduction lists with the secretariat of the People's Assembly.

AL-AHRAR has obtained the previous lists of the same items, which have been in effect in the markets until last week, to compare them with the new reduced prices. When the comparison was made, the exposure was complete. The comparison shows that the price reductions are not only fictitious, but actually represent an increase in prices. The increase in the prices of some items runs as high as 50 percent.

To carry deception a step forward, the national papers reported that some merchants and coops have refused to apply the new reduced prices under the pretext that they have not been advised of the new prices yet. The papers demanded that the merchants and coops abide by the new reduced prices.

In fact, the abidance with the new "reduced" prices will increase the suffering of the masses and further enrich the merchants who store ample quantities of these items. They will not be penalized or brought to account for selling the items at the new prices. On the contrary, they would be earning the thanks of the ministries of industry and supply.

This is the first time the government compels merchants to sell at increased prices and the first time that industrial companies deceive the masses in this fashion which would have passed unnoticed. Indeed, these companies may have even asked the government to allocate extra funds in the budget to compensate them for their losses as a result of the reduced prices!!

AL-AHRAR demands that those responsible for this serious ruse be brought to trial on three charges:

1. Forging official lists released by the ministries of industry and supply.

2. Insulting the People's Assembly by submitting fictitious statements to the Assembly members.

3. Deceiving the masses by claiming that prices have been reduced when actually they have been raised, and deceiving the political leadership by making it believe that price reductions have been instituted when in fact they have not.

JUDICIARY MUST BE UPHELD AS INDEPENDENT AUTHORITY

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 9 Jun 80 p 5

[Article by Mumtaz Nassar: "What Does It Mean To Consider the Judiciary an Independent and Neutral Authority?"]

[Text] Chapter Four of the constitution of 11 September 1971, deals with the judiciary. In Article 165, it says that "the judiciary is an independent authority exercised by the courts of various levels and specializations, which shall issue their verdicts in accordance with the law." Article 166 says that "the judges are independent, subject only to law in the performance of their duties. No authority shall interfere in the cases they handle or in the affairs of justice." Article 168 says that "the judges are not subject to dismissal and the law shall regulate the question of any disciplinary action against them."

The Judiciary: An Authority or a Utility?

These are the constitutional facts adopted by the constitutional legislator in our country. Before that, the status of the judiciary was a subject of debate and controversy on whether the judiciary is an authority or a utility. The issue was raised at a public meeting of the National Assembly--the 22nd meeting of the Assembly held on 2 April 1968 during the 5th ordinary session of the Assembly. The Assembly had before it then a bill on illegal profit. Based on the minutes of that meeting, a member of the Assembly called Muhammad 'Atiyyah Isma'il raised an objection about a sentence in the report prepared by the legislative committee. The sentence reads as follows: "The committee wishes to draw attention to the fact that the passage of that project has placed heavy burdens on the utility of justice." The member of the Assembly said: I object to this sentence, because the judiciary is not a "utility," but an authority--a power exactly like the executive and legislative powers. He noted that the constitution--chapter 4, Article 152--referred to the judicial authority and asked that the word "utility" be deleted from the report.

Dialogue Between the Speaker and the Member

The Speaker said in reply to the objection that "the honorable member was a member of the committee which presented the report. The member conceded in reply that he was a member indeed, but said that he is now asking the Assembly to remove the phrase because the Assembly has the right to make changes in the committee's report. The Speaker retorted that "there is no doubt that we all highly revere and esteem our judiciary, and I do not see any need for this discussion. I repeat that I meant by my remarks to make clear that the report, including the phrase which is challenged, was submitted by the legislative committee and the objector is a member of that committee." The minister of justice then rose and said the following: "In the modern constitutional system, there cannot be any authority in the state save that of the people. All else are just agencies and bodies performing their jurisdictions in the service of the people. The word "power" or "authority" was first used in France. It was then dropped in 1870 and changed to the word jurisdiction. Every agency is exercising jurisdictions but is not an authority. We mean by utility an apparatus that serves the people. There is no doubt that the utility of justice is performed by the judiciary." Assembly member Muhammad 'Atiyah Isma'il replied that the constitution provides for three authorities, including the judicial authority. The Speaker remarked that "we are not in disagreement over that."

The conclusion that can be drawn from the minutes of the National Assembly is that there are two views on the status of the judiciary and what its role should be.

Unwarranted Debate

The first view says that the judiciary is an authority. The second view says that the judiciary is a utility. That debate was absolutely unwarranted. All the Egyptian constitutions--those of 1923, 1956, 1964 and 1971--referred to the judiciary as the judicial authority. Therefore, it is clear that the reference to the judiciary as a utility is inconsistent with the constitutional provisions of our country.

Some writers have become accustomed to calling the judiciary a utility, but this kind of thinking is at odds with our traditions and cannot be endorsed by our type of socialism, because it is a socialism deriving from our life, religions and traditions that have been rooted in the hearts and consciences of the people for a long time, thereby becoming a part of the people and a constitutional reality that cannot be abridged. The idea that the judicary is a utility, like any other institution, is an imported idea advanced by researchers in the Communist countries. The idea has been largely scrapped, because it involves popular control of the judiciary which in turn would jeopardize the judiciary's immunity and independence. The Central Committee in the Soviet Union found it necessary in 1966 to caution about that and to recommend the removal of any control over the judiciary in order to fully insure that the judiciary would be fully safeguarded.

The Judiciary an Independent Authority

What seems to be clear is that most world constitutions, ours included, provide that "the judiciary is an independent authority." The point in that is that freedom is the other face of the judiciary. Freedom and the judiciary are interlaced and indivisible, because the judiciary is the legal underpinning of the concept of freedom and the natural framework for the safeguards of freedom. There can be no freedom without the supremacy of law because the safeguards of freedom are only necessary in the face of the authority of the state. The judiciary alone is capable of establishing the supremacy of law in the face of the state authority.

Since it is the role of the judiciary to insure the freedom of man, the judiciary cannot or would not be suited to perform this role unless three elements are guaranteed and endorsed by all the people and their various groups because they are the safeguards of every individual in the present and the future and whether he is a subject or a ruler, innocent or guilty. These three elements affect the members of the judiciary in their capacity as part of the people. They mean everything to the concept of justice and the the judicial system, in other words they involve this question: to be or not to be. These three major bases are the recognition of the judiciary as an authority independent of the legislative and executive authorities and the political apparatus, the insurance of the neutrality of the judiciary and the avoidance of any action that would infringe upon the judicial system's independence and entity.

Providing the Means of Neutrality

Having reviewed the meaning of the independence of the judiciary and the need to provide the judiciary with the means of neutrality, and to avoid infringing upon the independence and prestige of the members of the judiciary, it behooves us to comment on the president's speech of 14 May 1980, at the People's Assembly. In that speech, the president said that "some members of the judiciary who have expressed their opposition to the Law on Morality feel that they have performed a political act." In his address to the ministers and governors at the first meeting of the new cabinet on 19 May 1980, the president asked the minister of justice to set up a committee of values from among members of the judiciary.

Remarks About the President's Speech

In the light of our affirmation of the independence and neutrality of the judiciary, it behooves us to express our convictions with regard to the president's remarks on this subject. Apropos of the first point of view expressed by the president that rejection of the Law on Morality by members of the judiciary is a political act which a member of the judiciary should not practice, we disagree with the president's view. Article 173 of the constitution states that "the affairs of the judicial system shall be supervised by a higher council under the president of the republic. The law shall prescribe the manner in which the council shall be formed, its jurisdictions and its rules of operation. The views of that council shall be sought on bills that regulate the affairs of the judicial system."

Since the bill on Morality provides for the establishment of new courts (Courts of Values) which shall include, in addition to career judges, other members selected by the executive authority from among public personalities, and since the bill also prescribes for the Socialist Prosecutor General powers that overlap with the jurisdictions of the Attorney General's Office, then Article 173 of the constitution requires that the opinion of the higher council of the judicial system be solicited on the matter. Accordingly, it is natural for the general syndicates which constitute the entire body of judges to express opinions on that bill which affect the work and functions of the judges. Views on that bill cannot conceivably be confined to the members of the higher council of the judiciary system, because those members are there as representatives of the syndicates of judges. With this in mind, the minister of justice, at one of his news conferences, called on the general syndicates of judges to express their views about the Law on Morality. If some members of the judiciary have rejected that law, they cannot be held accountable for doing so, and they should not be considered as having performed a political act. Therefore, we do not agree with the view expressed by the president in that regard.

As for the president's instructions to the minister of justice to set up a committee of values from among members of the judiciary, we do not see any need for such a committee at all. Such a committee has no place in the realm of the judiciary at all, for the Judicial Authority Law No 46 of 1972 has taken care of the issue and manner of bringing judges to account. This law makes the committee totally unnecessary.

Providing Safeguards First

To put things in perspective and insure the independence and neutrality of the judiciary, it behooves us to deal with the affairs of the judiciary in such a manner that would bolster its independence and provide all the safeguards that are required by the responsibility of effecting justice and applying it to all the people.

OPPOSITION NOTIFIES PEOPLE'S ASSEMBLY OF FALSE PRICE REDUCTIONS

[Article: "The Fictitious Prices Before the People's Assembly"]

[Text] The Socialist Liberal Party has tabled an interpellation at the People's Assembly concerning the fictitious reductions in the prices of food materials which were listed by AL-AHRAR on 9 June. Liberal Party deputy Ilfat Kamil submitted the interpellation through Assembly Speaker Sufi Abu Talib to supply minister Ahmad Nuh and industry minister Taha Zaki on the subject of "the fictitious price reductions announced by the two ministries following President al-Sadat's speech of 14 May and his instructions to reduce prices."

The People's Assembly will take up this matter within days. In the meantime, supply minister Ahmad Nuh told AL-AHRAR that the previous cabinet raised food prices on 28 April, only 48 hours before the new cabinet came into office, but that he decided against announcing or applying the price increases. He said that the reduction in prices, which was made in accordance with the instructions of President al-Sadat, is based on prices as increased by the previous cabinet but not announced by the new cabinet when it assumed office. It thus appeared to the consumers that the prices were actually increased not decreased.

As an example, the minister cited the case of a can of food which was selling at 20 piasters. The previous cabinet, he said, increased the price to 32 piasters on 28 April, but that new price was not disclosed by the present cabinet which assumed office soon after the price hikes, nor was it applied. Instead, the can continued to sell for 20 piasters until the new cabinet formally reduced its official price from 32 piasters to 25. To the unknowing consumer, it appeared that the price has gone up by 5 piasters when actually it has gone down by 7 piasters.

OPPOSITION BARRED FROM CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL

[Article: "The Opposition Is Barred From Joining the Consultative Council; Elections Law Should Be Amended To Give Chance to the View of Others"]

[Text] The Socialist Liberal Party has rejected the Consultative Council bill which is now before the People's Assembly, affirming that the bill in its present format deprives the opposition from gaining access to the Consultative Council, and places obstacles which would deny the view of others the opportunity to express itself--an abridgement of the democratic system in Egypt.

At an emergency meeting of the party's general secretariat, chaired by Mustafa Kamil Murad last Saturday, the party demanded that several provisions of the bill be amended, primarily Article 13 which states that "members of the Consultative Council shall be elected on the strength of the party tickets which have received an absolute majority of all the votes," and that "in all circumstances, parties which do not receive at least 5 percent of the total votes cast throughout the republic shall not be represented in the council."

The Liberal Party objects to this article on two counts:

1. The stipulation that a party should receive an absolute majority of the total votes is contrary to the principle of proportional representation. Thus, in a district of 100,000 voters and 10 seats in the council, a party which receives 60,000 votes would win 6 seats, while a party which wins 40,000 votes would win the other 4 seats. This is the principle of proportional representation which would translate the real weight of the various political parties. Conversely, the stipulation that a party should win absolute majority, such as provided for in the proposed bill, means that a party would win no seats unless its ticket received more than half the votes in the district. This is a novelty which has been shunned by any state that applies the principle of election by party ticket and which would undermine this system which has become an established norm in democratic countries.

The Liberal Party emphasized that this novelty which has been devised by the government's party and incorporated in its bill will elicit the laughter of the democratic world and turn election by party ticket to election by district with the aim of enabling the National Democratic Party--with all its capabilities and electoral tactics--to take over the entire Consultative Council.

2. The Liberal Party emphasized that the requirement pertaining to a minimum of 5 percent of the total national vote is one which is applicable in those states in which the party system has become fully rooted and established. There is no objection to that provision in principle, but in a country like Egypt where the party system experiment is still nascent this provision constitutes a major obstacle which would bar the opposition from the Consultative Council. Given its modest capabilities, an opposition party would be denied entry into the council, according to this provision, even if it were successful in some governorates. That is to say that an opposition party may win in some governorates but still fail to capture a single seat in the Consultative Council because it may not have won 5 percent of the total national vote.

The Liberal Party also objected to Article 3 of the bill which states that "each governorate shall be considered a single electoral district." The party's general secreatariat emphasized that this article reduces the chances of success as far as the opposition parties are concerned. It said that the bill should have maintained the initial plan published in the national newspapers which divided the large governorates into more than one electoral district. Dividing Cairo into 4 districts would provide the opposition with an opportunity to win one or more districts, but it seems that there is a fear of giving an opposition party the chance to win even a single seat in the Consultative Council.

PARTIES, UNIONS DECRY PLAN TO DISSOLVE PRESS SYNDICATE

[Article: "Trade Unions and Parties Continue to Debate the Question of the Liquidation of the Press Syndicate"]

> [Text] Trade unions and political parties in Egypt continue to debate the inclination to liquidate the press syndicate and re-register journalists following the formation of a higher press council that would arrogate to itself the rights and prerogatives of the syndicate, primarily the right to register and discipline journalists. This week, there were three statements on the subject by the press syndicate itself, the bar association and the Grouping party. Using more than one conclusive legal argument, the three statements stressed that the tendency to dissolve the press syndicate is in fact an assault on the constitution and international agreements to which Egypt was a party. The statements pointed out that the move against the press syndicate may be a prelude to a general onslaught on the entire unionist movement. They also underscored the solidarity among the various trade unions and underlined the apprehension which political parties of all inclinations feel with regard to the prospect of abridging the freedom of the press in Egypt.

The Press Syndicate: Should We Turn Lawyers Into a Fifth Estate?

Ihsan 'Abd al-Maqsud writes:

The dean of the press syndicate Kamil Zuhayri has issued a statement in the name of the syndicate in which he said that calling the press an authority or an estate is merely a figure of speech, such as calling lawyers standing judges. It would be unreasonable to turn the law profession into a fifth estate and make lawyers into civil servants on the basis of the expression that judges sit and lawyers stand. Legal conclusions cannot be derived from verbal similies and figures of speech.

Kamil Zuhayri said "We defend the right of the press syndicate to continue as a professional organization which regulates and organizes the profession of journalism and which is based on the 1971 constitution and all the laws pertaining to the press which were issued in 1941, 1955 and 1970. Our position is supported by pronouncements made by administrative courts and by the unanimous opinion of jurists. It is also backed and endorsed by the universal declaration of human rights.

"We caution against several legal errors, he said, if the syndicate is turned into a club. Primary among these would be a constitutional error, a disregard for Article 56 of the present constitution and a violation of the accepted legal definition of a journalist, namely, that a journalist is not a civil servant and not a worker who is subject to an employment contract."

Kamil Zuhayri said that Egypt follows the system of one union per profession, and that in view of the multiparty system, the trade union would necessarily include members of different persuasions. He warned against the damages which would befall journalists registered in the present press record, including material damages that would involve salaries, severance pay, annual leave, sick leave and advance notice before the termination of a contract. He said that these are material rights which journalists have acquired and won over a period of 40 years and which have been legally adopted.

Zuhayri went on to say that revision of the register would be unconstitutional because it would infringe upon the journalist's right to practice his profession, the principle that citizens are equal before the law and the acquired rights of the registered journalists. The register was revised only once since 1941. That was in 1955 when newspapers owners quit the syndicate.

Zuhayri emphasized that the syndicate is a juristic body within the public law, adding that there are scores of pronouncements made by administrative justice all attesting to the right of trade unions to register and discipline their members. Fortunately, the 1971 constitution is clear in guaranteeing the right to the formation of unions, and the Higher Constitutional Court and the administrative courts will deter any encroachment on the constitution, the law or the rights of the syndicate members.

Zuhayri said that there is nothing in the world that resembles the Higher Press Council. The legislators cannot give that council the prerogative of disciplining journalists, because the accountability of journalists is based on the penal code. The general attorney's office can bring suit against any Egyptian journalist abroad whom it considers to be guilty, in accordance with Article 80 of the penal code. The syndicate, or any other body, cannot do anything in this case until a final criminal verdict has been issued. By saying this, Zuhayri added, we are not defending the mistakes but merely defending the reputation of the supremacy of law, the reputation of the syndicate and the reputation of the regime.

The Bar Association: The New Legislation Designed to Organize the Press Infringes Upon Freedom and Democracy

Layla 'Abd al-Salam writes:

The bar association has issued a statement decrying the liquidation of the press syndicate and the revision of the press register. In its statement, the bar association said:

"Our people--with the bar association in the forefront--are following with great interest and deep concern what is being said these days about turning the press syndicate into a club and revising the press register. This trend, which is intended to be codified soon into a new legislation to regulate and re-organize the press, would do away with the entity of the sisterly trade union, the press syndicate, and deprive it of the rights and prerogatives guaranteed by the constitution and by current laws. This would be firstly and foremostly an infringement upon the cause of freedom and democracy which our people believe to be their means to a life of stability, progress and prosperity.

"The bar association, in keeping with its national mission and its true commitment to the cause of defending right, the constitution and the law, sees in this trend a clear deviation from the constitution and a violation of international covenants related to human rights and the freedom of trade unionism, for the following reasons:

"One: Article 56 of the 1971 constitution states that "the establishment of trade unions and federations on a democratic basis is a right guaranteed by law." Therefore, stripping the press syndicate of its character as a trade union and converting it into a mere social club would deprive the journalists of their constitutional right to establish a trade union of their own. On the other hand, the interference of the state in the affairs of the press syndicate in a bid to re-arrange its status, contrary to the semi-consensus decision of its members, involves a violation of International Agreement No 87 pertaining to the freedom of establishing trade unions and the need to protect such associations, which obligate public authorities to desist from any interference which would restrict the establishment of trade unions or impede the exercise of that right.

"Two: The call for turning the press into a fourth estate and for passing the ownership of national papers to the Consultative Council would rob the profession of journalism of its freedom and independence, turn journalists into employees and strip the press of the quality of being a free profession. The mission of the press, as a free profession, is inconsistent with the connotation of authority or estate, because an authority first of all assumes that the exerciser of that authority has the ability to wield power and say yes or no and subsequently the power to coerce others. This is something that has never been a characteristic of the press which has nothing but the power of the word.

"Three: To empower the Higher Press Council to run the affairs of the press and purge the press register of those journalists who are considered to be undesirable would be a violation of a basic human right as prescribed in Article 23.4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: "Every person has the right to establish and join a union in protection of his interest." One of the first manifestations of trade unionism is that the trade union should be in full charge of its own register and have the first and final say in all the affairs of its members. To strip a trade union of that right would undercut its entity and turn it into a hollow structure as well as deprive it of a prerogative guaranteed by the constitution. Article 56 of the constitution clearly says that the trade union is "responsible for makings its members account for their conduct in carrying out their activities, in accordance with certain codes of ethics, and for defending the rights and freedoms legally granted to its members." To consign this prerogative to the Higher Press Council would be a clear deviation from the constitution.

"Four: To consign tutelage over the press and journalists to a higher press council formed by a presidential decree runs against the goals of the recent constitutional amendments which included the return to a multi-party system that allows each party to have its own press. It follows logically that some of the journalists will be working for such party papers, and so it cannot be said then that those journalists should be deprived of their right to join a union that looks after their affairs.

"Five: The action that is being planned against the press syndicate, if it were to take place, would constitute a serious precedent that would not involve just the journalists who are being singled out for such measures but would jeopardize all those engaged in the profession of journalism. Indeed, its danger will spread out to include other free professions, thereby endangering the future of the entire trade unionist movement which is one of the pillars of democracy."

"In view of all this, the bar association appeals to all the constitutional institutions in the Egyptian Arab Republic to give this matter the attention it deserves. We also appeal to everyone to band together in order to preserve the entity of the press syndicate and all its rights which are guaranteed by the constitution and law.

"We do this in dedication to a democracy which we are seeking and a freedom that we would like to see fully established over all the Arab lands. God is the source of truth and the guide that shows us the way."

NPUG: Abolition of Syndicate's A Balatant Aggression Against the Press and the Rights of Journalists

Jamal 'Abd al-Sami' writes:

The NPUG said in a statement that the abolition of the press syndicate would contravene International Agreement No 87 pertaining to the freedom of establishing trade unions and the protection of trade unionism, which Egypt has signed. One of its provisions states that "workers and employers indiscriminately have the right to establish or join whatever unions they desire without prior permission and without being subject except to the rules and regulations of those associations. The public authorities shall refrain from any interference that would restrict this right or impede its legitimate application. The associations of workers employers shall not be subject to dissolution or suspension and shall be protected by the safeguards provided for in this agreement."

The new legislation collides with one of the most time-honored trade unions in Egypt which has played a pioneering role in the establishment of 18 Arab syndicates, the Federation of Arab Journalists, the Federation of African Journalists and the International Journalists Federation.

The abolition of the press syndicate and its conversion into a club represent a blatant aggression against the profession of journalism and the material and moral rights of journalists.

The statement of the general secretariat of the NPUG noted that the threat of such measures is not confined to the press and journalists--although this in itself is very serious--but would extend sooner or later to the entire trade unionist movement. Infringement upon any unionist organization is an infringement upon the basic rights of the working citizen and his right to resort to a democratic association to defend his rights.

While the government has singled out the press syndicate, it will not hesitate, if its onslaught were to put an end to the edifice represented by the syndicate of Egyptian journalists, to repeat its attacks on other trade unions and associations in different ways and by various other means.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE IN MINISTRY PARTLY TO BLAME FOR BAD CROP

[Article by Mahmud Fawzi: "Who's Responsible? Two Million Ardeb Shortfall in This Year's Wheat Crop. Finger of Accusation Points to the 'Heat' and 'Thirst'"]

[Text] It was expected and hoped that the average yield of wheat per feddan this year would be higher than last year's average. But the actual crop indicates that this year's average yield per feddan was 2 ardebs less than last year's. To find out the facts about this year's wheat crop, AL-AHRAR toured several governorates and villages so that its findings would reflect the factual situation clearly, based on an on-site inspection of production centers.

Lack of Confidence

For an example, at the village of al-Bishah in the district of Manuf, AL-AHRAR met with farmer 'Abd al-Rahman 'Ashshub. He said that this year his one and a half feddans of land produced 12 ardebs of wheat, but that last year they produced 16 ardebs.

Farmer Hamed Wahbah said that last year and this year, he planted wheat in kerats [kerat equivalent to 1/24 feddan]. Last year, the area he planted yielded 2.5 ardebts of wheat, while this year it produced only 2 ardebs. That amounts to a decrease of 2 ardebs per feddan than last year. We asked him where does he get his seedlings from, and he answered that he does not trust government wheat seelings and that for the past 20 years he has been using the wheat of the previous year's crop as seeds. He also said that fertilizers are insufficient and that the impact of heat on the wheat stalks during the period when the kernels are forming is the cause of the decrease. The heat stroke during the period of kernel formation tends to reduce the size of the wheat kernel.

Farmer Ramadan 'Abd al-Maqsud adds that he raises 6 kerats of wheat, but that this year's crop was 2 ardebts lower than last year's. Last year, his crop was 2.5 ardebs against 2 ardebs this year.

We saw farmer Muhammad 'Abd al-'Aziz Hasab operating a winnowing machine which he had bought for 70 pounds 10 years ago. He says that the machine now costs 250 pounds and that it can handle 3 feddans per day. For his wage, he gets a kilah per ardeb. He said that the machine requires 4 persons to operate and that it brings in an income equivalent to 10 kilahs of wheat per day.

The Heat Wave

At 'Izbat Imam, farmer hajj 'Abd al-Halim said that he plants Mexican wheat in an area of one and a half feddans each year. His crop last year, he said, was 3 ardebs per feddan more than this year's crop. According to him, the reason is that the heat wave in April and May hurt the wheat crop during the formation stage and caused the grain of wheat to be smaller and lighter.

Farmer 'Abd al-'Ati 'Afifi raises 15 kerats of wheat in Hawd 'Afifi each year. This year he cropped 4 ardebs, while the same area yielded 5 ardebs last year. He said that he has been using Indian wheat seeds for 20 years. The government wheat, he said, is "no good" because the color of the flour is dark and the chaff is shunned by the cattle. He does not use government wheat although the coop in the village bank said that it will harass anyone who does not receive government wheat for seeds.

In the village of Tilwatah in the district of al-Bajur, farmer Mahmud Mustafa Higaz said that the heat wave during the period of kernel formation has reduced the yield per feddan from 12 ardebs last year to 8 ardebs this year. He is supported in that by farmer 'Abd al-'Azim 'Afifi al-Fiqi who said that the average yield per feddan in his land of 15 kerats has decreased than last year's average by 2 ardebs.

The Yield Is Less

At the village of Qalta al-Sughra, we met farmer 'Atiyyah Kamel 'Atiyyah as he was threshing the remainder of his wheat crop. He said that he raises wheat in an area of 15 kerats in Hawd al-Bustan and that this year's yield was 3 ardebs less than last year's. The same thing was said by farmer Jaber Khattab of Qalta al-Kubra. He pointed out that he planted wheat in an area of one feddan this year and that his crop was 9 ardebs versus 12 ardebs last year.

Farmer Anis 'Abd al-Sayyed adds that this year he planted 6 kerats of wheat which produced 2.5 ardebs, whereas last year he planted 15 kerats of wheat which yielded 8 ardebs.

'Abd al-Latif Wahdan, a farmer in the village of Rahim who raises 4 feddans of wheat, said that this year's crop was less by 2 ardebs on average than last year's because of the heat wave in April and May and thirst.

In the village of al-Shawashinah, Abshway district, farmer Muhammad Jabali who raises 2 feddans of wheat said that this year's crop in his land was one ardeb less than last year's. Farmer Isma'il Muhammad Ibrahim of Tubash al-Khadra' in the Abshway district adds that the heat and thirst were responsible for lowering the average yield of his crop per feddan by 5 ardebs this year, as compared to last year. He plants 4 feddans of wheat.

In al-Qalyubiyah, farmer Mustafa Ahmad 'Abdullah al-Nahhal of Kafr Taha says that he raises Mexican wheat in an area of 2 feddans. Last year, his average yield was 13 ardebs per feddan, while this year the average was 11 ardebs due to the heat wave in April and May.

What Is Required of the Officials in Charge

All those meetings took place in the various villages and fields and they reflect the facts which AL-AHRAR wishes to submit to the competent authorities so that there would be no excuse in not maintaining supply levels for this year and the first half of next year.

Increasing agricultural production requires first of all and by necessity that the farmers have confidence in the ministry of agriculture and in its instructions and directives. The loss of confidence in the ministry has gone to the extent that some farmers have insisted on using seeds from their own produce of the previous year for 20 years without interruption. They have refused to receive government wheat, because they do not trust the ministry of agriculture, this is a very serious matter and should be avoided. The ministry of agriculture should seek to give advice and guidance to the peasants and farmers in a more convincing and acceptable manner. Pressure and intimidation will lead to no result.

The minister of agriculture, who is daily seeking to raise the level of efficiency in his ministry, will not allow matters to continue to run in that fashion. And now that the faithful President Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat has taken over the responsibility of domestic action, the tactics used with the farmers should be radically changed. The situation should be faced truthfully and realistically so that we may be able to achieve the progress that is required in terms of increasing production to meet the requirements of food security.

OPPOSITION FIGURE URGES ANTI-ISRAEL MEASURES

[Article by Mumtaz Nassar: "Freezing Relations with Israel Has Become a National and Nationalist Duty"]

[Text] It is clear from repeated statements recently made by Israeli officials during the autonomy talks between Egypt and Israel that Israel, as news agencies unanimously report, does not intend to give the Palestinians full autonomy, as agreed upon in the Camp David accords, and that it plans to perpetuate its sovereignty over the West Bank and the Gaza Strip as a liberated area that belongs to it. It is clear that Israeli officials--hawks and doves alike--want more settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, and want to strengthen the present settlements. It is also clear that Israeli officials consider a unified Jerusalem to be the eternal capital of Israel. The Isreali Knesset's measure in that regard was adopted with near unanimity. In view of all these clear positions by Israel, it behooves Egypt to adopt a position that measures up to its responsibility on that issue.

There is no doubt that to simply adopt a position of protesting the denouncing the Israeli actions wouldnot do, and would fall short of a typical position in accord with Egypt's history and its responsibility in the Arab world. Indeed, international law permits Egypt to refrain from fulfilling its commitments with regard to the normalization of relations and so forth, as prescribed in the Egyptian-Israeli treaty. Egypt is also entitled to freeze all relations that have been instituted between the two contracting parties. If America, which is a partner in the treaty, is not able, because of the elections and electoral circumstances, to twist Israel's arms, Egypt should notify Israel that, since it has impaired the peace initiative and process, it has become necessary for Egypt to review its accounts with Israel in the light of the new situation and freeze all its relations with Israel. Thus, Israel may realize that it has gone astray and disturbed peace and that it is ultimately the loser.

Were the state to take these measures, it would be reviving the hope of reestablishing pan-Arab solidarity which has been torn asunder thereby tempting Israel to take such intransigent attitudes. Once Israel realizes that by its behavior it has unified public opinion in Egypt about the need to isolate and deny Israel, it will repent and regain its senses.

Israel has not just committed crimes against the Palestinian people as a whole, but Jewish militants and diehards have gone to excess in committing individual crimes, such as the crimes committed in the past few days against the West Bank mayors which have aroused the condemnation of international organizations. We have raised this issue in an interpellation submitted at the People's Assembly and urged that Egypt should not content itself with just condemning the blatant aggression committed against the Palestinian people, but should go beyond that and freeze relations with Israel. Thus, Egypt may initiate the process of reviving pan-Arab solidarity as it existed during the glorious 1973 war.

Accordingly, I appeal to the ruling National Democratic Party, which is the majority party, to call on its government to freeze relations with Israel. Egypt as a whole should take this position toward a fanatical and arrogant state steeped in racism. One cannot imagine that such a state can have normal relations with other states, for it is an aberration which should be tightly contained. This should become a national and nationalist goal for every Egyptian, so that Israel may be denied the opportunity of growing and expanding at the expense of the Arab states.

Since the method which we have used with Israel has done nothing but create Arab disunity and feed Israel's arrogance and conceit, it is time to review all our accounts with that state which was planted in the body of the Arab nation to disrupt its movement and obstruct its progress. It has also become necessary to put things in perspective and to strive to re-establish pan-Arab solidarity. If Egyptians unite behind this principle, Israel's arrogance would disappear because it cannot possibly continue in the manner which we detect today in the behavior of the Israeli officials. This would be the method which Israel understands quite well and would work hard to avoid it. To depend on the prospect of American pressure on Israel would lead to no positive results because of the influence of American Jews on the American government and because those American Jews tend to be loyal to Israel and to promote the realization of Israeli interests in a manner that would please and satisfy Israel.

In closing, I appeal to all Egyptians to rally together in solidarity and to consider this a national and nationalist duty. "God, do not weaken our hearts after having guided us and grant us your mercy, for you are the giver of everything." [Koranic verse]

REJECTION OF NEW PARTY--The Political Parties Committee headed by Sayyid Zaki has objected to an application filed by lawyer Ahmad Kamil Qutub to form a party under the name of the Global Progressive Party. Qutub filed the application as a representative of the founders of the proposed party. Among the reasons for its rejection, the committee cited the argument that the party is based on fantasy and that it does not offer practical solutions for the problems of the Egyptian society. The committee said that the theory of "globalism" which underlines the party's belief in a new international economy, a new international defensive force and the abolition of borders among states is an illusory theory. [Text] [Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 19 May 80 p 1] 9254

FAILURE OF ANTI-ILLITERACY CAMPAIGN--Dr Subhi 'Abd al-Hakim, secretary of youth in the National Democratic Party, has stated that the party leadership has been talking for a year now about a plan to launch a national campaign to eradicate illiteracy, but that the party has done nothing thus far, although the year 1980 was dubbed as the year of wiping out illiteracy. Speaking at a meeting of the National Anti-Illiteracy Committee, the secretary of youth in the National Democratic Party said that the plans of the ministry of education to absorb those who are in the age of compulsory education have failed, and that the Higher Council for Adult Education has done nothing thus far. SALE OF COMPANY SUSPENDED--The minister of industry, Taha Zaki, has suspended contract procedures involving the sale of "Ideal" company to the (Thompson) company of France. The Central Accounting Bureau and the General Union of Engineering Industries had earlier recommended in a report that the sale be stopped. The matter was then referred to the industry committee in the People's Assembly. The minister of industry, meanwhile, has set up a committee to review the sale agreement, examine the advantage and feasibility of the sale, and discuss the objections. He gave the committee one month to complete its work and report to him. The minister will make his final decision on the French company's plan in the light of that report. OPEN DOOR POLICY CRITICIZED--Engineer 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman has criticized the economic open door policy. Speaking at a meeting of the development committee of the National Democratic Party, he said that the open door policy was not intended to exploit the Egyptian people. He demanded that the role of foreign and Arab investors be confined to productive projects and that consumer projects be left exclusively to local investors. NEW CIA APPROACH TO CONTROL ISLAMIC WORLD OUTLINED

Cairo AL-DA'WAH in Arabic Jul 80 pp 24, 25

[Article by Sami Sayyid: "The New Role of American Intelligence in the Islamic World; Is the United States Playing a Machiavellian Game to Undermine the Islamic Movement?"]

[Text] When the CIA was awakened by the collapse of the most classical dictatorial regime in the world--the shah's regime--it hurried back to its listening devices, satellites, monitoring stations and computers to find out what went wrong and why all those formidable machines had failed to predict the shock of the Iranian revolution. The CIA could get no answers from those machines. "On the contrary, the machines affirmed that Iran was an oasis of stability in the Middle East and a safe place for CIA operations in the Islamic world. Where was the error then? The error lies in the fact that the life of a Moslem is shaped and galvanized by certain basic dimensions and concepts and that those dimensions and concepts cannot be detected by a satellite, fed into a computer or picked up by listening devices.

There are two basic dimensions which shape the life of a Moslem and which are not understood by those who are controlled by materialism and are abysmally caught in its orbit. The first dimension is the concept of martyrdom, which is clearly evident in a hadith of the Prophet (God bless him and grant him salvation) that stands as a supreme example of revolutionism and prescience: "And you shall be ruled by princes who, if you obeyed them, will mislead you, and if you disobeyed them will kill you. They said: And what should we do, O Prophet of God? He said: Be like the followers of Jesus. They were sawed down and carried on wood. By God, he who holds the soul of Muhammad in his hand would do better to die in the obedience of God than to lead a life of sin."

The second dimension is not too different from the first. It is the concept which places a low premium on life--the concept that life is cheap, that it is only a commodity which God has bought from the faithful. ("God has bought from the faithful their selves and properties in return for paradise.")

The CIA has failed to comprehend those dimensions because it has failed to make a distinction between its two main enemies: the Soviets and the Moslems. While the CIA can gain knowledge and information about the Russians through the use of spy machines, satellites and listening devices, all such equipment and devices are useless when it comes to finding out anything about the Moslems. In the face of this perplexing enemy--the Moslems--the CIA had to look for a new role or approach which would enable it to deal with this enemy, fathom him up and find out how best to strike at him so that the tragedy of Iran does not repeat itself in another part of the Islamic world.

The CIA's search for a new role in the Islamic world is confirmed by the bill which President Carter recently submitted to the Congress. The bill is designed to amend the 1974 law pertaining to the central intelligence machinery, whereby the CIA will be given a free hand in foreign operations, without prior legislative oversight, and whereby the number of persons eligible to have access to secret files about intelligence operations and activities abroad would be reduced as much as possible. This is despite the fact that President Carter himself had focused his 1976 campaign on the illegality of CIA activities and the need to place the CIA under political control and oversight, that is to say that special Congressional committees should have prior notification about all operations planned by that suspicious American apparatus. The CIA's search for a new role against the Islamic world is also confirmed by the controversy now going on in Washington about the CIA's return to its old devious and mysterious operations.

Enlightened Approach and Outlook

Given the need to have an enlightened and informed outlook toward the future, we believe that the new role which will be played by the CIA will be a three-dimensional one: educational, diplomatic and informational.

With respect to the first dimension, the educational dimension, it can be basically summed up in the fact that the CIA finds it necessary to study Islamic Societies [or Brotherhoods] and other Islamic groups and organizations from within. It has to do so after it has been established that electronic devices, no matter how sophisticated, cannot probe or fathom these societies and other groups. It is, therefore, necessary to get closer to these groups, and even come into contact with them if possible. This goal can be attained by the following means:

a) The commission of local and governmental research centers and public opinion pollsters in the various Islamic countries to conduct research and studies about the Jama'at and others. The ostensible aim of such studies would be to collect scientific and scholarly facts and information, but the hidden aim is to furnish thorough and complete information and data about those groups.

b) The commission of American universities in Islamic countries to conduct studies and research about the Islamic groups, the Moslems in general, especially since most of the students of those universities are local Moslem students. (I have heard that the junior class at the college of economics and political science at the American University of Cairo has been assigned to do a study on the Moslem Brotherhood). The most serious aspect of this educational dimension--about which Moslems should be very careful--is the possibility that a number of foreigners would convert to Islam in order to infiltrate the Jama'at, without having embraced Islam out of real belief.

c) Intensification of research work and studies conducted by foreigners, Americans especially, about the Islamic Societies. AL-'ARABI magazine [of Kuwait] has reported that CIA agent Richard Mitchell has prepared a comprehensive survey of all the Islamic movements and societies which no Moslem has ever done before. In addition to that, TIME magazine has published a detailed survey of all the Islamic movements, including clandestine movements, in a special cover story on Islam.

The Machiavellian Game

An observer of the situation recognizes that the CIA is thinking of returning to the Machiavellian game through an Islamic route. The game is based on the formula which the CIA has adopted in its dealings with the ruling regimes of the Islamic world, and which the CIA has become even more convinced of after the Iranian setback. Put simply, the formula can be summed up as follows: Sacrifice a friend to preempt a future and prospective enemy. The new thing about the Machiavellian game this time is that the CIA intends to play it in an Islamic fashion. Fleshed out, the rules of the game are that the United States, in its dealings with the ruling regimes in the Islamic world, is chiefly interested in the continuation of the regime which carries out its policies regardless of the person who heads that regime.

In the Iranian experience, the CIA failed to comprehend that the Moslem masses there could not accept any alternative short of the overthrow of the shah. When the CIA got the message, it was already too late. To make sure that the tragedy would not repeat itself, and that pro-American leaderships in the Islamic world are not overthrown--that is, that regimes that carry out the policies of the United States are not toppled--the United States has begun to make the necessary preparations to get rid of any ruler--no matter how friendly--who has reached the point of no return with his people. By so doing, the CIA would be preempting events and changing persons without changing the regimes, of course. This way it would be acting ahead of forces that would remove both the person and the regime, to the detriment of the United States. Here we get a clear understanding of the notion of sacrificing a friend to preempt a prospective enemy.

The CIA had applied this theory on several occasions through a series of military coups in the region. The new element in the game in the 1980's is that the CIA will use an Islamic front this time. The United States is fully aware that the overriding wave and sweeping current in the Islamic world are the Islamic wave and current, and that the United States must bend with the current, even if only in appearance. Accordingly, there is great likelihood that the United States will bring to power Islamic regimes in the Islamic world which would act as a front to enable the United States to defuse the Islamic zeal, which is now firing the masses that thirst for Islamic rule, and contain the masses, while providing them with nothing but slogans and imaginary institutions. To add a finishing touch to this game, it is possible that the CIA will recommend the establishment of nominal Islamic Societies in order to use them in exploiting the Islamic revival that is sweeping the Islamic world. The CIA would not hesitate to lavish funds on such groups. At the same time, the United States would attempt to smear the real societies which truly express the will of the masses of the Islamic nation, so as to distort and ruin the image of these societies among Moslems. Attempts in that regard would reach the point of even accusing members of these societies of dealing with the CIA itself. The CIA has no compunction about incriminating itself if that would contribute to bringing about its desired goals.

The final dimension is the informational one. The CIA believes in the idea of keeping up a constant "buzzing" in the ears. Therefore, Carter has recently agreed to a plan to expand and increase broadcasts beamed to the Islamic world in Farsi and 7 other languages which comprise most of the languages spoken in the Moslem world. In addition to that, the American government is seeking to buy air time from the radio stations of Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf states, to enable it to beam broadcasts to the more than 50 million Moslems in the Soviet Union. At the same time, the American government has agreed to spend $2 million to boost and improve the programs of Radio Liberty that are beamed to Soviet Moslems. You will realize the significance of expanding American broadcasts to the Islamic world when you know that such a step is the result of efforts by Paul Henze, a National Security Council adviser and former CIA chief of station in Turkey.

Of course, American propaganda has primed itself to disseminate lies and fallacies via such broadcasts. This is confirmed by Phillip Agee, the agent who turned against the CIA and who is considered by the agency to be its No 1 enemy. He had said that the CIA had an agreement with news agencies to put out certain news stories concocted by the CIA in order to create a certain impression or impact in the world or to avoid an unfavorable impact or development.

And yet, no matter how hard they play their game and how much planning and intrigue they engage in, the dimension of faith which welds us together and the Islamic mold which has shaped us are sure to thwart their games and machinations. Our Islamic personality will continue to tower and ride high, no matter how hard they try to melt it down.

O, honorable Prophet. How we wish you were with us now to witness the reawakening of your nation--an awakening that will shake the oppressor, humiliate the infidel, bring forth the springs of faith on earth and plant the spikes of creation. We are waiting.

CALL FOR REVOCATION, NOT SUSPENSION, OF NORMALIZATION

Cairo AL-DA'WAH in Arabic Jul 80 pp 4-7

[Editorial by 'Umar al-Talmasani: "Suspending the Negotiations Is Not Enough, They Should Be Cancelled; There Is Only One Jerusalem in the Whole World"]

[Text] We are committed to the elimination of all the visible and hidden manifestations of normalization. Suspension is not enough. Cancellation is a must.

We are among those who believe that Israel does not want peace, not even a separate peace, unless this would bring it closer to the realization of its aspirations and designs. We ask God that those aspirations not be fulfilled, because they are not content with the goal of establishing greater Israel from al-Madinah al-Munawwarah in the south to the end of Lebanon in the north, and from the end of Iraq in the east to the end of Morocco in the west, but extend to the subjugation of Asia and Africa, if not the whole world. This is Israel and those are the Israelis, sons of the old and pre-old testament and the new and yet-to-come testament. This is their nature and those are their designs. But God is watching them and He is powerful enough to deal with them.

In accordance with this concept, we have opposed any agreement with those people who do not feel answerable to God Almighty and who have come to worship the dirham and the dinar rather than God.

Strangely enough, all the foreign correspondents, when they talk to us, do not ask us about our opposition to signing a treaty with Israel, but couch their questions in a mischievous manner which implies a clear accusation. Thus they ask: Why do you reject peace with Israel--as if Moslems hate peace. No Moslem hates peace. Indeed, this is quite contrary to his character and religion. God Almighty has ordered Moslems to rid themselves completely of the sentiment of hatred. A Moslem, therefore, does not hate a person but may hate that person's actions and behavior. As for the Moslem's attitude toward the usurpation of rights, if those rights were personal rights, he would handle the matter in a personal manner. But if the usurped rights relate to his creed and religion, he will then have to endeavor to regain those rights whatever the cost may be--even if that should cost him his life.

One Jerusalem

With this in mind, we have rejected and still reject the treaty with Israel, as long as it maintains its arrogance and claims and continues to hold the entire land of Palestine, including Jerusalem--or what they call east and West Jerusalem, when there is in the whole world only one complete Jerusalem with borders that have been known and determined since thousands of years. In our rejection, we are not coming up with a new notion which cannot be corroborated. Our rejection is corroborated by Israel itself, the United States and the Egyptian negotiator whose many and recurrent statements have been hounding Israel for its violation of even what it had committed itself to do and what it had signed.

Israel has been preventing the mayors of Palestinian cities and towns even from just protesting and submitting their protests to the quarters which would have to look into them--although we would not want for the people of Palestine to content themselves with mere protest, but urge them to mount a sweeping revolution even if that led to the death of all Palestinians. Protest will be of no use to them, exactly as staggering and writhing are of no use to a bird after he had just been slaughtered. This is our view.

Even when Sol Linowitz, President Carter's envoy to the Middle East and himself a Jew, presented suggestions on the settlements in the occupied territories, Israel defiantly and arrogantly rejected them, as if it gave no importance to President Carter's envoy. In fact, Menachem Begin emphasized that his government will not stop the building of settlements in the occupied Arab territories and that Israel believes in the right of Jews to settle anywhere in those territories, including Hebron (AL-AHRAM, Friday, 28 March, 1980). In this fantastic fashion, Israel's temerity has reached the point where it does not pursue the building of settlements in silence and does not desist from claiming what does not belong to it and where it officially and loudly declares that it will not stop building settlements. Furthermore, it does not stop at falsifying history by stating that it has a right to settle any part of the occupied territories, including Hebron, or rejecting the proposals of its protector and feeder, the United States, but goes on building settlements with total disregard for the feelings of Moslems throughout the world. It is not Israel's fault but that of the rulers of Moslem in all parts of the world who have given and still are giving Israel the opportunity to disdain and belittle all Moslems because of their disunity and dispersion.

Menachem Defies Carter

Even that has not satisfied Begin's conceit--or it could be that Begin's conceit cannot be satisfied for some other reason which I cannot prove. Have not you heard that Menachem Begin has informed the president of the United States that, at the forthcoming Washington talks, he will reject the United States' request that Israel freeze Jewish settlement in the West Bank. Yes, by God, this defiance of Carter by Menachem has actually happened. More than that, Menachem has informed Carter that the West Bank constitutes a part of the land of Israel. Swaggeringly, Begin says: Heaven will not fall on earth if the autonomy talks were not completed by 26 May 1980. Indeed, denial of even recorded facts has reached the point where Begin even said that there does not exist a written document which refers to that date as a deadline....!!! What is the man saying and whom is he fooling and belittling? And who is lying? Unchecked, he went on boasting that no one can impose on Israel a Palestinian state, because such a state, he said, is a threat to our very existence, and there can never be peace under such circumstances. He even pointed out that the United Nations resolution [presumably 242] would destroy the foundations of the Camp David accords and the peace treaty. I swear that I was in doubt of the veracity of what I heard along these lines, but this is exactly what was published in AL-AKHBAR of 28 March 1980 and no one has denied it thus far. What is even more shocking is that while Menachem Begin was uttering those fantastic words of defiance in the face of the United States and Egypt, he sent his minister of energy to Washington to discuss with Carter's aides, and perhaps even with Carter himself who was the target of Begin's defiance and rejection, Israel's oil needs. That's right—to discuss with the United States Israel's oil needs. Would you suppose that the Israeli minister of energy will return empty handed or with millions of barrels of oil which he would order the United States to deliver? Can you deduce from all such games and antics a definite attitude between America and Israel? As for us, we were able to detect the facts years ago, and may God have mercy on us and on all those who are pained and distressed by the loss of truth and the denial of justice.

What Peace Should We Hope For?

To further confirm what we have been saying, Musa Sabri, the chief editor of AL-AKHBAR, has recently written that the government of Israel has come up with a new logic which contradicts all the principles prescribed by the Camp David accords, namely, that Israel's security is a matter for Israel alone to determine and to specify its requirements and safeguards. (AL-AKHBAR, 9 May 1980). What is then left for us and what are we waiting for? And what kind of peace can we hope to achieve with those people? To die to the last man is a thousand times more honorable for us than accepting this kind of disdain, scorn and belittlement.

Israel goes on scorning all values and honorable things in life by preventing Palestinian leaders from returning to their country. On 12 May, 1980, AL-AKHBAR reported that the Israeli police has forced shopkeepers in east Jerusalem to open their stores in a bid to break the strike called by the Palestinian National Guidance Committee in the West Bank.

Do you want more evidence that categorically proves that Israel in no way wants peace? Well, here is something which we have not said but was said by the American NEW YORK TIMES. In an article cited by AL-AHRAM on 14 May 1980, the NEW YORK TIMES accused Israel of following a policy which aims at controlling the West Bank forever. This was written while the Israeli military authorities continued their suppressive measures against the Arab inhabitants in the various cities and towns of the West Bank for the 10th consecutive day since the outbreak of the recent events. Here, brother, is a testimony given by one of Israel's own kind. AL-AHRAM also reported on 16 May, 1980, that there is a secret Israeli plan to settle 45,000 Jews in the West Bank within 3 years. The rest is yet to come, and what is hidden is still even worse.

Never mind, let's review evidence derived from the conduct of the United States, the third partner--evidence which decidedly demonstrates that Israel does not act haphazardly but out of confidence that the United States would not do anything that would anger Isarel, even if Israel was wrong and guilty, because Israel deserves such pampering!

On Thursday, 8 May 1980, AL-AHRAM carried the following great tidings. It quoted the United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim as saying that the Israeli authorities explusion of two West Bank mayors and the Islamic judge of Hebron is contrary to international law. How wonderful of Kurt to take such firm positions to check Israel and put it in its place! Was Israel ignorant of the fact that its actions are contrary to international law, so that Kurt sought to draw its attention to this unbecoming violation? Or did he actually want to reassure Israel that it can go on its way confidently because this is the maximum that the United Nations and its secretary general can do? Thanks a lot, you did what you had to do and you saved the reputation of the United Nations!

Carter's Mediation

President Jimmy Carter of the United States graciously announced, according to reports carried on 12 May 1980, that the autonomy talks are facing a severe crisis with regard to final agreement on full autonomy and the implementation of the Camp David accords. Amazing! Was anyone unaware of that, Mr Carter? Or are you one of those who like to say the obvious? He went on to say that despite the many difficulties which encountered the talks during the past 3 years, the United States has succeeded in its role as a mediator between Egypt and Israel. Well, we will grant him that, for he was able to make the good country, Egypt, carry out all that it has committed itself to do. As for unruly Israel, he was able to achieve and do nothing--not as a mediator, a partner, an ally or the one who feeds Israel. To be half blind is still better than being completely blind! He goes on to say that America does not want to play the role of the dictator who imposes his will on the parties concerned, as long as the negotiations are proceeding faithfully and in accordance with the political principles prescribed in the Camp David accords. Can we ask, Mr President of the United States, if you believe that Israel's actions and behavior represent a faithful continuation of the negotiations, in accordance with the principles you have agreed upon at Camp David? If you consider this to be a faithful application of those principles by Israel, what would the unfaithful application of those principles be like? And if human fairness and complete neutrality make it incumbent upon you to shun the role of the dictator who wants to impose his will on others, what do you call your overlooking of Begin's actions, after you have completely denied those actions? What kind of neutrality is it when you immediately acceed to all of Israel's requests and supply it with the most modern weapons, some of which have not even been used by your own armed forces, while you act with great deliberation and slowness when Egypt asks you for arms? Please excuse me, reader, for it is not my business to ask such embarrassing questions, but what can I do when what I see is ado about nothing! Patience, God.

The fair saint [Carter] goes on to reaffirm his commitment to be a partner in the talks despite the difficulties, procrastination, setbacks and the ever present prospect of the failure of the talks. Would you be clear, Carter? Who is it that is posing obstacles, causing difficulties and procrastinating? Egypt or Israel? Why cannot things be said openly and clearly and a spade called a spade, instead of this kind of generalization which conceals a deliberate intention not to face facts candidly? But you are free, of course, to do anything you want.

Carter goes on--oh, how he always goes on--to say that he does not see any cause for despair or for abandoning the endeavor to complete the negotiations. You are right! Why should you despair when Israel is going full steam ahead in doing anything it wants and in violating everything that it has agreed to? What would Israel want to do more than it is doing under the auspices of the negotiations and the treaty? No, no, do not despair, because you might cause Israel to miss the opportunity of doing anything that it wants to do. I just want to remind you of your promise in that statement--that you will not abandon the target date of 26 May 1980. You are a free man, and a free man always keeps his promise. Should we wait, for we understand from what you say that the outstanding problems cannot be solved before 26 May 1980? Which one of your two statements should be believed: that the talks would be completed before 26 May or that they cannot be completed before then? Enough insults against our intelligence!

A Charge That Scares Carter

But what can you do when you are in the heat of the presidential elections? Your opponent Kennedy is accusing your administration of betraying Israel--a charge that scares you more than anything else. At the same time, your new secretary of state has embarrassed you by saying that the negotiating parties have reached for the first time the phase of direct confrontation with the substantive issues that represent the crux of the conflict. Calamity! If they have just only today reached the substantive crux of the conflict, what were they doing all those years? And what were the parties and fanfares all about, champion of human rights? Although your minister has embarrassed you, he still is your brilliant disciple in politics, for he is using your own style. He said, for instance, that the United States will intensify its efforts as a full partner in the autonomy talks and that it will undertake a greater role in the next phase! If so, what was America's role thus far? Was America an incomplete partner? Or were its efforts diluted and not intensified?

At any rate, however, we say to your credit that your state department plucked up its courage, risked all and announced that it does not recognize Israel's annexation of east Jerusalem! What courage and daring! But this is, of course, the maximum you can do when it comes to Israel. The Moslems in all parts of the world must understand you completely so that they would not dance to the music of your justice and not be duped by your promises. If today they cannot reciprocate in kind, they should remember at all times that your promises are an act of depravation and falsehood and a narcotic designed to drug and lull anyone who is deceived by and unknowledgeable about you. Our hope is great that God will not allow the Moslems to continue as they are, because they are at fault if they continue to accept such humiliation upon themselves. It is either do or die.

We come now to Egypt and the Egptian negotiator and what he can do and how he can move. I am not asking that all the cards be shown, but I demand that there should be winning cards which the Egyptians can use to advantage. We do not want to hear mere statements, but we want action--we want deeds not words. We have said more than once that we appreciate the circumstances through which we are going, as any Egyptian--a ruler or a subject--does. But despite all those circumstances and their harsh impact, we believe that a movement launched by officials, al-Azhar ulema and members of the Islamic groups can prove to the world what Egypt is--and Isarel and its supporters will witness what the consequences will be. The aggressor shall pay for his aggression. But to be content with the position we are now taking is something that we cannot possibly endorse, whatever the excuse may be. Free and proud men were born only to be the fuel of noble sacrifices.

Lenience in Negotiating Position

What have we done in the face of Israel's defiance and America's laxness? Are we engaged again in a state of leniency and laxness in our negotiating stance?

We have heard the official spokesman for the foreign ministry say that the decision concerning (the two schools) is a new violation of the spirit of Camp David. And what's new in that? The whole world knows it. Do we face Israel's daily defiance and violation of international norms and values with old and repeated statements? And is it enough for our former defense minister to say that the policy of building settlements is a serious threat to security? Is this the duty of a soldier? Is it enough for our former defense minister to say that Israel's open and unabashed aggression against our rights is a serious threat to security? Or is it his duty to do what his enemy does and to confront his enemy with action that would check and stop him.

And is it any solace to Egyptians that Egypt has answered Israel's actions of deporting West Bank mayors, destroying the homes of Palestinians and building settlements with a letter of protest decrying those illegal actions which are in conflict with the Geneva convention pertaining to occupied territories and the charter of the United Nations and all international norms? Were Israel and the world unaware of the illegality of Israel's actions? This is a position that does not befit us as a Moslem nation which believes that paradise lies in the shadow of the sword. And yet, do you know, esteemed reader, what was Israel's reply to all those vociferous protests? The Israeli ambassador delivered his government's reply to Egypt's protests at a meeting with the minister of state for foreign affairs that lasted for no more than three minutes! As if the reply was a war ultimatum. Some newspapers have also reported that the letter of Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir included weak and unconvincing replies about Israel's violation of basic human rights and the simplest rules of international conduct, norms and conventions. How can the government of Egypt accept this slight calmly? Anyway, Egypt stated again that Israel's decision on Jerusalem was in contravention of the Camp David accords and that Egypt calls on the United States to take a more effective position! Well, if America failed to take a toughter position, what are we going to do about it? Would we just satisfy ourselves with raising our voice in protest? We do not approve at all this stance by the Egyptian negotiators and think that it does not befit them.

One hope is left for us to talk about, namely, the president's statement cited by AL-AHRAM on 17 May 1980, that Egypt is re-evaluating its position toward negotiations after the Knesset's decision proclaiming Jerusalem the unified capital of Israel. The [Israeli] doves have now shown their talons, bared their bills and fluttered their wings. And the supporters of peace in Israel have not expressed any regret about this serious action. We are urgently and anxiously waiting to see what Egypt's reassessment of its position will come to. We hope that it will result in a practical and firm stance that will put an end to all the things that Israel has dared to do without regard for anyone.

We can withdraw our ambassador, because if he were to say there after Israel declared all of Jerusalem as its capital, this may be construed as a clear, not an implicit, recognition of Israel's right to do what it did. We will not die of fear if we asked the Israeli ambassador to go back to this country, for no one will ever regret the loss of his unwelcome presence among Egyptians. We are also obligated to put an end to all the open and hidden manifestations of normalization. There is a lot that we can do, provided that we sort out our own affairs among ourselves by holding country-wide meetings among representatives of the government and the people, where decisions would be taken and would be gladly accepted by the people. This is a matter that concerns the people and not just the government alone. So prepare the people, officials of the government, and ready them to wage the field of jihad. The overwhelming majority of the people is yearning to a paradise that straddles the full extent of the heavens and earth. Here is an opportunity for the people and the government to become integrated together, body and soul, when the people hear the government issuing forth the call to jihad. "God shall support he who upholds Him, for God is powerful and noble." God will not abandon us when He sees that we are sincerely determined to work for the sake of His saying "Or have you assumed that you will enter paradise when God still know not who among you have embarked on jihad and who are the patient." On the Day of Reckoning "Those whose faces shine with honor will live eternally in the mercy of God."

GOVERNMENT'S BIRTH CONTROL CAMPAIGN ATTACKED

Cairo AL-DA'WAH in Arabic Jul 80 pp 50, 51

[Article by Rabih Radi: "Look Around You--Another Moslem Baby!"]

[Text] "Look around you: A new baby is born every 24 seconds!" This strange, but most cleverly designed, public announcement has appeared on television screens and on the pages of magazines and newspapers. Another announcement along this line opened with two quotations from the hadith of the Prophet (God bless him). The first quotation was falsely attributed to him, while the second was said in a different context and for a different reason.

The first quotation goes like this: "The Prophet, God bless him, used to implore God for protection from 'juhd al-bala'.' When the Companions asked him one day what he meant by 'juhd al-bala', the Prophet said: 'it means too many children while there is a dearth of things.' "The second quotation runs as follows: "It is better for you to produce offsprings who are rich rather than offsprings who would be a burden, living off others." The two quotations are then followed by a list of names and addresses of birth control centers and by the greetings of the information and education unit in the General Information Authority.

It is clear that the people in charge of these public campaigns are directing their efforts at Moslems, in view of the quotations from the hadith, and because the Egyptian Coptic Church and the Roman Catholic Church in the Vatican prohibit birth control or family planning.

The quotation is not from the hadith and does not mean that one should limit his family to ward off adversity. What it actually means is that one should ward off adversity by hard work and the raising of a good and able Moslem generation in fulfillment of God's call: "Marry and procreate and you shall proliferate, and I shall then proudly hold you aloft among nations on the Day of Reckoning."

The second quotation from the hadith cited by the Information Authority is self-evident, for it is natural that a Moslem will do well to make his offsprings and heirs rich and affluent rather than poor and destitute. This proves that the idea behind that quotation from the hadith is to encourage work and struggle so that one's heirs are not left poor. This stands to reason and is not intended to admonish Moslems to restrict birth.

It is clear by now that those in charge of this campaign are either parrots unwittingly repeating what is dictated to them from outside the lands of Islam through foreign organizations, or agents seeking to weaken Islam and Moslems.

Otherwise, why is this campaign targeted against the Moslems alone? And why is the hadith being used mischievously and perversely to promote ideas that are quite removed from its true purpose?

The public announcement says: "Look around you, a new baby is born every 24 seconds." I say in reply: "Look around you, where is the plumber? Look around you, where is the mechanic? Look around you, where is the able engineer? Look around you, where is the teacher of Arabic and other languages and mathematics? Look around you in the countryside, where is the agricultural worker? Look around you, where are the skilled construction laborers?"

That Rabid Campaign

How can such a rabid organized campaign be launched when the country is suffering from a severe shortage in trained labor, to the extent that Korean construction companies, for example, had to build al-Salam hotel in Heliopolis and construct a huge building in Garden City. Egypt has never before suffered a shortage of trained labor as it is experiencing now. Herein then lies an extremely peculiar equation. The first part of the equation says that the population is increasing at a great speed. The second part says that there is a severe shortage in labor to the extent that there is a shortage of several thousands of Arabic language teachers, for example, and that the wage of an agricultural worker in the countryside has reached two pounds a day for a few hours' work.

The problem facing the country is not actually one of population growth. The human factor of the population is one of the elements of strength in nations and one of the sources of wealth in a state. Ultimately, however, the question is that of the efficient use or the misuse of available resources including--in fact, primarily--the human resource. Japan, for example, has a population of a hundred million people living in a group of islands that are poor in raw materials. And yet Japan managed to become a major power not by controlling its population of 100 million people but by training them well and building up their skills and abilities.

And the United States, with a population of more than 200 million people, yearly opens its doors to thousands of immigrants and is considered to be the richest and most powerful nation on earth. Most American states prohibit abortion, except for medical or health reasons, and encourage population growth, because population growth is not the problem. Rather the problem is how to educate and train the people and increase their skills.

The Jewish state of Israel was established through the usurpation of a small portion of Palestine. Compared to the size of Egypt, Israel is still a small state, and yet it is seeking by all means to bring in more immigrants and is trying to develop the Negev desert.

Poverty Is the Fruit of Communism

Israel is also a case of how the human factor is put to good use. On the other end of the spectrum is a state such as the Communist state of Aden and Cuba. Nearly half of the population of Aden has emigrated, and yet the remaining population is living in abject poverty--so much so that at one time citizens of that country were searching for food in garbage cans. Cuba, meanwhile, has turned its population into a mercenary army working for the Soviets in return for food.

If we take sisterly Sudan, we find it a country of vast areas of good farming land and ample water resources. And yet these areas are not being planted and farmed. Why? Because of the lack of the efficient use of the available human resources. Jordan is a country with a very small population and it survives on Arab and foreign aid.

Therefore, we say that the real problem is not that of the growth of population or the lack of a large population. It is rather the efficient use of available resources, including the most important resource--the human being. In Egypt, even if the population dwindled to a million people, we will still have poverty and problems. The transportation crisis began when Egypt's population was 20 million people. The crisis began immediately after the nationalization measures and had nothing to do with the increase or decrease of the population. The housing crisis began with the beginning of the socialist era and did not emerge when the population reached 40 million people.

The meat crisis is not due to the increase in the numbers of mouths that need to eat meat, but to the misapplication of agrarian reform laws and the leasing of agricultural lands. The leasing resulted in the fragmentation of land which in turn made it impossible for land owners or tenants to raise cattle and livestock because there were not large enough areas of land for cattle to graze.

The Problem Not That of Population Growth

The problem is Egypt then is not that of population growth. The real problem lies in the fact that the centralized form of the state absolutely does not help to activate or advance economic life. We have simply taken the outer crust of decentralization, not its substance. The presidential prerogatives which were given to the governors are of no value except in the case of appointing or transferring employees. As long as financial appropriations come from the central government in Cairo, we will remain in this state of backwardness. But if each governorate had its independent source of revenue, in the sense that a governorate will send to the central government nothing but the taxes that are necessary for defense and foreign policy affairs, while retaining the rest of the revenue it raises from taxes and fees, and if the governor, the mayors and the legislative council of a governorate are elected, say for a period of 5 years, and finally if a governorate is completely independent with regard to appointing, firing, promoting and determining the salaries and allowances of its employees--then such a system will produce real wealth in Egypt. Roads would be built, regional and community colleges and institutes would be established and regional and community newspapers and information media would emerge. The result would be unprecedented revival and progress.

It is regrettable that years after Port Sa'id was declared a free zone, the city is still without an international airport and without an elevated bridge linking it to the other bank of the Suez Canal, so that the city can geographically expand. Nothing of the sort can be done at all because the revenues from the free zone go in full to the central government in Cairo. But if the city were placed under a free popular supervision, Port Sa'id would today be no less thriving than Hong Kong or Singapore.

I wish to add too that family planning has not advanced the cause of progress in the country. The unsuccessful educational system each year turns out thousands of graduates who cannot find anything profitable to do except wait to be appointed in some working capacity. And when they are employed, those graduates do nothing but sign in and sign out every day, without really producing, because they are incapable of doing anything useful in the first place in view of the fact that the present educational system does not bring forth the creative talents of the individual or bring up an individual with an independent mind, strong will and stiff determination who can plow ahead and chart his own course in life. The educational system in fact produces nothing but misfits. And so we in Egypt are suffering from the misuse of the resources available to us, including the human resources, because of the centralized system of government and the failure of the present educational system.

I would like to remind the gentlemen who have become professional family planners that the early Moslems, the soldiers of the Prophet, God bless him and grant him salvation, were few in number. But he brought them up capably and efficiently and they in turn became the builders of the most powerful states and kingdoms in their age and the proponents of a grant Islamic nation and civilization. That great development ultimately was the result of the efficient use, upbringing and training of the human element, that is the Moslem individual.

JOINT MEETING OF ISLAMIC CONFERENCE, ARAB LEAGUE

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 24 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Klibi: It Is Time For the USA to Abandon Their Total Alinement With Israel" "Chatty: 850 Million Muslims Are Impatient to Free El Qods"]

[Text] In his address at the opening of the joint meeting of the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, Chedii Klibi particularly stated:

"We are living in a time when Arabs and Muslims are equally confronted with various civilizational, cultural and intellectual challenges and are facing the expansionist plans of Israel, who does not hesitate to raise a sacrilegious hand to the places to worship and to trample underfoot human values, always ignoring the censure of world conscience.

"To establish communities, with the results that such an undertaking creates, in the area of solidarity and political and economic cooperation shows one of the characteristics of our times--an imperative for international action. We have witnessed the birth of solid and powerful communities, joining peoples who had little in common and who had even been separated by a deeply rooted hostility throughout history. The Arab world and the Muslim world also are in the best position to draw nearer, come together and cooperate, even more since they both have been bathed in the fire of the struggle for liberation, since the majority of their peoples has suffered foreign domination and since they swore to guarantee dignity and invulnerability.

"In fact the dangers to which our peoples are exposed are many, as are the problems with which they are faced, but there is every reason to believe that nothing threatens them as much as what is developing in Palestine, this piece of the Arab homeland, whose cause is considered by all Arabs, in Machrek and in Maghreb, and by all Muslims, wherever they may be, as being theirs.

"The decision recently passed by the Knesset declaring El Qods the eternal capital of Israel clearly showed up to what extreme the Zionist regime could go, not only in the non-recognition of the rights of the Palestinian people, but in contempt for the feelings of the whole Arab and Muslim nation.

"The increasingly serious aggressions that Israel is multiplying against Lebanese territory--the last to date being the large-scale military operation launched Tuesday against Arnoun and the region that surrounds it, followed the next day by the bombardment of Nabatyeh, of Tyr and of the Palestinian refugee camps--are only one aspect of an expansionist policy aiming to thrust aside any possibility of a just peace based on respect for the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

"The resolution recently passed by the Security Council is a test of the international community's ability to guarantee the effectiveness of its decisions and the credibility of its commitments.

"The international community can not any longer be contented with condemning Israeli aggressions, even more since by the measures it has just taken and by the whitewashing of these aggressions, whether they are in the occupied territories or in Southern Lebanon, Israel confirms that it is very little concerned about international legality. We also demand that one go beyond simple condemnations and that one put an end to aggression.

"It is time that the United States abandons its total alinement with Israel, an alinement having as a pretext their security needs, and that it proceeds to examine its positions. The Zionist regime having proven that it was continuing to defy the international conscience and was pursuing the putting into operation of its plans for aggression and the achievement of its expansionist aims, it is time that those who are hesitating listen carefully to the call of the Arab and Muslim nation, concerned about defending international legality and giving their support to every resolution imposing the appropriate measures for bringing Israel to its senses.

"At this opportunity that we have to coordinate Arab and Muslim efforts, we must proclaim before the entire world that the Arabs are at the end of their patience and that, strong in our proper rights and in international legality, we ask the world to take up its responsibilities and to take all useful measures for honoring its commitments.

"In this regard, we can only express the hope of seeing the Iranian revolution rid itself of the aftermath of the imperial regime and work conscientiously and seriously to strengthen stability in the area, thanks to relations of cooperation and understanding with the neighboring Arab states. This is the most appropriate means for supporting the Palestinian cause and guaranteeing the solidarity of the nations of the area in the face of all threats.

"As long as El Qods and the other occupied territories remain under submission to Zionist power, as long as the Palestinian people are deprived of their homeland and of their right to build a state, like all other peoples, the struggle of the Arab and Muslim nation will have to go on and all the means at their disposal will have to be set in operation to correct this injustice.

"What His Highness Prince Fahd advocated was good, when he asked that the struggle to which we are pledged be considered as a holy war for which we must mobilize all our energy, all our means, whether they be in the areas of politics, information or economy, in addition to military means.

"The favorable reception accorded this call represents the determination of our peoples to take up the battle seriously and resolutely.

"And since we are decided to not let ourselves be defeated or humiliated, we are certain to triumph, precisely because of our cooperation among ourselves and the efforts that we are putting forth in international agreements, which gives importance to our two organizations. But this cooperation demands the blending of tasks, accuracy in arrangement and an objective vision..."

For his part, Habib Chatty stated:

"On 20 June 1980 an important and constructive meeting took place in Jeddah, which allowed the two secretaries general to examine the prospects for cooperation, the achievement of which the two organizations aspire to, this cooperation having to strengthen Arab-Muslim solidarity in everything relating to the understanding of problems that concern Arabs and Muslims...

"What contributes to making the achievement of this ambition easier is the very nature of Arab-Muslim ties since the birth of Islam. The Arabs have raised high the banner of this religion, which they spread in the farthest regions of East and West. Today 850 million persons are Muslims. They are all impatient to free El Qods and to put an end to the hateful Zionist occupation of the Palestinian Arab land.

"Some are trying to sow dissension between the Arabs and the non-Arab Muslims. Arab nationalism, they allege, calls for the union of a limited community of Muslims, which does not correspond to the Islamic movement that calls for the unity of all of 'Omma.' We are gathered here to produce the proof that the two movements are complementary, that the unity of the Arabs is an indispensable element for the achievement of the ambitions of the Islamic peoples.

"The need to create community bodies that promote the achievement of common goals arose in the western world from recent political doctrines. The idea of 'assembling' in the Muslim world is found in the teachings of Islam, which call the faithful to show proof of solidarity for the triumph of good and of the faith.

The Islamic Conference, created the day after the aggression perpetrated against the El Qods Mosque at the end of 1389 (Hegira calendar) is aimed at strengthening Islamic solidarity and cooperation among the member countries in economic, cultural, social and scientific areas. It fights against racial segregation and colonialism in all its forms and contributes to the strengthening of peace and international security based on justice. This organization also aims at coordinating efforts to protect the holy places and to support the struggle of the Palestinian people to recover their rights and the liberation of their lands. It supports the struggle of all the Islamic peoples to preserve their dignity, their independence and their national rights. The Islamic Conference finally undertakes to foster an adequate environment for better cooperation and better understanding among the member states and other states.

"By annexing El Qods and proclaiming this holy city the eternal capital of the Zionist entity, the common enemy only shows defiance and provocation in the place belonging to Arabs and Muslims."

ISLAMIC CONFERENCE, ARAB LEAGUE REAFFIRM SUPPORT FOR PALESTINIAN STATE

[Text] Here is the joint communique made public at the end of the sessions of the joint meeting of the Islamic Conference and the League of Arab States, following the talks that took place at the headquarters of the Secretary General's Office of the Islamic Conference in Jeddah between Chedii Klibi, secretary general of the League of Arab States and Habib Chatty, secretary general of the Islamic Conference, following the joint communique published at the close of their meeting on 14 June 1980.

Out of concern for strengthening the spirit of Arab-Islamic solidarity and in response to an invitation from the Secretary General of the League of Arab States, a joint meeting including high level delegates from both organizations was held from 23 to 24 August 1980 in Tunis under the presidence of Chedii Klibi and Habib Chatty and with the participation of Baccari Diami and Mohamed Ben Slama, assistant secretaries general for legal affairs respectively of the Islamic Conference and the League of Arab States; Hamza Robbana, director of the Office of the Secretary General of the Islamic Conference; Hichem Mustapha Fares, director of the El Qods and Palestine divisions for the Islamic Conference, and Moncef El Mav, adviser of the Secretary General of the League of Arab States.

During the meeting the participants reviewed the issues that are troubling both organizations, especially the most recent events of the situation in occupied Palestine after Israel's decision to annex the Arab sector, El Qods, and to consider this holy place as the "eternal capital of the Zionist entity."

Both organizations reviewed the results of the meeting of the El Qods Committee that was held from 16 to 18 August 1980 in Casablanca and the stands of the League of Arab States. Moreover, they exchanged views on the measures taken. The two delegations affirmed the determination of the Arab and Islamic states to intensify the battle to confront the provocations launched by the Zionist entity in order to free El Qods from the yoke of occupation and to allow the Palestinian people, led by the PLO, to achieve self-determination, to recover their legitimate rights and to build an independent state on their territory.

The two delegations succeeded in completing a cooperation agreement between the Arab and Islamic organizations.

This agreement rests on the appropriate means to establish cooperation between the two organizations for developing brotherly relations between the Islamic and Arab countries in the areas of politics, economics, culture, science and information, and all of this within the framework of strengthening ties of brotherhood and protecting Arab-Muslim civilization, which is governed by the principles of justice and tolerance.

This cooperation is made within the framework of coordinating efforts to achieve more progress for the benefit of the Arab and Islamic communities and with the aim of protecting their common interests and fighting against colonialism, racism and exploitation in all their forms to strengthen these countries' safety and peace in the world.

The two organizations consented that the agreement be signed by the secretaries general of both groups and that it be passed on to the headquarters of the Secretary General's Office of the Islamic Conference in Jeddah for the exchange of documents, after their approval by the Council of the League of Arab States and the Conference of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic countries.

ISLAMIC CONFERENCE'S JURISTS BEGIN WORK IN COMMITTEE

[Article: "Start of Work of the Committee of Jurists of the Islamic Conference"]

[Text] The committee of jurists entrusted with giving an opinion on the criminal practices committed by Israel in occupied Palestine began its work yesterday morning in the Hilton Hotel in Tunis.

The opening session of this meeting, which was presided over by Habib Chatty, secretary general of the Islamic Conference Organization, was attended by Dr Charfeddin Birzada, Pakistani minister of justice; Osman Goudiam, president of the Higher Council of the Bench of Senegal and member of the commission of the United Nations entrusted with investigating the crimes of Israel; Ambassador Midoune Val, former president of the United Nations committee for the immutable rights of the Palestinian people; Dr Mohamed Saker (Jordan); Walid Arafat (Palestine); Aberrahman El Hila, Mustapha Filali (Tunisia), as well as a delegation from the Islamic Conference.

In his address, Chatty stated that this meeting is held in accordance with the recommendations of the special session of the Conference of Foreign Affairs Ministers of Islamic Countries that was held in Amman last July. This session had entrusted the secretary general of the Islamic Conference with studying in cooperation with five jurists the measures to take on the international level regarding Israel's racist policy and its criminal practices, practices whose aim is to drive the Palestinian people from their homeland, to plunder their rights by employing repression and terrorism, to pursue the establishment of settlements for the Judaization of Palestine, and this beyond the recently enacted law decreeing El Qods the eternal capital of the Zionist state in occupied Palestine.

CAMP DAVID ISSUE DISRUPTS ARAB LAWYERS' CONFERENCE

Cairo AL-AHRAR in Arabic 7 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by Layla 'Abd al-Salam: "AL-AHRAR Is First Newspaper To Record Details of Events at Arab Lawyers' Conference in Rabat; Delegations of Rejection States Declare: 'We have Come Specifically To Attack Egypt'"]

[Text] The Arab Lawyers' Conference in Rabat developed into an arena for political disputes and splits. The rejection states launched a vicious attack against Egypt. The Syrian lawyers split into two groups: those sent by the government and those representing the now disbanded Lawyers' Association.

The conference began its activities in an opening session in the Marrakash City Hall presided over by King Hassan II of Morocco. King Hassan delivered a speech in which he said: "The Arab world is currently passing through a crisis of freedom and a crisis of law. For what has become of the search for truth? And what has become of the championing of right? And what has become of respect for the law?"

The conference began its meetings in the Hilton Hotel with 1,500 lawyers in attendance, including 300 from Egypt. The heads of the delegations delivered their addresses in succession. The spark which ignited the conference was set off when the head of the Iraqi delegation launched an attack on the Egyptian regime and the Camp David agreements. This aroused one of the members of the Egyptian delegation, and the commotion in the conference intensified. The situation became more and more critical, finally ending in a fight involving the use of chairs between the Egyptian lawyers and the Iraqi delegates. Both sides began cheering their respective countries, the Syrian and Palestinian lawyers joining in with the Iraqi delegation.

Amid the fighting with chairs and the conflicting catcalls, conference chairman Muhammad Ouldghiri threatened to dismiss the meeting. With extreme difficulty, Ahmad al-Khawajah, the leader of the Egyptian lawyers, was able to mount the platform and lead a cheer for Egypt and Palestine. Then, one of the members recited verses from the Koran until the storm quieted down. Ahmad al-Khawajah was finally able to get the conference under control. Some members of the Egyptian delegation announced that they were withdrawing. The storm erupted a second time when the chairman of the conference requested that the delegation heads limit their speeches to 5 minutes. The delegations from the rejection states announced that they had come from their countries specifically to attack Egypt!

Seven Egyptians Expelled

Following the conclusion of this stormy session, the Permanent Office held a meeting in which it was decided to expel seven Egyptian lawyers from the conference. These lawyers were Ibrahim al-'Azizi, Sa'id al-Far, Ibrahim Jadu, Mustafa 'Abbas, 'Atif al-Jawhari, 'Abd-al-'Al 'Arjun and Mahir Muhammad 'Ali. The office decided not to expel 'Ali Mansur.

Arab Lawyers' Federation president Ahmad al-Khawajah and federation member Salah al-Sayyid abstained from voting on the expulsion of the Egyptians.

Mahir Muhammad 'Ali submitted a complaint to conference chairman Muhammad Ouldghiri in which he said: "This decision is invalid because it was issued by a majority without a quorum. The decision was issued without verification and failed to take into account the following facts:

"All that occurred was that the Egyptian delegation protested against statements issued by the Syrian and Palestinian delegation heads touching on Arab national considerations. After the Iraqi delegation head got through criticizing and rejecting the Camp David agreement, he proceeded to address the Egyptian people with inflammatory propaganda against their regime. Similarly, after the head of the Palestinian delegation got through criticizing and rejecting the Camp David agreement, he began to attack the current leadership of Egypt. The latter action was what prompted the protest. This is borne out by the fact that while nearly all the unions made criticisms of Camp David and some of their representatives issued strong statements, the Egyptian delegation did not protest against this, because every opinion should be respected. The protest was made because of the departure from the general framework of proper discussion into personal attacks."

Mahir Muhammad 'Ali continued: "The time has come for the conference to put an end to aggression and bickering and follow the noble formula advocated by the sponsor of our conference, King Hassan II, who called on us to deal with one another within a framework of conciliation, tolerance and objectivity. Therefore, we urgently request the following:

"1. The formal invalidation of the decision to expel the Egyptians and the rejection of this decision in substance.

"2. A demand for the rectification of the situation and the questioning of those who have attacked our delegation and our homeland.

"3. The directing of the delegation heads and speakers to omit inappropriate remarks and exercise objectivity when discussing matters."

However, the permanent office did not look into the complaint of the expelled member of the Egyptian delegation!

Split in the Egyptian Delegation

The meeting of the permanent office concluded with the distribution of the conference work to eight committees dealing with the following areas: the Arab homeland, public freedoms, regulation of the legal profession, the combating of colonialism, Palestine, the Arab economy, jurists, and fundamental law.

The Arab homeland committee was one of the most important committees in the conference. It consisted of 500 members under the chairmanship of the Egyptian association head, Ahmad al-Khawajah, and continued its activities for 12 consecutive hours.

The discussions of most of the delegations focused on the issue of the Arab-Zionist struggle. In the context of how to deal with this problem, most Arab delegations were in agreement on a unified position on the issue. This was not true for the Egyptian delegation, however, which split into two groups, one for and the other against [Camp David]. However, even the pro-Camp David faction asserted that the main problem for the Arab nation is the elimination of colonialism, beginning with the Zionist entity. It attempted to justify its support for Camp David by asserting that the purpose behind this support was to gain the power to confront the enemy. However, this group met with strong opposition from the other Arab delegations and two members of the Egyptian delegation, Ahmad Nasir and Muhammad Fahim.

Most of the Arab delegations agreed that the achievement of freedom for Arab man is a fundamental step on the road to confronting the Zionist enemy. Most delegations were also in agreement that Arab funds (from the oil states) should be invested in the Arab and Third World states rather than in the banks of the developed capitalist countries, and especially America and Western Europe.

The European Initiative

The Palestinian delegation on the committee focused on the European initiative regarding the Arab-Zionist struggle. It asserted that this initiative does not go any further than the American position on the Arab-Zionist struggle. In fact, the delegation asserted, the statement issued by the European Common Market states on 6 November 1973 is devoid of any meaning since it was remarked in the recent European summit meeting that some progress had to be achieved in the European position and the initiative failed to accomplish this. Particular areas in which progress was required were the instatement of the Palestinian people as a primary side in the existing struggle; the recognition of the PLO as a legal representative; and the recognition of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and the establishment of their own national state.

The Iraqi and Jordanian delegations raised the question of Gulf security, the so-called Iranian threat to the Arab character of the Gulf, and the American presence in the Gulf and the Arabian Sea. They called for adherence to the pan-Arab charter proposed by Iraq as a minimum measure to counter foreign ambitions in the Arab homeland.

The delegations were in agreement that Arab problems should be solved through dialog and peaceful means, and they called for all Arab disputes to be overcome.

The committee also discussed the Lebanon problem, focusing particularly on the Zionist interventions aimed at destroying the unity and Arab character of Lebanon and eliminating the Palestinian revolution's presence on Lebanese soil. The delegations called for the provision of material support to the Palestinian revolution and Lebanon. The Lebanese delegation applauded the unity which presently exists between the Palestinian revolution and the Lebanese National Movement in the cause of the defense of Lebanon's unity and Arab character. As for the members of the Egyptian delegation opposed to the Camp David agreement, Muhammad Fahim spoke of them in the Arab homeland committee chaired by Ahmad al-Khawajah. Mr Fahim said that Egypt cannot do without the Arab states and the Arab states cannot do without Egypt, and he refuted the claims made by some members of the Egyptian delegation who defended the Camp David agreement. These members were 'Umar Khattab, 'Ali Mansur and Bathinah al-Tawil.

In reply to Muhammad Fahim, these three lawyers stressed that the Arab problem can only be solved through peace, not through force. People's Assembly member Bathinah al-Tawil stated: "The tanks, planes and guns of the entire Arab homeland combined would not be able to liberate the usurped lands after we discovered that we were fighting America rather than Israel."

'Umar Khattab spoke about the rule of law and the freedom of the Egyptian citizen, but was interrupted by Ahmad Nasir, who said: "You are a liar. A lawyer is now being tried in Egypt for expressing his free opinion."

At this point, an uproar broke out in the hall. Committee chairman Ahmad al-Khawajah then expelled Ahmad Nasir from the session, saying to him: "Leave, Ahmad." Shouts of protest were raised by members of the Iraqi delegation who demanded that attention be focused on the content of the pan-Arab charter proposed by Saddam Husayn and their rejection of the Camp David agreement and all agreements connected with it.

The Palestinians emphasized that the recovery of Palestine can take place only through armed struggle. They rejected the current settlements in the area, and especially the Camp David agreement. They emphasized the freedom of decision of the Palestinians and called on the Arab states to free the fedayeen organizations from tutelage and dependency.

They rejected the claim made by some members of the Egyptian delegation that there is no substitute for the Camp David agreements.

The delegations from Iraq, Syria, Jordan and Palestine joined in a shouting demonstration saluting Egypt as the birthplace of the free man Ahmad Nasir.

At this point, committee chairman Ahmad al-Khawajah decided to dismiss the session because of the disorder and the disagreements among the members of the delegations.

Attack on Camp David

The Palestine committee was chaired by Yasir 'Amru, the leader of the association of Palestinian lawyers in the occupied lands. The task of this committee was to discuss the Palestinian situation in the occupied lands, in particular, as well as the overall Palestinian situation. Ahmad Nasir joined the delegations of Palestine, Syria, Jordan and Iraq in an attack on the Camp David agreement and the Egyptian information media which have deceived the Egyptian people into believing that the Arab states chose to isolate Egypt and withhold aid from it following the October war.

When Mahir Muhammad attempted to join the Palestine committee, Yasir 'Amru expelled him.

When asked the reason for this action, Yasir 'Amru said: "There is a decision from the permanent office, which I endorse, expelling him from the conference."

Next, some of the Egyptian lawyers who support the Camp David agreement and defend the reasons which led to the signing of this agreement spoke. They said that the Arab world had chosen to isolate Egypt and withhold all aid from it, particularly after the October war.

Ahmad Nasir and certain members of the Syrian, Iraqi and Morocco delegations responded to the Egyptians, saying that their statements were incorrect and that aid was cut off from Egypt because it had joined forces with American and Zionist imperialism.

Ahmad Nasir said: "This agreement is against the people of Egypt and the Arab nation, and the previous Egyptian People's Assembly was dissolved because some of its members were opposed to the Camp David agreement."

Cheers for Ahmad Nasir

The Jordanian delegation requested that a moment of silence be observed in memory of the late Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir. The Jordanian delegation then observed this moment of silence and was joined by the rest of the delegations along with Ahmad Nasir. After the observance, the Syrians and Iraqis cheered Ahmad Nasir.

One of the Palestinians called on the Arab states and the confrontation states to open their borders to the activity of the Palestinian guerrillas. The discussions also touched on the criminal actions which Israel carried out against the mayors of Nabulus and Ramallah.

The committee on the rights and freedoms of man and the rule of law, which was chaired by the leader of the lawyers' association of Iraq, discussed the rights of Arab man in the Arab countries. The Syrian lawyers spoke about the coercion, imprisonment and arrests plaguing the citizens of Syria. They said that all the rights of the citizens have been eliminated and only the members of the regime have any rights or freedoms. One of the most moved of these speakers was an individual who had been a member of the now disbanded Council of the Association of Syrian Lawyers. The adherents of the present regime in Syria clashed with the Syrian lawyers, who had called for rights and freedom for the people of their nation.

The delegate from Sudan said: "It is impossible for us to accept the fact that our brothers in Syria have been imprisoned and other representatives have come forward to represent the association, and the issue is not to debate the Syrian regime. I call for the release of all association members in Syria and the immediate restoration of the legitimate association."

The head of the lawyers' association of Algeria said: "Why single out Syria. Why not mention Libya. The legal profession in Libya has been abolished permanently."

At the conclusion of the conference, the Egyptian lawyers issued a statement in which they stated that many citizens of the brother Arab states do not enjoy the same climate of freedom as that which exists in Egypt at the present time. The statement conveyed a true picture of the freedom, democracy and rule of law which Egypt has enjoyed since the corrective revolution and the establishment of a permanent Egyptian constitution. The statement said that every Egyptian can express his opinion with complete freedom, even if it is contrary to the opinion of the government, as is evidenced by the fact that the Egyptian lawyers participating in the conference included some individuals who are opposed to certain decisions of the Egyptian Government and openly declare their opposition.

EXILED WEST BANK MAYOR ATTACKS ISRAEL, U.S.

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 12 Jul 80 p 18

[Report on interview with West Bank Mayor Fahd al-Qawasimi, by AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM correspondent, in Amman; date not given]

[Text] Shaykh Raja al-Tamimi, Sharia magistrate of Hebron, said that he and his colleagues--Fahd al-Qawasimi, mayor of Hebron, and Muhammad Milhim, mayor of Halhul--who were exiled by the Israeli authorities, will undertake a trip to the Arab countries at the beginning of the month of Ramadan.

"We are waiting for the decision of the Israeli court," Mr Milhim told AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM. "If the decision is in our favor, and we are allowed to return, we shall certainly return. If we are not allowed to return, we shall study every possibility of applying more pressure on the occupation authorities, so that we may return one way or another."

Mayor al-Qawasimi said: "We realize that the road of the struggle is long and difficult. It is full of violence and suffering. However, we must pursue it. The homeland will not return to us through mere hopes and prayers, but by cutting off more hands, feet and heads. The current tragedy of our people at home, or the real extent of the Israeli practices, cannot be imagined by anyone but those who are subject to them. The Zionists do not want to merely exile and destroy the nationalist leaders. They are now actually determined to kill the Palestinian people. The bombs planted in Jerusalem and Hebron, the murders in Bir Zayt, and the killing of female students in Bethlehem, as well as other daily practices, are nothing but definite proof that they want the land and do not want the local people to remain on it. They want the land, and want to drive the local people out. There is no more doubt about this. However, the will of the people has always been victorious, and we shall win."

"Europe has started to become aware," Mr al-Qawasimi said with reference to the reaction of public opinion in Europe to Israeli crimes, "that the Israeli Zionists are the real Nazi killers, not the Palestinian people. Both their real faces and intentions are being unmasked for the first time. In 45 days of continuous extensive and sustained efforts, we have been able to ascertain that many [new] concepts are currently taking root in Europe and the United States. While this is only a beginning, there is no doubt that, if this development continues, it will have a tremendous influence not only on European and American public opinion, but also on European and American intentions.

"Since we were able for the first time to speak and find increasingly interested listeners, we addressed European and American public opinion through the television networks and the various media. We spoke through the press, and we gave talks, even at Harvard University. We spoke with officials everywhere. We even spoke with Jews. We spoke with them there. We did so in order to give a true picture everywhere. That is what happened during our 45-day trip."

[Question] What about the appropriate response to the American attitude, which is opposed to our nation and our cause?

[Answer] We have become used to the fact that America and the colonialist powers respect no one but the strong. We have to utilize the same method used by the United States. When the Soviet Union exiled the Zionist Sakharov, the United States cut off wheat shipments to the Soviet Union. When the Iranian students took 50 employees of the American embassy in Tehran hostage, the United States mobilized all its fleets, in the East and in the West, and tried to invade Iran. The United States even imposed an economic blockade of Iran, and asked Europe to do the same thing.

Let me ask you: as Arabs, do we not have such weapons at our disposal? Do we possess no such weapons? We can have all these weapons at our command. We have the Arab funds through which we can paralyze the pace of construction and progress, as well as financial, economic and monetary growth in the United States. We have Arab oil which represents the sinews of life both in America and Europe. Are we incapable of concentrating our determination--even for one single month--to face the despots who persist in supporting the deceit of our enemy, and provide this enemy with weapons of death and destruction to annihilate our people?

Zionist Swallowing Up of Land

[Question] What about Zionist ambitions regarding Arab land?

[Answer] If I speak about this topic, some people may accuse me of being pessimistic. However, I want to tell the truth. Zionist ambitions do not stop at Palestine. The best proof of this is their current attempt to swallow up the occupied Syrian heights and Sinai. They are not even satisfied with that, and are actually waiting for further opportunities. After succeeding in swallowing up and digesting the currently occupied territories, they will move to other areas. What is there to prevent them from reaching Damascus, Beirut and Medina itself, as long as we have no Arab force at our command capable of stopping them and checking their arrogance?

Waste of Time

[Question] What about calls for peace as a way to obtain our rights?

[Answer] There are those who are now talking about peace and lying to their people, especially certain leaders of our nation. They imagine that following the lead of our enemies could help us obtain our rights. Or they imagine that the European nations, or a Geneva conference or the United Nations, could direct us to the right road. The truth is that all this is a bunch of lies. In fact, all these solutions are a mere waste of time, a mere comedy, an attempt to put the Arab people and the Palestinian people to sleep. The road of resistance and struggle is clear. Liberation can be achieved only with the help of the noble Palestinian Arab rifle. [end of answer]

With regard to the possibility of unilateral application of the Camp David agreements, mayor al-Qawasimi said: "The fact is that this is impossible, unless they are imposed on the people of the occupied land by force, just as occupation itself was. Our people shall never willingly agree to let [the Israelis] establish any form of autonomous government. They will never be able to do so, because you will never find among our people anybody willing to submit his candidacy for election. You will never find among our people anybody willing to cast his vote for such an operation. However, if [the Israelis] want to impose autonomy by force of arms, as they imposed their presence and are currently imposing their settlements on us, this is something else. The occupation is there, not according to our wishes, but against our will."

New Sowing of the Land

With regard to response to the operations of liquidation and deportation, Mayor al-Qawasimi said: "Practical suggestions about retaliating against liquidations and deportations are to intensify the fight. You have to intensify the fight, O you people who are at home with every act of liquidation and deportation, the fire of the struggle must be fanned and the popular uprising must be escalated.

"The occupation must know that the acts of liquidation and deportation of a number of leaders of the occupied land, such as mayors of cities, will not stop the revolution in Hebron, Ramallah, Nablus or elsewhere. Our cities shall continue to resist and oppose the occupation of its methods.

"This is the only course open to our people in the occupied land. Abroad we have become weary of news speculation, contacts and peace-making efforts lacking forcefulness and originating from deceitful people. There must be real, practical response to those things. Practical response can only be based on more preparation and greater cohesion between the Arab leaders and their peoples. There must be more self-reliance, more determination to fight, more stress on liberation. This is the way to stop Zionist aggression, deportation and the liquidation of Palestinian citizens."

"With reference to the Palestinians who are abroad, we tell them: 'Intensify your fight and your struggle; intensify your revolutionary violence; sow the land with mines and guns; and sow the land with corpses of victims.' We are ready for martyrdom and self-sacrifice."

Regarding the proper way to strengthen [the people in] the occupied territories, Mayor al-Qawasimi said: "The way of financial support is a long one. We do not want at this point to put our people to sleep. Do you believe that the liberation of Palestine can be achieved with the help of $50 million or $100 million, which we may be given by wealthy Arab countries? We actually want this money to be put to use and sent to the fighters to buy guns. We want this money to be sent to Jordan and Syria to buy guns. We want weapons and an honorable fight. We do not want more villas and high-rise buildings in the Arab homeland. We want a war society."

Arab Character of Jerusalem Changed

Regarding Judaization efforts in the occupied areas, Mayor al-Qawasimi said: "Judaization actually goes back to 1967. We told Arab officials many times about it, but they did not believe us. However, I can give you a true picture of the situation. More than 1.25 million donums of land have been confiscated, I tell you. With reference to Jerusalem, let me tell you: there are 100,000 Israelis in Arab Jerusalem. More than 30,000 houses belonging to the Jews have been built in Arab Jerusalem. In spite of this, we still claim that Jerusalem is Arab, and that it will be returned through some compromise with the help of friends of those who support Israel! Is this possible?"

End to Occupation

Regarding the future of the Palestinian question, Mayor al-Qawasimi said: "The future is ours. However, as a people, we want to alleviate our children's suffering in the occupied homeland and shorten the long journey. The end is inevitable, and history will repeat itself. The Israelis will be defeated some day, and they will be crushed. This is what we told them. We said it in Hebron on 23 March 1980, at the Hebron conference. We told them when they wanted to settle in the heart of Hebron: 'Come back to your senses. See how the British Empire, on which the sun previously never set, collapsed in Great Britain itself, where it fell to pieces. Look at Hitler and the Nazis who imagined that they could occupy the world, who reached Stalingrad and Leningrad, and spread all over Europe. Germany collapsed and fell apart, and it now gravitates in the orbit of America. As to you Zionists, your fate will be the same.'

"However, we, the Palestinian people, want things to go faster. We want to see the liberation of Palestine with our own eyes. We want to see our young men, daughters and children no longer deprived of whatever we have been deprived of. We want to see our young men, children and young women lead, in their own country, a happy and stable life. This was denied to us, to the generation of the 1948 defeat and the 1967 relapse, and to the victims of the violations and catastrophes which have hit the cause and afflicted our people."

Facts and Data

With regard to the implications of the decisions of the United Nations, the silence of the Islamic world and the collusion and deceit of the American Government, Mayor al-Qawasimi said: "The United Nations has been unable to implement the decision concerning the return of three Palestinians to their country, from which they were unjustly deported under false accusation. How could we then trust this organization in the future when its decisions involve the Palestinian people as a whole?

"These facts must be emphasized to the international community before the international organization itself. If it does not respect its own decisions, what reason is there for it to exist? It must be emphasized to the Islamic nations that the spiritual values of Islam have been desecrated under the cover of occupation, and that the Holy Land is desecrated every day at the hands of the Zionists. We must turn to the Western countries which promote democracy, and tell them: 'What democracy is there in the measures taken by Israel and involving Judaization, liquidations and deportations?'

"We must emphasize to the American people and their present government, which never missed an opportunity to talk at length about human rights ever since it came into power, that when human rights were really involved the United States opposed the decision concerning the three Palestinians' return to their country. This confirms the deceit of the American Government, which claims to promote peace and pretends that it does everything to ensure an equitable solution in the area. In fact, it does not even go along with a resolution concerning the return of three Palestinians, who have committed neither crime nor offense."

EXPANSION OF PETROLEUM PIPELINE CONTINUES

Paris LE MONDE DIPLOMATIQUE in French Aug 80 pp 14-15

[Article by Marie-Christine Aulas]

[Text] Since the war of October 1973, a new network of pipelines has gradually been put in place in the Arab countries of the Near East. The previous facilities, built in the era of the British and French mandates, or at the latest in 1950 (the Saudi tap-line) by companies with concessions (1), are each in turn being replaced by new ones, ordered and financed by the oil-producing countries. Today as in the past, it is a question of out-shipment of part of the crude from the Gulf regions to the Mediterranean, and of diversifying thereby the outlets for what is three-fifths of the production on the international market. What is different is the new geographic configuration of the network.

Up to now, the pipelines took the most direct path between the zones of production and the Mediterranean: coming from Iraq and Saudi Arabia, they converged on a limited area of the maritime face of Lebanon and Syria, north of Israel. Now, the facilities put into service or still in progress still end up at the Mediterranean, but by adopting totally different routes, all of which have the special feature of avoiding the zone of Israeli-Arab conflict.

Of the three new pipelines, the Saudi "trans-Arabian" still under construction, the "strategic pipeline," and the "Suez-Mediterranean" (SUMED) built by Egypt which is already in service, it is this latter which is undoubtedly the most unusual. On the one hand, it does not take oil from a well, but transports the crude from one zone to another, from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean. This is the first Arab pipeline of this kind. Up to now, Israeli pipelines--Eilat-Haifa, built in 1957, then Eilat-Ashkelon, built in 1968--held sole monopoly over the region.

SUMED, which was finished in early 1977, is in some respects a complement to the Suez canal, whose [maximum] draught at present limits passage to ships not exceeding 69,000 Tpl [expansion unknown] loaded (2). Thanks to this line, bigger tankers (250,000 Tpl) can discharge at Suez the crude that other ships can pick up at Sidi-Kreir, near Alexandria. The idea of building such a pipeline is not recent. It dates from a time prior to the closing of the Suez canal in 1967, when the latter was already beginning to be poorly adapted to the new oil fleets. But the October War had to come before studies and negotiations came to fruition. The Arab Petroleum Pipeline Company (3) was created on 11 December 1973 with a capital of 400 million dollars, and work was begun.

Built in the political and economic climate of "Infitah" ("opening-up"), SUMED's path reveals its strategic import. Far from taking the most direct route, alongside the canal between Suez and Port Said over 160 km, soon after Suez the pipeline bends toward the west, crosses the Nile delta, and ends in Alexandria after a journey of 320 km. Why this route? To supply the refineries of Alexandria? The latter are barely sufficient for Egyptian oil. To keep the facility safe from the consequences of possible fighting? In reality, by this path, a whole part of Egyptian territory would be exposed in case of conflict. In effect, SUMED being complementary not only to the Suez canal but also to the trans-Arabian pipeline, Egypt is now directly situated on the east-west petroleum route, providing a distinct link for the transport of Saudi crude. Taking into account the interests that SUMED involves, both upstream and downstream (producing countries and consumer countries), the country is already placing itself behind the front lines. Further, not only the Suez canal, but also the zone which separates it from the pipeline assumes a new strategic importance. The division which Ferdinand de Lesseps imposed a century ago between Egypt's Asiatic and African territories is enlarged today to that entire part of the eastern desert lying between the canal and the Nile valley.

The sanctions decided upon at the Baghdad Summit, following the Treaty of Washington, have not affected the activity of this pipeline, as had been feared. SUMED continues to function at 87.5 percent of its capacity (4).

Iraqi Preferences

By its name alone, Iraq's "strategic pipeline" reveals the designs of its builders. Unlike most of the producer countries of the region, Iraq has practically no maritime outlet, with the exception of several kilometers of coast between Kuwait and Iran, at the farther end of the Arab-Persian Gulf. This partly explains why, in 1933, Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC) decided to build a pipeline linking the Kirkuk oil fields to the Mediterranean across Syrian territory. Following the nationalization of IPC in June 1972, Iraq took it upon itself to provide for the export of its oil, which represents 93 to 95 percent of the nation's production (106 million tons in 1976).

In August 1973 the Iraqi authorities decided on the creation of a new "reversible" pipeline capable both of moving oil to the oil port of Fao in the south, and also to the Mediterranean, this time through the mountains of Kurdistan and Turkey. This artful facility, the first of its kind, was put in service in January 1976 (the southern branch), and the northern branch was activated in January 1977.

If Iraq today finds itself totally independent of other Arab countries in getting its oil to the Mediterranean, it is not by reason of geographic convenience. To the contrary, instead of the direct and relatively flat line taken by the Kirkuk-Baniya pipeline (5), the [Iraqi] authorities chose a winding path subject to the vagaries of a topography full of pitfalls. This basically political decisions throws light on some ambiguities of Iraqi policy. Baghdad explains its decision by the position taken by Damascus, which wants an exorbitant right of passage. In reality, outshipment via Turkey involves costs equally large, if not larger. Doubtless Turkish "royalties" are, at the outset, not as steep. But in each case, the country of passage is allowed to take as much oil as it needs at a discount price, and Turkey, as a larger consumer than Syria, would take more--which, from Iraq's point of view, amounts to the same thing. Further, Ankara having difficulty paying its oil invoices, the two governments have concluded an agreement by the terms of which the Turks promise to pay for Iraqi oil with agricultural products, to the detriment of Syrian exports.

In fact, whereas the Ba'athist regime in Baghdad wax eloquent in pan-Arabic exhortations, the authorities are trying to isolate themselves from the Arab political scene as much as they can. Abandoning the old Kirkuk-Baniya pipeline doubtless protects against any political or economic pressure, either Palestinian or Syrian, but at the same time this amounts to depriving Arab "brothers" of the indirect benefits or oil. Syria and Libya were affected, to the profit of Turkey, a non-Arab country, where there are risks of other kinds of pressure. Direct economic pressures, but also political pressures from Turkish opposition groups which, several times, have sabotaged pumping operations, thus simultaneously interrupting the use of the pipeline (6).

One thing seems clear: Iraq is trying to achieve security with the help of Turkey and, up until the recent events in Iran--[also with the help of] two non-Arab allies of the United States in the region. Since the signing in March 1975 of an agreement with the shah and up until the latter's departure, one could perceive a more or less explicit convergence of viewpoints between the two governments on the security problems in the Gulf. In exchange for "pacification" of Kurdistan, Baghdad would overnight withdraw its support for liberation movements on the peninsula, entrusting Iran with the role of "policeman." This equilibrium was achieved so painfully that it is understandable why Baghdad has been unceasing in its expressions of hostility toward the new leaders in Iran. However that may be, thanks to the "strategic pipeline," the oil interests of Ba'athist Iraq are safe from the hazards of the Arab political scene.

The Role of the Nile Valley

As for the new trans-Arabian pipeline under construction (7), it also answers to strategic imperatives. Sheikh Yamani, the Saudi oil minister, said this in no uncertain terms at a conference at the University of Riyadh in April 1978: [Begin italics] "It must be pointed out, that Saudi oil is exported from only one outlet, the Arabic Gulf, which can be blockaded. This is a situation very different from that [obtaining] in Algeria, Libya, or Venezuela. This is why other outlets are in the process of being created on the Red Sea, in order to reduce this dependence." [End italics] (8). The Saudi official forgot to mention the Tap-line which, since 1950, has carried part of the nation's production, going through Jordan and Syria to its terminus at Zahrani in Lebanon. Categorically closed for export purposes since February 1975, the pipeline continues to supply refineries in Lebanon (Zahrani) and Jordan (Zarka) for their internal needs.

It was above all a concern about independence which led Riyadh to opt for construction of a new channel which traverses, over some 1,500 km, the Arabian peninsula from the Gulf to the Red Sea. On the one hand, the "trans-Arabian" crosses no frontiers (it is to supply the future petrochemical complex of Yambo, allowing Saudi Arabia to export refined products). On the other hand, the Wahabite kingdom will be less dependent than before on its outlet through the Gulf. Confronted with the impossibility of exercising military control over this zone, and fearful of the establishment on its borders of regimes which could endanger its interests, Riyadh is providing itself with the means necessary for its defensive strategy. As a result, the flow of Saudi oil is going to depend on Egypt, through which most of the oil arriving at Yambo will transit. This link, which assumes harmonious relations between the two countries, bears out the point of view of the oil interests on the future of the Nile valley, which henceforth is tied to their interests. At the same time, the Red Sea zone's strategic dimension is revitalized: more than ever, the said "security" problems will serve as arguments to justify various pressures on the political orientation of riverine countries.

Thus, in each case it is security concerns that constitute the ruling factor in the new pipelines. These concerns are at the base of their conception, and of their routing. Everything contributes, moreover, to divorce the interests of the Arab oil countries from those of their partners less harshly stricken by fate. The latter, directly affected by the Israeli-Arab conflict and by its effects (the Lebanese civil war, for instance), see themselves deprived of revenues which the passage of pipelines would procure for them. They are becoming more than ever dependent on the producing countries, subject to their political pressure. The oil order establishes itself precisely where the political and economic aims of the producers and the consumers naturally converge. This is the paradox of an age when oil has pretensions of being a weapon. A weapon for whom? A weapon against whom?

KEY:

1. Working oil-fields
2. Old pipeline, still in service
3. Pipeline of recent construction (or, in the case of the "trans-Arabian," under construction)
   A and B: northern and southern branches of the strategic pipeline
4. Territories under Israeli administration

FOOTNOTES

1. The Tap-line, built in 1945 by the mother companies of ARAMCO, has from the start presented itself as an independent transport company. This legal fiction has been put to use in several maneuvers (see Nicolas Sarkis, LE COMMERCE DU LEVANT, 24-27 May 1967.)

2. The figure should go up to 150,000 Tpl in 1980, according to E. Stanley Trucker in PETROLEUM ECONOMIST, February 1978.

3. The Arab Petroleum Pipeline Company involves Egypt (which holds 50 percent of its shares), Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, and Abu Dhabi.

4. PETROLE ET GAZ ARABES, 16 June 1979.

5. Utilization of the Kirkuk-Baniya pipeline was interrupted in April 1976 following a dispute with Syria, then resumed in February 1979 with the proposed union of the two countries.

6. Since going into service, the operation of the pipeline has been interrupted five times, for technical reasons, as a result of financial disputes, or even because of sabotage (PETROLE ET GAZ ARABES, 1 October and 1 November 1978.

7. Work began in October 1978. It is expected to go into service this year.

WOUNDED SOLDIERS INTERVIEWED ON THEIR CONFRONTATIONS WITH REGIME OPPONENTS

Kabul ANIS in Dari 21 Aug 80 p 3

/Text/ In one of the operating rooms of the Armed Forces Academy of Medical Sciences Hospital, I encountered a young man whose hand was encased in a plaster cast and who was demanding to leave the room. First, I introduced myself; then I asked him to introduce himself. He said, "My name is 'Abdulghayeb, and I am foreman at the government farm in Faryab Province."

I asked him, "Are you a member of the volunteer groups? Are you fighting against the enemies of the Revolution"? He said, "Yes. It is the conscientious duty of all patriots and all citizens of the country to fight against these thieves and highwaymen who are disrupting the security of the country. Naturally, our fight must continue until that moment when all of these filthy elements, who are acting against the best interests of the nation, have been obliterated and exterminated."

"Where were you wounded"?

"In a mountainous subdistrict of Faryab Province."

"Did the rebels attack there"?

"Yes. What else can these elements do except attack and commit sabotage. They attack the lives and property of the people; they set fire to public and private property, and then they flee."

"When you resisted them, were the rebels defeated"?

" Yes. We crushed them. A number of them fled, but we captured some of them and they confessed their crimes."

"What types of weapons did you confiscate"?

"Their weapons were all made in China, America, and England. To be specific, the missiles that we took from them were all made in China; twenty-five of the weapons that we obtained were made in America and England."

"What destruction did the rebels inflict? Did they burn the mosque and the school"?

"Yes, they burned a mosque in the Qeysar District, and they also burned some of the schools."

"If you could give a message to your fellow-countrymen, what would you say"?

"The only thing I have to say is that they must fight fearlessly to the death with complete faith and firm conviction against these anti-national and traitorous elements in order that our country might be completely purged of these filthy elements."

A soldier whose leg had been amputated attracted my attention in another room. I told him that I had come to interview him. He was very pleased and introduced himself as follows:

"I am Gholam Sakhi, a soldier in the 67th Regiment, 12th Division, Paktia Province. Originally, I came from Parvan."

"How did you lose your leg"?

Smiling, he said,"I lost my leg defending the nation and preserving the gains of the Thawr [20 Apr-20 MAY] Revolution and I am proud that I fought up to the moment when I lost my leg in order to safeguard the nation's principles and its territory."

"Where did you lose your leg."?

"On the Jaji Front, during the month of Mizan [23 Sep-22 Oct] last year. I had gone to Jaji to free the Jaji Road and to bring fuel. Counter-revolutionaries had mined the road and, during an attack, a mine went off and I lost my leg."

"Did you fight on any of the other fronts besides the Jaji Front"?

"Yes, I also fought on the Vaziri Front, the Tireh Front, and the Khateh Kandu Front."

"With what type of weapons do these rebels or counter-revolutionaries fight"?

"With Chinese, American and English weapons."

"Do you sometimes find these types of weapons during clashes"?

"Yes, once in a while."

"How much of your basic term of military service have you served"?

"I have served nine months in addition to my basic term of service, and, to protect my country, I will fight until my dying breath, even if my term of service is extended several more years."

"Are you not bitter that your leg has been amputated"?

"No. First of all, I lost my leg defending my country; secondly, I, and several other wounded men who have lost their arms and legs, will be going later to one of the friendly countries to have artificial limbs attached."

"What did you do before you joined the Army"?

"I was a laborer before I joined the Army; I worked in a shoe factory."

"Do you have any message for the soldiers"?

"Yes, my message to the soldiers is that they should fight to the last drop of their blood to defend the nation, to preserve the gains of the Thawr Revolution, and to maintain and guard the principles of the nation, because prosperity and success are ours. If, perchance a soldier dies pursuing this goal, and is martyred, he will never be forgotten and will be immortal."

ANALYSIS OF ALGERIA'S STATUS AS A CONSUMER SOCIETY

Algiers REVOLUTION AFRICAINE in French 1-7 Aug 80 pp 9-16

[Article by G. Boutaleb and Y. Ould-Moussa: "Are We a Consumer Society?"]

[Text] Are we a consumer society? If we go beyond subjective considerations caused by episodic phenomena (Ramadan, festivals, marriages, pilgrimages) to answer this question for Algiera, we must consider the long-term tendencies of such determining variables as income levels, consumer expenditures, and available production.

Analysis has suggested to us that a consumer society is out of the question in an economic environment characterized by poverty and speculation. If a consumer society is an ideal to be attained, it cannot exist without sufficient production and a close-knit and active system of distribution.

Is it then possible to associate the notion of a consumer society--now linked with connotations of waste--with our society? Of course, waste does exist, but isn't it due less to personal consumption than to economic choices?

I: Providing a Decent Standard of Living

In the Larousse dictionary, "to consume" means to use something for its substance, to make use of or to use something up; "consumption" is the use made of goods and services produced.

But the word "consumption," when applied to a whole society, has a very special meaning nowadays. For a long time, the consumer society was a reflection of the "American way of life" and was advocated as an ideal to be pursued. Actually, the independence of colonial countries, and the monetary and energy crises were to show that the development advocated by the industrialized countries derives from their taking advantage of the Third World's underdevelopment and from their use of the Third World's nonrenewable resources. At present, the consumer society tends increasingly to be thought of as a "wasteful society," which is squandering mankind's heritage of natural resources (energy, raw materials, etc.). This society is the result of a long evolution that has seen the consolidation of the capitalist system, which is based on various economic forces' questing for the maximum possible profit, which would theoretically tend (in the long run!) to maximize the collective interest.

Descartes' proof of existence, "I think, therefore I am," has thus been gradually replaced by "I consume, therefore I am" in the industrialized countries. Men and societies tend to imitate consciously or unconsciously the image (spread essentially through the media), which is objectivized and idealized, in the ruling and middle classes of the Third World countries.

Of course, any human society is necesszarily a consumer society by definition because it is intended to help satisfy essential needs and favor the very survival of the race.

Subsistence societies were gradually transformed into trading societies. Man went from food-gathering to agriculture to industry, and attempted increasingly to produce whatever would give him the greatest relative advantage. People thus specialized production according to the resources of their particular countries in order to maximize profits. This necessarily caused increased interdependence and led to domination by Western countries, which made conquered countries specialize to suit their interests.

Now we are seeing the consolidation of the so-called industrialized societies, which are draining off resources and organizing an international division of labor that will meet their increasingly diversified and often artificially created needs. Therefore, production precedes consumption. It is no longer intended to meet needs but to create them through pervasive advertising.

As a newly independent state, Algeria does not fit this pattern. On the contrary, it has had to struggle hard to preserve and develop its natural resources in order to promote the kind of development likely to meet the needs of a rapidly growing population and initially to "give each citizen a consumption model providing a minimum decent standard of living: housing, food, clothing, health care, education, culture, and leisure" (National Charter).

The Algerian state is responsible for the living conditions of every citizen, and has thus assigned itself the duty of creating all conditions under which "each Algerian may meet his basic needs in dignity," which especially implies the liquidation of the structures of domination, the elimination of unemployment, and the will to insure "the existence of those who cannot yet, can no longer, or can never work."

A Determining Variable

The development strategy set in 1966 and implemented in 1967 with the first 3-year plan thus established the priorities of creating jobs and meeting the basic needs of the people, two objectives that are closely related. From this standpoint, demographic data and their outlook definitely constitute a determining variable, given the importance attached to such essential needs as work, food, health care, education, and housing.

According to estimates based on the 1966 census, the working population in the various sectors came to 2,507,568, of whom 1,299,063 were in agriculture. Ten years later, the results of the general population and housing census made in early 1977 show a working population of 2,336,971, of whom 629,160 were in agriculture. Compared with the overall population figure for 1 January 1978, which was 17,272,000 people, the evaluation of the working population thus indicates that every worker actually supports 13.5 other people. With respect to the total potential working population, which generally includes adults between the ages of 20 and 60 (36.59 percent of the total) the support burden goes down by practically half but is still considerable: 7 people per worker. True, the largest age group is made up of young people under the age of 19, or 57.56 percent of the total.

In the next decade, the total population will grow by 10 million people, and the number of households will grow by 1.5 million. reaching nearly 4 million units in 1990. The school-age population (ages 6-15) will grow by 2 million and reach 6 million children.

These few figures quickly show the size of the needs to be met and the productive effort that must be made even considering the long-term prospect of a sizeable reduction in unemployment.

The 5-year plan presented by the ministry of Planning and Development states that the working population will grow during the next planning period at an average annual rate of about 4.8 percent, or about a million people, of whom about 70 percent will be working men between the ages of 18 and 59. The plan also forecasts a growth of nearly 1.2 million people in non-agricultural jobs, which would bring that total to 3.5 million (which is about the total employment estimated for 1977). It also calculates an agricultural working population of nearly a million people (estimated at 692,160 in 1977), which should theoretically shrink in the 1980-84 planning period.

The idea of employment in the agricultural sector is actually rather loose and difficult to define, but estimates issued by the same statistical service should make it possible to make useful comparisons by keeping the same criteria.

To achieve the goals set by development strategy, Algeria has allocated considerable financial resources (40-50 percent of gross domestic production, the highest rate in the world) to develop hydrocarbons and implement the 2nd 4-year plan (1974-77).

This kind of effort makes it more appropriate to speak of an "investment society" as far as we are concerned rather than a consumer society. But to achieve the rate of investment planned, especially in the industrial sector, which accounts for about half of the planning done so far, and especially in the context of worldwide inflation, financing has had to be done partly by anticipating future resources (by borrowing abroad) and by increasing the money supply. By the end of 1977 foreign debt almost tripled, and its ratio to the gross domestic product [GDP] and to exports has increased considerably. This debt was evaluated at about 7 billion in SDR [Special Drawing Rights], 87 percent of which come from lending instutions and financiers. Since then, our borrowing from capitalist financial institutions has grown.

Also, even when investments have been achieved in monetary terms, they have not brought about any increase in the volume of planned and even less necessary production, whence there has been increased reliance on imports of goods and services, which is characteristic of the period.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the same available production supplies the two bases of investment and income intended for consumption, be it immediately available production or anticipation of future production. Of course, in the present context of worldwide inflation, foreign debt may prove advantageous in accelerating economic development provided this debt can be controlled, because it depends on ability to repay and, thereby, on increased production.

If we put together the figures for gross domestic production, especially from 1973 on (when a cumulative inflationary process was started in Algeria), and household consumption, the figures will make it possible to find, albeit approximately, the degree of inflation and the measures necessary to achieve the investment rates that have been planned for the next decade.

Household Consumption (in current billions) [* = estimated]

Food	9.2	13.1	29.0	39.0	54.0
Industrial products	4.4	7.9	18.5	29.8	46.6
Services	3.4	5.0	8.5	15.8	25.0
totals	17.0	26.0*	56.0*	84.6*	115.6*

Gross Domestic Production (value added by economic sector)

Let us mention in passing that the added value for agriculture and the food industries amounted to 6.73 billion plus 3.05 billion or 9.78 billion in 1978; 4.96 billion plus 2.5 billion or 7.5 billion in 1977.

The general price index of goods and services as reported by the Planning ministry grew from 126 in 1974 (1969 = 100) to 167.1 in 1971 for a cumulative growth of 75 percent in 4 years; it is hard to understand that in 6 years, from 1973 to 1979, household consumption expenses tripled, as the reference figures show, even under the hypothesis (to be verified) that there was very substantial growth in the goods and services available for consumption in that period.

A Lower Level

It should also be emphasized that household consumption figures are the most trustworthy since they are based on actual expenditures in current dinars (thus discounting inflation). These figures cannot give a real picture of the change in living standards in the period under discussion. Besides, they are general expenses and do not show changes at the various income levels.

To guide action programs in raising living standards in terms of expenditures necessary for consumption, the overall consumption forecasts in the 2nd 4-year plan have been presented according to two models: the "urban" and the "rural" (residence criterion plus income criterion).

In 1973 both the urban and rural populations had an annual per capita disposable income of 900 DA [dinars]. The poorest families in the country, a little less than 10 percent of the total population, then had a living standard often at a level less than 400 DA, while the average for the rural population is estimated at about 550 DA. The increase in general consumer expenditures forecast in the 2nd 4-year plan (from 17 billion dinars in 1973 to 26 billion in 1977) should have improved rural living standards by bringing average per-capita consumption up from 550 DA in 1973 to nearly 800 DA in 1977, while per-capita levels of consumption less than 500 DA would be considered marginal.

In order to keep the disparity between the towns and countryside from worsening and to keep townspeople from cornering the planned increase in general consumption (and thus slow down the rural exodus), and to keep consumer demand from outstripping supply, a policy was advocated to limit incomes and consumption.

The projected 1980-84 five-year plan also emphasizes the necessity to manage incomes and to use regulatory and corrective mechanisms and measures to keep distortions from developing in buying power, supply, and prices. (The rise in incomes caused by balancing in the plan is on the order of 9.5 percent a year in real terms.) The priority actions to be undertaken are still aimed at "eliminating malnutrition among the broadest categories and populations and discouraging increased consumption of secondary products by categories of people whose income increases markedly." The first objective naturally implies supplying the poorest people with strategic products but also developing a coherent and continuous price policy consistent with what is possible for these people. The draft plan states that compensatory mechanisms will have to be maintained to protect buying power, whether by direct transfers through the governmental budget or through consumer price supports. In this respect it must be emphasized that in the 1980 budget most of the increase under "common charges" is intended for price supports increasing from 900 million DA in 1979 to 1.945 million DA in 1980 (ONACO [Algerian National Marketing Office] 370 million DA, SOGEDIA [Food Industries Management and Development Company] 80 million DA, SN-SEMPAC [expansion unknown] 370 million DA, OAIC [Interoccupational Algerian Grains Office] 1,100 million DA).

Also, the pressure on products in high-income, high population-density regions should not penalize the future supply of distant, poorer regions. "Action in the area of distribution and consumer prices will again tend to develop inexpensive (?) formulas for marketing, transportation, and storage."

The second objective that tends to discourage the growth of intermediate consumption is closely tied to the necessity of greatly reducing the growth of speculative income due to shortages mainly in housing, commerce, and the industrial production of secondary consumer goods.

Reducing the Deficit

Income accumulated through the movement of products and capital abroad, which has been facilitated by the existence of large savings through emigration, will have to be stopped, partly because it is a large source of speculative wealth and capital, but especially because of the foreseeable effects it has on the consumption model and the degradation of social behavior at many levels of the population"(5-year plan draft).

Under the next 5-year plan, it is estimated that per-capita consumption will grow from 3,000 DA at present to 4,000 DA in 1984 and improve quantitatively and qualitatively, on the obvious and heavy condition that the policy of income management actually makes it possible to improve consumption among the poorest categories of people and that production capacity adapts to meet the rapid growth in demand.

The adaptation of investments and production to meet the outlook for household consumption is an increasingly urgent matter. The rapid growth of incomes and of needs in housing, transportation, education, and health care will cause an explosive demand for industrial products and services.

As the notion of basic needs gradually widens to include secondary goods not yet available in sufficient quantity on the domestic market (especially electrical appliances), the 5-year plan even notes that it is economically and socially much more effective to import directly, in sufficient amounts, and at chosen prices articles considered to be secondary consumer items rather than to proscribe them and let uncontrollable, speculative black markets develop. As for household appliances, for example, the rate at which national needs were being met was 15 percent in 1979: 36,000 refrigerators; 17,500 stoves; 40,000 hot water heaters; and 20,000 air conditioners.

A new team's taking over in 1980 should make it possible to double production, since present capacity is sufficient, and thus meet about 30 percent of national demand. The production of black and white television sets came to 66,480 sets in 1979; there were also 4,200 color television sets and 4,500 record players.

In the present context of the general import program and the anti-shortage program intended to make up the deficit in this area, about 400,000 refrigerators, 270,000 stoves, 300,000 television sets, 400,000 heaters of all kinds, 120,000 hot water heaters, 400,000 radios, etc. will be imported.

In 1973, the planners estimated that considering the achievement of programmed objectives (the rest of the objectives to be achieved are still considerable in 1980) "rural"-model consumer expenditures could rise from 550 DA to about 800 DA per capita per annum. In 1980 these expenditures were estimated at 3,000 DA per capita. Does this mean that the people's standard of living, especially in the most disadvantaged strata of society, has risen proportionally? Besides the impact of the inflationary process, which is considerable, and which cuts more markedly into the income of these very levels of society, doesn't the average overall increase that has been noted mainly reflect increasingly evident distortions in incomes? In any case, the analysis of incomes is essential to any meaningful approach to consumer expenditures, especially since the outlook for Algeria is for a substantial increase in incomes without a corresponding increase in available goods and services.

II--Worsening Incomes

In approaching the question of whether ours is a consumer society, it is also necessary to consider incomes in order to try to understand the negative phenomena occurring daily in the area of consumption.

We observe today that anything can be bought at any price from anybody. The sorry pictures of piecework, of organized theft made possible by speculation and the black market, and of real or contrived shortages are signs of the fragility of our economy.

By buying at any price, the citizen assists in the emergence of a new class of obscure or notorious loan sharks and speculators who have an enormous impact on the public spirit of the average citizen, particularly young people, because it makes them unfit for and contemptuous of work.

Of course, it would be tempting to think that because people buy anything at any price because we are all rich enough to do so and put up with the inflation it causes.

But actually, while incomes have grown in the last decade, their distribution shows great inequalities and disparities. Geographically, the rural sector has had a growth rate of 10 percent (up from 3.9 to 4.3 billion DA). This corresponds approximately to its rate of population growth.

On the other hand, urban incomes have grown 37 percent (up from 8.1 to 11.1 billion DA), clearly superior to the corresponding rate of population growth. At the sector level, it appears that productive workers, the industrial wage earners, have been least favored by the distribution of incomes created by their own work: an average per capita growth of 7 percent, as opposed to 17 percent in the salaries of administrators and businessmen and 9 percent in those of industrial entrepreneurs.

At the level of socio-professional categories, which had an overall salary supply of 40 billion DA in 1979, the gross earnings of non-wage earners reached 19 billion DA. Thus, half of the income is going to a quarter of the population.

Production sectors are receiving average wages lower than those of indirectly productive sectors (this is the case with agriculture, the building trades, hydraulics, and industry). One example: 580 DA for agriculture as opposed to 1,950 DA for the service sector. Studies have shown that 54 percent of productive workers receive 46 percent of gross wages; 12 percent of the service sector workers receive 18 percent, and 34 percent of administrative employes receive 36 percent.

Thus, concentration in urban zones, the disaffection of farm workers and the rural exodus have further accentuated the inequalities in incomes that already existed between town and country. To this phenomenon should be added the sectorial disparities that the general status of the worker should make it possible to attenuate.

Also, with the intense rate of development that our country has gone through in the past decade, the general standard of living has improved despite a somewhat altered content due to the absence of a consumption model or rather to the diversity of models that Algerians are exposed to every day. Going beyond income growth to estimate the comparative growth of living standards, it is imperative to keep in mind what the real rates of inflation are and how able the various economic forces are to combat effectively the monetary erosion that aggravates distortions and increases the various opportunities to gain money through speculation.

Savings: Short Shrift

It is clear that strong pressures on the availability of consumer products and insufficient control over the formation and distribution of incomes mean that compensatory mechanisms must be maintained and strengthened to protect and improve the income of the most disadvantaged parts of society, which are fully exposed to monetary erosion, inflation, and speculation.

Observing the race for consumption at any price in the big cities, we might think, wrongly, that all the people have adequate means. We do not, and our judgment will have to be shaped by the questions Who buys? Who consumes? Who consumes what?

Of course, in the big cities, it often happens that in one family several members work and bring in no little amount of money, but this "union" or multiple-income commonality only makes it possible to hold the line against inflation and rising prices. But for a father supporting a family whose only resources are his monthly salary, things are different: food accounts for nearly 60 percent of his household budget. The bill is stiff, and it is hard to make it through the end of the month.

Having said that, it is possible to understand the "euphoria" we are presently going through; it benefits only some of the bourgeois, who take advantage of all the government's aid and support to first- and second-priority products, and all kinds of speculators, who use children to sell in all the stores in town and create their own parallel market.

These sorry pictures are, of course, emphasized by the many pitfalls of distribution, which continues to suffer from many shortcomings: political price infrastructure, etc.

Where is this taking us? When we consider that we are about to launch the 5-year plan and must expect an income growth of 9.5 percent a year with an increase in wages of 10 percent a year, we have reason to be disturbed about the future and nature of our society.

With a program added to the 500-billion DA overall import program, we can measure the seriousness of the situation; energetic measures are needed to improve production, restore the value of work, reinvigorate agriculture, clean up our distribution system, strengthen inspection, and stimulate savings.

Ah, that great word: savings! Who can and will save? The well-to-do have no need to save because, come what may, they can get whatever they want. Workers living on their wages cannot save, because daily living expenses take most of their money.

And then what good is it to save 500 DA for 10 months to get 5,000 DA that has lost buying power in the meantime? The predominant attitude is that everything that is available today is cheap, because it will be more expensive tomorrow. Of course, saving in such a spirit of frustration and defeatism concerns very few citizens who plan to get a place to live or a car and nothing else. Are even more attractive interest rates needed to encourage savings?

From a lack of savings to waste is only a step, which anyone can take lightly and unconsciously in the present atmosphere of shortages and momentary abundance.

Must ours be a society based on frantic and superficial consumption? Is it healthy for our economy to continue importing many things that we can produce ourselves? For how long? The solution does not consist of any import program, however extensive and consistent it may be. Of course, meeting social needs is the first purpose of our development policy, but there can be only one way of achieving it: work. Without it, all will be naught but illusion and false euphoria, which would be the source of a dangerous and painful future for our society, country, and economy.

Coherent wage-planning instruments, management of non-wage incomes, and price control are urgent objectives to be achieved if we wish to preserve the basic qualities of our society and its essential values.

Also, popular mobilization and support cannot take shape without these conditions and rules in a "game" where the development and promotion of our society are at stake.

CREATION OF PARTY CELLS FOR WORKERS WITHIN ENTERPRISES

Cohesion of All Workers

Algiers REVOLUTION AFRICAINE in French 1-7 Aug 80 pp 6-7

[Text] The campaign to set up party cells within enterprises began to take shape in various wilayas [as published]. The campaign, under the aegis of the party's administrative office, was officially launched this week in Algiers. The operation is taking place under favorable conditions. Thus, it turns out that the launching of the campaign is wholly due to the initiative of the rank and file. To do this, they made an inventory of the main units of production, their distribution according to their type of activity, and took a census of all militants employed in them.

These new groups have before them a long-range task to mobilize the working class. They represent an additional means for the existing organs within the enterprises to help them cope with problems that come up. According to the rules adopted at the end of the second session of the Central Committee, the role of the party cells is to:

--spread the party slogans among the workers, the peasants, and the youth;

--work towards broadening the party base by calling forth and encouraging the workers, the peasants, and the youth to join the party;

--assure the success of a renewal in the administrative agencies elected within the different sectors, through the supervision of the candidacies by the commission;

--encourage the rise of the best elements among the workers, peasants, and youth, who would be able to hold an elective office;

--bring about a symbiosis between the organizations of the masses at the place of work, and direct their activities without replacing these organizations;

--coordinate the existing administrative agencies and various authorities of the organizations of the masses at work, and invite them to exercise unity in their thinking and actions, as well as to arouse within their ranks a feeling of nationalism, and to settle disputes according to established rules;

--through stringent controls, see to it that production means are properly used, and that the national patrimony is preserved;

--see to it that the basic texts of the social revolution are respected in their application.

The wide scope of the above-mentioned tasks requires that the militants always be vigilant in order to insure its success over the long run. Their mission should not go astray because of obstacles that are bound to come up. Perhaps, these obstacles come up mainly because of a wrong assimilation of the objectives used to set up these party cells.

Viable Enterprises

The future effort, as shown by the results of work done by the special congress, will be to render the enterprises viable. In this sense, the party cell within the enterprise is welcome.

The economic tasks of the 5 year plan promise to be complex. It is not only a matter of increasing the means for production, but also of making them productive through maximum exploitation. Being the political body in an enterprise, the party cell of the FLN must be an instrument of political emulation. This is the more necessary because socialism rests more on such emulation than on the ways of profit-making capitalism.

Generalizing material well-being involves laws that are more just than what is defined by the workers' general statute now being adopted. It also implies added production in national wealth.

These two factors together bring into play another element, not a material one certainly, but one which is not less real, that of revolutionary consciousness. The workers already show a clear awareness of the problems, since they condemn all existing forms of parasistism within the enterprises as well as in other sectors. Therefore, it is certain that as soon as they are ready to do the job, the party militants will have to respond to this expectation of the workers if they want to broaden the struggle.

[Text] Eclipsed by the many political events that took place these past months, the campaign for the summer voluntary service did take place, after all, but this time it was under rather special conditions. There were two reasons for a shorter campaign that only lasted 6 days. The first reason being the national conference on higher education, the second one being Ramadan, which came this year during July-August, the traditional time for the campaign. But neither one stopped the students from engaging in various intense activities, and to put into practice their work program.

However, one must note that the low turnout of students and the youth when compared to last year (2,500 as opposed to 5,000) was offset by the mobilization of other social forces. Thus, the workers of the Health Department have set up a permanent camp in Zemmouri before starting to do only medical work. In addition to the medical work that has benefited the rural population, the 150 volunteers, doctors, dentists, and nurses, have helped, in the evenings, with cultural activities very much appreciated by the fellahs who are not used to such enriching moments.

Specialized volunteer service, though sometimes hesitant, has the merit of arousing a lively interest in those who profit by it, and gives to those using it the opportunity to get to know in depth the cultural and sociological values of "real Algeria". Thus, there are different ways of looking at volunteer service, which seems to favor not only an osmosis between the social classes but also provides for an exchange in experiences rich in every way.

This summer, the originality of the campaign lies in the fact that it was begun last winter and continued until the summer. The important thing is that the campaign took place in spite of its limited success due to poor organization of the youth when compared to students coming from university committees.

How can an action be positive if it is not based on a clear and sound organization? The campaign against illiteracy could not be successful if there is no provision, from the start, for structures that can support it. It is true that one learns from experience. Moreover, the volunteers who fight illiteracy must be integrated either into university committees or into the UNJA [National Union of Algerian Youth]. Outside of these structures and other party organizations no serious work can be done and no positive results can be obtained.

Struggle Against Illiteracy

During the winter campaign, when considering an increase in the voluntary service, the great importance of studying methods for organizing the struggle against illiteracy was stressed. Based on this fact, the groups in charge of these studies would have to conduct all necessary investigations from which they will develop suggestions for a plan of action against illiteracy, one that would stretch over several years. They would also contribute to help spread throughout the country the progressive use of the national language by administrations and local communities in their dealings with the citizens.

As of now, we cannot say that the struggle against illiteracy is a concrete reality. Yet, it can be said that the fact that it is a concern of the voluntary service is a measure of its success. On the recommendation of the Central Committee, the party authorities are seriously working towards the general acceptance of a national language through the efforts of the voluntary service. The positive or negative results of this action will depend, to a large extent, on good organization. It would, therefore, be important to gether all necessary criteria in order to avoid the pitfalls and problems that come from poor preparation.

The increase in the voluntary service, which gave a multidisciplinary character to its actions, was very conclusive. Aside from its political aspect throughout the alliance of all social forces, there is an especially interesting economic aspect. In Drean (Annaba), the fellahs benefited from the technical help given to the UGTA [General Union of Algerian Workers] camp, whose workers, coming from the El-Hadjar complex, had the assignment to repair and maintain the agricultural tools of the cooperatives.

Eloquent Numbers

The action that should be emphasized, perhaps because it has passed unnoticed, is the one regarding the volunteer's campaign for reforestation for 1979-1980. It was started on 21 December and ended 21 March 1980 with promising results. Only numbers can give an idea about the importance of the work done and the scope of the action undertaken. At the end of this campaign, in fact, over 15 million forest plants and almost one million fruitbearing plants were planted by 800,000 volunteers during 13 days of voluntary service. According to the office of the secretary of state for forests and land exploitation, this operation was assessed at almost 50 million dinars and has helped the administration gain 10 years of labor. Are these not grounds for satisfaction for the state and also for those for whom planting a tree has symbolic value.

Covering the whole national territory to Bechar, Tindouf, Tamanrasset, and Adrar, the campaign for reforestation has mibilized almost one million workers from all social and professional groups. At the end of this project, with maintenance and follow-up work assured for a month (from 16 May to 13 June 1980) by militants from organizations of the masses, it was considered possible, with increased volunteer service, to reach the highest objectives in reforestation, thus accelerating the whole reforestation process. The more so since the capacity for mobilization exists, for there is no shortage of workers among the masses. In addition, it is possible to extend the voluntary service to include all workers, and for the concerted action of all organizations to give a concrete form to a task that is of national interest.

It would be to the advantage of the voluntary service to set up a work program within the structure of the organizations of the masses and to coordinate them. The continuous results achieved during the year by the kasmas [as published] could not have taken place without a specific objective, unless, perhaps, it was a political one. For no one can say that the voluntary service has not evolved.

NEED FOR RESPONSIBLE SOCIALIST PRESS STRESSED

Algiers REVOLUTION ET TRAVAIL in French 23 Aug 80 p 9

[Article: "A Socialist Press Must Be Forged Through The Struggle of Its Socialist Militants"]

[Text] Within the framework of a training seminar organized by the metallurgy federation Youcef Bournine, journalist on the staff of El Moudjahid and chief reporter of that daily newspaper in Constantine, gave a talk on "The Role of Information." Considering the burning appeal of that topic, which is now being examined by the party commission on information and culture, we publish extensive excerpts of the Bournine lecture, looking forward to the beginning of a syndical debate on information to which Revolution et Travail will contribute with the hope that it be as broad as possible.

If our press does not measure up to the requirements of the revolution it is proper to look for the causes and to dig up solutions.

The internal causes attesting to the accuracy, even partial, with which quite a few readers judge the press, can be catalogues as follows:

-refusal of certain officials to integrate information into the logic of socialist revolution (offensive and defensive weapons of the revolution);

-negation of the role of the journalist in the defense of the revolution, turning him into a mechanical message designed only to transmit the declarations of officials, previously expurgated of their essential content by other officials;

-replacement of journalism by a civil service system, banning critical observations, killing creative spirit, discouraging the spirit of initiative, and the commitment necessary to a honest exercise of the journalistic profession.

The general conditions surrounding both national press and journalists are characterized by:

-inadequate utilization of means of information;

-inadequate ideological formation of members of the press;

-lack of specialization and recycling;

-lack of solicitude toward material and social problems confronting the journalists;

-lack of democratization of structures that operate without the participation of the journalists;

-lack of political and professional prospects that obstructs the horizon of everyone, and kills emulation in work.

How to Break the Deadlock

Any rational man must recognize two truisms:

-impossibility to vanquish reaction without a really socialist press;

-impossibility to have such a press as long as an earnest and coherent struggle involving journalists and progressist militants is not directed toward that goal.

To achieve his task the journalist must defend an idea. He must be free from doubt; he must be for or against the revolution. In socialist Algeria, he can only be revolutionary and committed. Because he is the spokesman, the defender of the voice of the revolution. The press does not play its role if it boils down to reverberating official remarks. It must raise all the problems concerning the country and revolutionary progress. A press serving that end deserves our confidence. Thus, we can conclude that there exist the possibilities to forge a press expressing the preoccupations of the mass in keeping with the socialist guidelines recently consecrated by the National Charter and codified by the Constitution. What remains to be done is to translate these possibilities--as shown by the debate on the National Charter--into the need for a constructive and permanent criticism encompassing all sectors. At the same time, the national press has the compelling obligation to permanently affirm the results obtained within the framework of national construction tasks. In other words, there is no room for either embellishment or systematic negation in a truly committed, a responsible press. When reading an article, a reportage, a study, or an inquiry, we must be able to bring to light what is good for the progress or the strengthening of the revolution which must be reinforced and developed, and what is bad which must be overcome. Because national reality is not made exclusively of luminous aspects, nor of dark ones. The essential is that the former outplay the latter. Relying on a reality marked by deep revolutionary mutations, progressist militants must increase their effort to energetically reject tendencies consisting in criticizing all that exists--amounting to rejecting progressist guidelines and the attainments of the mass. Likewise, they must fight the tendency to cover up weakness subsisting within the ranks of the revolution, because it only feigns to espouse revolutionary ideas and to protect them, but in fact it casts doubts on socialist options and the attainments of the mass. With such an approach the national press will be able to contribute to the irreversibility of our march toward socialism, and to warding off the dangers of reaction and of imperialism, thanks especially to genuine and powerful mobilization of the mass.

The national press must feed, if not stir up, that mobilization. In itself, it is a powerful political leverage. It is an irreplaceable tool of mobilization, which at the present time, if used with more initiative and dynamism, would excel in efficaciousness.

THREE WILAYAS DESCRIBED IN DETAIL

Tlemcen's Diversity

Algiers EL DJEICH in French May 80 pp 11-22

[Article by M.S., translated from the Arabic by A. Laib: "Small Frames for Technological Expansion"]

[Text] No one arriving for the first time in Tlemcen, the wilaya seat, can help but be struck by the diversity and variety, beginning with nature itself.

In the city one feels one has plunged back several centuries. The wall surrounding the town symbolizes its resistance, and many other historic relics standing here and there attract visitors' curiosity. Tlemcen, in a few words, is a mosaic of varying aspects, colors and volumes. With its narrow alleys and its wide modern boulevards. Its small stalls where active and suspicious craftsmen work hard in front of the modern factories that are cropping up everywhere.

Its ancient people's quarters, with houses jammed together, the better to demonstrate the cohesiveness of their inhabitants, are surrounded by luxurious villas and modern neighborhoods.

Every day at sunrise, reflected in the sun's rays, all the pieces of the mosaic give a complete picture of the inhabitants' activities, of the development and expansion of this entire wilaya.

The population is estimated at 620,000, the density at 64 inhabitants per square km.

Assuming that the present known demographic growth of 2.2 percent will remain stable, very probably between now and 1990 the number of inhabitants will reach 764,000. For the year 2000 the estimated figure is approximately 950,000.

According to the last census the wilaya's total manpower is 91,705, as follows:

Agriculture is in first place. It makes use of some 32,710 workers, or 35.6 percent.

Service sector: 30,599 workers, 33.4 percent.

Industry: 15,319 workers, 16.8 percent.

Public works: 12,997 laborers, 14.2 percent.

These figures and estimates lead us to wonder about what this wilaya has done to meet increasing social needs; about future projects having to do with limiting demographic growth and extending urbanization; finally, how this wilaya has been able to bring about a combination of industry and agriculture.

Important Investments

The Tlemcen wilaya has benefited from a special development program decided upon by the government for the purpose of ridding this part of the territory of a chronic under-development and raising it to an estimable standard--on the economic as well as the sociocultural level.

The goal was to have this wilaya, like all those that have benefited from a similar program, participate in the blossoming of the country in all fields of activity.

Pillaged, exploited, ravaged by more than a century of fierce colonialist domination and by one of the most murderous wars, the Tlemcen wilaya, like all the regions of the national territory, has paid its tribute for independence. That domination produced thousands of victims, chiefly peasants who were forced to abandon the fertile lands taken over by the colonists.

Shortly after independence the Tlemcen wilaya had to confront many problems, the most time-consuming of which was taking charge of the hundreds of thousands of Algerian refugees who were coming from Morocco.

These refugees, forced to leave that country in haste, with the meager goods they were able to salvage, returned to their native villages and hamlets. But the war left its traces; nothing was left but ruin. The most serious are the mine fields, which still continue to kill. The result was an uncontrolled exodus to the cities, notably to the wilaya seat.

This migratory movement brought with it nearly insurmountable difficulties, illustrated by a high unemployment rate, by the abandoning of work on the land and related activities, as well as by the crowding together of a veritable human flood around the cities, chiefly Tlemcen. Hence, a housing crisis and the inability of the administrative services to deal with it.

Taking this state of affairs into account, the government has granted substantial aid intended to alleviate gradually the economic and social crisis. On 30 June 1970 the Council of Ministers decided to vote for a special economic, social and cultural development program for this wilaya.

The program's main objectives were to put in place an infrastructure that would be indispensable to the wilaya's economic take-off--a take-off that would enable it to solve these problems on the one hand, and to participate fully in the development efforts.

Since that date a sustained effort has been undertaken to realize important projects in the various fields, whether economic, social or cultural: agriculture, hydraulics, industry, sociocultural services, infrastructure projects, etc.

Between 1970 and 1980 this gigantic effort seems to have born fruit by bringing about profound changes, at the infrastructural as well as the superstructural level.

That decade may be considered an important stage. It was during those ten years of multiple activities that the wilaya's face was transformed from top to bottom, with the accomplishing of the objectives contained in the special program and the realization of the two four-year plans.

The end result of the whole series of measures undertaken has been an appreciable rise in the inhabitants' standard of living. Thus were born, for the first time, modern industries, new roads, schools and high schools, as well as other sociocultural accomplishments.

Concerning investments in these various areas, the wali, Rachid Mirazi, told us: "The wilaya's development efforts required an investment on the order of 15,000,000,000 DA [dinars], of which 4,422,000,000 were allotted to decentralization operations for the period 1970 to 1979 inclusive."

The wali stated that the allotments affecting decentralization operations represent 2,000,000,000 DA.

Simple calculation reveals the difference that exists between the assigned goals and what has been accomplished, since the projects realized constituted 46 percent of the programs as a whole.

Although this proportion seems to represent less than half of the normal program (50 percent), this is because the development effort undertaken by the wilaya seems to have run up against many natural, administrative and technical difficulties, which we will explain a little farther on.

A clear picture of the various activity sectors may be provided by these figures (in thousands of dinars):

Development in time of drought: 109,634.

Ports: 158,800.

Primary and secondary education: 381,554.

Urban housing: 1,027,199.

Rural housing and agricultural villages: 349,403.

Hospitals: 51,487.

To this is added the budgetary envelopes allotted to the wilaya within the framework of the first and second four-year plans. (This does not take into account the investments carried out by local collectives and APCs.

In the second four-year plan may be cited (in thousands of dinars):

Rural development and modernization of agriculture: 117,534.

Dams and irrigation projects: 15,000.

Urban housing: 152,460.

Hospital infrastructure: 37,706.

Of course the government is fundamentally aimed at constant satisfaction of the population's basic needs and creation of a solid economic base that will make possible a permanent development.

What are the accomplishments of the Tlemcen wilaya? What point has it arrived at? Finally, what prospects are being set at a time when all the country's wilayas are looking forward to application of the first five-year plan?

Agriculture: Diversification Requires Promotion and Mechanization

In the light of what follows, the reader will see in what proportion certain objectives have materialized, and what problems have hampered the realization of some of them.

The Tlemcen wilaya, aside from the newly-created industries, is an agricultural wilaya.

Basically, its inhabitants draw most of their resources from working on the land. In fact, agriculture is the region's primary activity. The distribution of the population, according to the 1977 census, proves this point:

Number of inhabitants in the country: 328,884.

Number of inhabitants in the cities: 219,318.

The rural population represents 59.41 percent of all the wilaya's inhabitants.

The census also indicates that manpower in the agriculture sector is approximately 32,710 workers, which represents 35.6 percent of the total activity; the total number of workers in the wilaya does not exceed 91,705.

Usable agricultural area (SAU) is estimated at one third of all the wilaya's land, or 356,287 hectares out of 854,968. Uncultivated forested land and steppe (grasslands) account for 498,682 hectares (slightly over half of all the land).

The SAU in its turn is allocated as follows:

Private sector: 63 percent.

Self-managed sector: 31 percent.

Agrarian Revolution sector: 6 percent.

As a general rule the three sectors play an important role in the wilaya's economy, in the sense that the wilaya's agricultural production is quite diversified:

1. Large crops: Soft and hard wheat, oats, barley, etc.

The area reserved for this kind of crops reached some 173,452 hectares during the 1979-1980 season, the major part of it devoted to the hard wheat crop (67,683 hectares). In order to accomplish clearly positive results, various meetings were held to prepare seriously for that season.

2. Pasture crops: These crops take up fallow and irrigated land; but the latter are subject to many troubles. The lack of water in particular, and an almost permanent drought situation.

3. Dry vegetables: These crops get special attention among the leaders as well as among farmers; for both are concerned with increasing production.

The average yield per hectare reached 3 quintals during the last three years.

4. Industrial crops: This kind of crop was introduced throughout the wilaya as part of the application of the four-year plans and the special program. From this group sericulture (raising of silkworms) might be singled out.

For natural silk production a mulberry tree nursery (1,000,000 trees) was established. It makes possible 2 tons of natural silk per year.

Lavendar occupies an area of 1,000 hectares in the Sebdou region. This makes it possible to produce 9,000 kilograms of lavendar.

It is processed on the premises in a distilling unit.

5. Greenhouse crops: Introduced since 1970 within the framework of the first four-year plan, these crops are constantly being developed. They currently cover an area of 40 hectares. The average yield per hectare is 120 quintals.

6. Planting of fruit trees: The wilaya has agreed to huge efforts in this area, especially pertaining to the operations of development for drought, and of planting the trees.

These efforts have led to the development of fruit-tree culture; over 1,000,000 different varieties of fruit trees have been planted. They occupy an area of 4,000 hectares.

Currently the area--which was 3,400 hectares--has reached some 8,000 hectares in all.

Thus the Tlemcen wilaya is considered one of the most important fruit-producing regions.

7. Grapes: This group is currently going through significant changes, in the sense that the vines are gradually being replaced by table grape stocks.

Up to this point 550 hectares have been planted.

With regard to activities having to do with cattle raising, the effort has chiefly dealt with three main axes:

Improving sheep and cattle raising.

Putting sanitary structures in place.

Developing structures for aviculture and apiculture.

With this goal in mind, an experimental stable was built at Henaya with room for 400 dairy cows, before replacing the existing strain. The second objective is to improve dairy production by making possible a regular supply from the Tlemcen central dairy, which was started up in 1975.

It should be noted in this regard that dairy production at the wilaya level has greatly increased, having reached 2,856,000 liters in 1979.

As for apiculture and the gathering of honey, production has gone from 15,000 kilograms to 20,000 kilograms and the number of hives is 1,000.

As far as fowl breeding is concerned, a hatchery is in the process of being built. Upon its completion in 1981 it will be able to produce 50,000 laying hens, which will furnish 720,000 eggs annually.

These, succinctly described, are the three main agricultural sectors.

In the area belonging principally to the Agrarian Revolution, there seems to be a notable advance despite the hindrances created here and there at various levels of its application.

The representative of the Agrarian Revolution at the wilaya level indicated to us that the current phase is characterized by in-depth work toward completing the first and second phases, and to a lesser degree the third phase.

The work accomplished up to now was made possible by the creation of 102 Joint Exploitation Cooperatives (CAEC), bringing together 800 peasants who farm about 11,000 hectares.

In addition, 243 individual plots were allotted.

During the application of the second phase, 78 cooperatives (CAEC) were installed. They are exploited by 670 assignees and comprise 6,500 hectares. Similarly, 326 plots were allotted individually. They comprise about 3,000 hectares.

The third phase proceeded to create 10 CAPRAs [Agricultural Production Cooperative of the Agrarian Revolution] of 6 assignees each in the Sebdou region.

There are 17 more in the El-Ghour commune.

The representative stated that the management of these cooperatives is suffering no major problems, because their manpower is characterized by youth and stability.

With regard to rural housing, in the development program 57 villages were proposed; 13 have been completed and 4 others will be delivered soon. The remainder are still under study.

The representative said that the delay that is affecting these developments is not over six months on the average. The problem is due in large part to the lack of construction materials.

Agricultural Equipment and Temporary Breakdowns

The diversification of agriculture, the expansion of the useful area, the development of hydraulic resources in addition to very ambitious modernization projects have brought with them certain difficulties, which have had a negative influence on agriculture.

The most crucial problem the wilaya seems to undergoing is without doubt the lack of agricultural equipment, especially spare parts. For 628 hectares there is only a single combine harvester.

Similarly, the Agrarian Revolution sector possesses 357 tractors, 72 of which have broken down.

In general, the replacement parts problem is acute. The equipment situation is indeed quite disastrous. The following are broken down:

25 percent of the pneumatic tractors;

60 percent of the caterpillar tractors;

30 percent of the fertilizer spreaders;

30 percent of the seeders.

CAPCS [Communal Multi-Service Agriculture Cooperative] and ONAMA [National Agricultural Equipment Office] are busy repairing most of the equipment. But the effort of these two agencies is still ineffectual, which aggravates the situation, especially at the beginning of every season.

The second problem is irrigation water. Despite the existence of important hydraulic resources, the wilaya remains very poor in this area. Industrial projects and other utilities of a socio-economic nature use very large quantities of water.

Tlemcen water supplies even the city of Oran. The region most affected by this problem is undoubtedly the Maghnia plain, which specializes in irrigated crops.

Statistics show that only 180 hectares (of its 706 hectares) are reached by irrigation.

This is actually due to the drought that heavily affected the region during the last three years.

The technical services of this district are making efforts to increase the irrigated area by trying to bring it from 4,500 hectares to 8,000 hectares. The total area is 17,000 hectares. The project is certain to contribute important changes at the district level.

Marketing: the Main Thing is to Facilitate Operations

The marketing of fruits and vegetables is currently provided by the COFEL [Fruit and Vegetable Cooperative] of the wilaya and the OFLA [Fruit and Vegetable Office] agency; this is in accordance with the ministerial circular of March 1978.

Throughout the wilaya there are agencies of these two marketing structures. But here marketing runs into difficulties. Among which may be cited those having to do with equipment, in particular the absence of storage areas and areas for cold storage.

The difficulties in financing such means comes from complicated operations and steps that would have to be carried in the banking structures.

In spite of this, marketing in this wilaya is to be encouraged and supported, because this district provisions various other wilayas, among them Bechar and Ouargla.

What is important is that all the services at the wilaya level are moving with a view to resolving the difficulties being posed in the rural world. This promotion obviously requires:

Improvement of the technical skill of the peasants and stock raisers.

Setting up methods of exploitation and rational utilization of water.

This last point leads us to turn our attention to hydraulics at the wilaya level, to its accomplishments, its problems and its future prospects.

Hydraulics: a Vital Necessity

Activities in the field of hydraulics are basically oriented toward developing land and expanding the irrigable area, just as they deal with equipping wells located in the pastoral areas and, lastly, with water supply for consumption (drinking water).

Within this framework the irrigated Maghnia plain is viewed with special attention.

This plain extends over a total area of 17,000 hectares, of which 10,500 will be irrigated at first and some 6,500 other hectares will follow in a second period.

This ambitious project obviously requires that significant hydraulic resources be available; hence the plan for building two dams, the cornerstone for which was laid by the president of the Republic during his visit to this wilaya last February.

The first dam (the Souani), with its water reserve estimated at 14,000,000 cubic meters, will make it possible to enlarge the irrigated surface of the Maghnia plain.

The second, called El-Izdihar and located at Sidi-Abdelli, will contribute to the irrigation of an area estimated at 4,000 hectares. Its reserve capacity is 110,000,000 cubic meters.

In addition to these two developments, there are two other dams in the wilaya, the "Mafrouch" (16,000,000 cubic meters) and the "Beni Nahdel" (44,000,000 cubic meters).

In the near future, the wilaya authorities think the water from the Beni Nahdel dam can be used for the benefit of agriculture, after completion of the dam that will supply the city of Oran (Oued Cheliff).

Generally, the wilaya expects to realize ambitious projects in this area. Tlemcen in fact has a considerable expanse of water. But all of this has not been able to alleviate the effects of certain problems, especially the drought, which has affected agriculture in the wilays for the last three years, and the problem of non-delivery of means of irrigation. The problem is having negative repercussions on the Maghnia region. Losses amount to 30,000,000 DA at the present time.

Industry: to Ensure an Economic Take-off

The Tlemcen wilaya opted to put in place an industrial base, at the time of the special program as well as during development of the two four-year plans.

Moreover, special interest was accorded agriculture and its development, to create a balance between these two sectors.

Industrial activity is quite varied throughout the wilaya. In addition to the production of certain goods, it has made possible the gradual reduction of unemployment by the creating of 14,500 jobs, of which 7,100 are new jobs. Similarly, domestic savings, which was 4,000,000 DA in 1970, went to over 100,000,000 DA in 1979.

Industry occupies 16.8 percent of the manpower. Basically it produces material of a necessary nature: building materials, textiles, processing of agricultural products.

Building materials production has experienced a marked growth, which enables the wilaya to bypass the eternal shortages that seem to affect this kind of products, and especially to realize everything that was programmed in construction and housing.

The wilaya is currently producing, per year:

500,000 tons of cement at the Beni-Saf plant,

100,000 square meters of ceramic tiles (Remchi),

130,000 tons of red products at the Remchi plant (tiles and bricks),

600,000 sanitary ceramic units (El-Ghazaouet plant),

78,000 tons of breeze-block (Henaya plant).

To this effort is added another, manufacture from wood. Throughout the wilaya there are many production units, including the one at Nedroma, which annually produced 5,000 suites of modern furniture.

This sector will experience considerable expansion after completion of the projects in the course of development at Beni-Saf (carpentry); the latter plant will fill the wilaya's needs in doors, windows and building lumber (beams, etc.). It will go into production in 1981 and provide 800 jobs.

In the textile field, and considering that this wilaya has a chiefly traditional handcraft industry, it has become very difficult with time for the old textile plants to satisfy the craftsmen's demands for raw materials.

To fill the deficit, various projects have been adopted, including:

The natural silk and synthetic threat production complex which is in the developing stage. When it begins production in 1981 it will produce annually 15,000,000 meters of silk and approximately 60 tons of synthetic thread.

To this is added another rather important project specializing in making workmen's "blues." This unit will be installed in Sebdou. It will produce 12,000,000 meters of cloth per year. Moreover, in Maghnia there is already a similar unit, producing 30,000 garments per year.

With regard to the food processing industry in particular, the wilaya seems to be according it a certain interest in order to create a complementarity between agriculture and the food industry.

A flour mill is under construction according to the budget for the future; it will produce 2,000 quintals of semolina per day. Another project is also under construction in Maghnia.

It will specialize in daily processing of 200 tons of maize for production of a series of various projects, part of which will be used in the pharmaceutical industry.

In addition, other units will be put in place as part of the program of installing a small and medium-sized industry, the ultimate result of which will be to satisfy the needs of the population and create a number of jobs.

Heavy Industry and Technological Development

Industry has begun to expand in the Tlemcen wilaya, which seems to have gone beyond the first phase, which consisted of installing medium-sized and light industries. Large industrial complexes have been implanted here and there, throughout a plain with enormous potential.

The availability of certain materials in the wilaya and the presence of a coastal frontage have facilitated--or at least contributed to--installation of this industry. In fact this wilaya has two important ports: El-Ghazaouet and Beni-Saf, which play a large import-export role.

The wilaya seems to be very privileged in the mining field: iron at Beni-Saf (100,000 tons per year, all of it exported); a marble quarry at Ben Sekrane. Nevertheless, the latter is encountering difficulties in the way of rational exploitation. The most significant is difficulty in expanding, which heavily influences extraction.

Moreover, the wilaya has penetrated well and truly into the electronic era with the creation of a SONELEC [Algerian National Company for the Manufacture and Installation of Electrical and Electronic Equipment] unit for production of telephone equipment. It may be said that as of the present the wilaya is in every way experiencing a significant development in the industrial and agricultural fields. Renovating and improving land, air and maritime paths of communication will certainly help to alleviate the seriousness of certain problems and solve those that hinder importation and exportation, as well as exchanges with other wilayas.

Telephone Equipment Manufacturing Complex [Box]

The telephone equipment manufacturing complex at Tlemcen, whose official start of production was inaugurated by President Chadli Bendjedid during his most recent visit to this wilaya, is considered to be an important means of modernizing the national telecommunications system.

The complex occupies an area of 58 hectares. Its annual production of telephone exchanges (electromechanical equipment) is expected to reach 80,000 lines, divided as follows: 50,000 urban exchanges, 3,000 transit exchanges, 12,000 rural exchanges and 15,000 private exchanges.

In addition, production of semi-electronic telephone exchanges will be on the order of 20,000 lines, of which 10,000 will be urban exchanges and 10,000 will be transit exchanges.

Finally, this complex, which will produce 140,000 telephone handsets, will employ all told nearly 3,000 persons, including 150 engineers and higher-echelon executives, 288 higher technicians and production officers and 600 skilled workers.

Training and Education

The actions undertaken in the wilaya were not aimed solely at putting in place a single economic infrastructure, but also at establishing the bases of a true social and cultural policy.

For this reason education, training and public health are the object of attention and constant effort.

Education, with its four levels--primary, middle secondary, technical and higher--has undergone very considerable development at the level of the receiving structures as well as in the area of satisfying cultural and educational needs.

The percentage of children between the ages of 6 and 13 attending school was 73.3 percent between 1970 and 1979, whereas for the 1969-1970 period it was only 49 percent.

The number of primary school pupils has risen from 62,500 to 102,000.

Receiving this impressive number of pupils has necessitated building 1,409 classrooms and 653 housing units for the teachers.

In an interview with the director of education of the Tlemcen wilaya, we detected a certain optimism that seems to prevail in education circles, despite the existence of problems such as delays in school construction or the absence of housing for teachers.

The total number of middle education pupils is 25,500. In 1969-1970 the number was only 7,176. School attendance has increased 250 percent.

The continued increase in the total number of pupils has led authorities to consider the future. For this reason it was decided to build 17 CEMs [College of Intermediate Studies] whose delivery is expected for the period between 1980 and 1983.

Secondary and technical education are also undergoing considerable development: total numbers have increased 370 percent. The number of pupils has risen from 1,257 (1969-1970) to 5,680 at the beginning of the 1979-1980 school year.

In order not to suffer the repercussions of such growth, the wilaya has had to program two high schools capable of providing a boarding regime for girls. These two high schools are under construction, one in Remchi, the other in Beni-Saf. Their contribution to the training of girls from rural regions will be considerable.

As for higher education, there is in existence a university center which began normal operation in 1974. But efforts in its direction would have to be sustained and permanent, since registrations have increased by 800 percent. From 118 in 1974-1975 the number of students has grown to 1,080 in 1979-1980.

The university center dispenses training in various branches: exact and technological science, biology, economics, Arabic literature and law.

From that same interview we were able to learn of the problems that arise in education. In the first place is lack of housing, which constitutes a sure hindrance to development of this sector. Housing for teaching cadres--teachers and other trainers--is delivered with very significant delays, especially when it is known that the building of 100 classrooms must bring with the building of 100 housing units. Naturally this has repercussions on the effort to educate, which must take into account the increasingly impressive total numbers of pupils.

The same problem arises acutely in rural areas: despite the existence of housing in the schools, teachers flee these areas for the simple reason that the infrastructure necessary for a decent life is not available.

This is also found at the secondary level, where housing allotments are made only for foreign cooperants.

Nationals are left on the fringes, so to speak. Hence the high rate of absenteeism and lack of interest in the profession, the flight to other sectors.

Tourism: the Natural Framework Alone is not Enough!

Tlemcen is a city famous as much for its art as for its history. It has several views, sites and historic relics, which attract a significant number of tourists, Algerians and foreigners among them.

In addition, the Tlemcen wilaya encompasses in its high mountains very dense forest regions which allow for a good implantation of family tents, and beaches with fine golden sand, a preferred spot for spending the summer vacation.

Despite the efforts deployed in the touristic field, this sector continues to suffer from a lack of receiving structures, more precisely a lack of touristic complexes.

In Tlemcen, the Ziyanid Hotel is still the only establishment frequented by tourists.

We note that this hotel has increased its number of beds from 366 to 666--for the whole wilaya. Now, this is still below the demand, especially when there are known to be other structures in existence which for their part, for one reason or another, evidence considerable delays in reception. We cite as examples the Rivaux and Marguerite Villas, which occupy a picturesque site and dominate the whole city of Tlemcen and the Albert I Hotel, which is in the center of the city.

Will serious procedures be undertaken that will contribute to starting these important establishments up again?

The Handcraft Industry: Between Profits and Originality

The Tlemcen wilaya assumes a specific aspect through its diverse traditional handcraft industries. In this respect what is truly regrettable is that this industry is tending to shrink.

In the rug manufacturing field, for example, the handcraft industry is subject to significant contradictions, especially in importing raw materials and exporting production.

The handcraft sector has also suffered a significant fall in production, from 428,000 cubic meters in 1970 to 44,000 cubic meters in 1979.

What is the cause?

In the course of our interview with a union leader from the handcraft industries, we concluded that this sector is suffering from several difficulties. The craftsmen are increasingly uninterested in their work, given that production costs are very high and raw materials are increasingly rare.

We also note the beginning of the disappearance of the old generation of craftsmen, of these different kinds of industry and a total disinterest on the part of young people in this kind of industry.

Concerning a question about the role the training centers are to play in the field of handcrafts industries, he said that the wilaya has only two centers and that they are much more occupied with production, to the detriment of training.

However, the work performed in these centers has for its primary objective a significant monetary profit from the sale of the various handcraft products, rather than reactivation of this kind of traditional activity.

Wherein, Then, lies the Solution to This Delicate Problem? Housing: Efforts, But...

The education sector is not the only one to suffer from a lack of housing, nor are the industry or agriculture sectors, and most workers, whatever their activity, find themselves confronted with this delicate problem.

The housing crisis is a "fait accompli," one might say, for not only is it an impediment to development, but it also has negative repercussions on the very behavior of the people.

The wilaya is well aware of this. Hence the effort now being started. The results may be meager, but what counts is the desire to smooth out this major difficulty, at all costs. The wilaya, through the development of urban housing, has been the beneficiary of an allotment of 10,190 housing units. But the delays in their construction are so considerable that only 2,000 have been completed. Another 4,000 are under construction.

Faced with this situation, the wilaya has encouraged the parceling out of communal reserves to stimulate individual building. For that purpose more than 1,700 parcels of land have been sold to private individuals. In a next phase 6,000 plots of land will be sold.

Rural areas have also benefited from this measure. Of 10,000 housing units programmed, 6,400 have been received and the rest are on the way to completion.

The Agrarian Revolution for its part has contributed to promoting the rural world, chiefly in the area of housing, where 13 agricultural villages encompassing 1,760 housing units have come into being. Currently there is talk of expanding them to satisfy the many demands of the assignees.

Health: Delayed Accomplishments

The public health sector is considered to be of particular importance.

The wilaya's interest in this sector is most extensive.

Although for the past 10 years this sector has had only 20 institutions at its disposal, scattered throughout the wilaya, today it has seemed necessary to make it more dynamic in order to absorb the strong needs of the population--especially the rural population--in matters of health.

These needs are being merely 25 percent satisfied; health structures are able to supply only one bed per 425 inhabitants and one doctor for 5,600 inhabitants.

The wilaya is obviously extremely worried. Hence the plan to create other health centers, among them three hospitals to be built in Sebdou, El-Ghazouet and Maghnia. But these projects are experiencing construction delays.

The problems currently besetting this sector were the subject of an interview with the director of health of the Tlemcen district.

The director told us that the major problem does not lie in the lack of medications, as some citizens think, but in the paucity of means such as the receiving infrastructure and equipment for medical consultation and intervention. This sector also runs into a problem of utilization of equipment of local origin and diverse foreign provenances.

A large part of the equipment is not utilized, so to speak, at all, for many reasons: lack of knowledge of how to operate it, or the nonexistence of replacement parts.

The second problem is that of supplying the hospitals with various materials, food products in particular.

In fact, organizations having relations with the health sector are known to impose very rigid clauses in their contracts with the hospitals; which naturally has negative repercussions on the quality of care.

Between the Objectives and the Reality

Our presence in Tlemcen enabled us to ascertain what seems to have beneficial future consequences for this wilaya, at the urban as well as the rural level.

The survey gave us an opportunity to evaluate the whole effort agreed to in the last 10 years. Although the development process has not yet arrived at its final phase, on the other hand work is being carried on without respite to put an end to certain negative aspects, born of the rapid changes in the wilaya.

In fact the wilaya is planning to realize ambitious projects in many areas. But reality shows that there is a difference between the plans and what has really been made concrete.

Various difficulties stand in the way of the effort undertaken by the wilaya and the state; efforts basically aimed at permanently satisfying the increasingly important needs of the population.

The Tlemcen wilaya is in thirteenth place in the alphabetical classification of the country's 31 wilayas. Geographically it is in the extreme northwest.

Bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the east by the Sidi-Bel-Abbes wilaya and on the south by the Saida wilaya, the Tlemcen wilaya's western borders are 150 km long, and the northern border follows the sea as far as the El-Arricha steppe plains.

On the relief map this wilaya may be divided into four distinct zones:

The Terrara countain chain: this is a fairly low massif. It separates the Sahel from the interior plain.

The interior plain: it is characterized by an antagonism between the climate and the nature of the land that forms it.

The Tlemcen heights (or Tlemcen plateau): this elevation contains the region's most important water reserve.

The high steppe plains: pastoral, covered with grass.

On the administrative map the Tlemcen wilaya covers an area estimated to be approximately 9,283.7 square km. It includes seven districts and 31 communes:

Districts	Communes
Tlemcen	Tlemcen, Ben Sekrane, Tirni Beni Hdyl, Ouled Mimoun, Ain Fezza, Beni Mester, Ain Talout, Sidi Abdelli
Remchi	El Hanaya, Remchi, Beni Ouarsis, Ain Youssef
Nedroma	Nedroma, Fellaoussen, Jebala
Sebdou	Sebdou, El-Arricha, Beni-Snous, El-Ghour, Sidi-Djillali
Ghazaouet	El-Ghazaouet, Souahlia, Bab-El-Assa, Marsat Ben-M'hidi
Maghnia	Maghnia, Hammam Boughrara, Sabra, Sidi-Medjahed

Interview With Ahmed Kadri, the CNP [expansion unknown] of the Wilaya

[Question] The fundamental law of the party set forth the formation of the Wilaya Coordinating Council. What is the role of this council? And what have been the results?

[Answer] In fact, after the fourth congress of the FLN Party, the fundamental law of the party set forth the formation of a coordinating council at the commune as well as the wilaya level.

Its role is to coordinate all actions and important questions affecting the concerns of the citizens, as well as to find solutions to all problems by means of specialized authorities.

At the wilaya level the existing authorities were unable to understand all the problems that came up, in view of their ramifications. But after the Coordinating Council was formed, important problems began to be raised. They were brought up and discussed in order to make precise provisions for their resolution, either at the local level or with a view to submitting them to higher authorities.

In that connection, the Coordinating Council took charge of all internal questions, especially after the fourth FLN congress. Consequently, this will further consolidate the decentralization policy.

The last elections--communal as well as wilaya--turned out to be a good opportunity for the Coordinating Council to finally play a predominant role. In the course of this experiment we have been able to find a spirit of cooperation between the different parties concerned, and a complementarity in the serious work.

Nevertheless this experiment, even though its results are acceptable so far, has not produced the hoped-for results. And we hope the final results will be significant and positive, as soon as the determination and support for the present status are united.

At the commune level: in the current state of affairs we cannot evaluate the results achieved by this experiment, given that its activities in this area are still new. Thus, one comment should be made, whether the communal leaders are acting to coordinate their actions in the various areas.

Council meetings are set by Circular 1,639. This circular stipulates that regular meetings are to take place once a month. The Coordinating Council may also sit in extraordinary meetings, whenever important business necessitates such meetings.

[Question] Can you talk to us about the control, especially after the fourth FLN congress?

[Answer] Indeed, the fundamental law of the party defined control. As it also defined the role of the elected assemblies in this area. This kind of mission requires much more militantism and we hope the special commissions will be equal to the responsibility entrusted in them.

[Question] And what can you say about the activity of young people and their membership in the party?

[Answer] Yes, young people have shown a great desire to belong to the party. On our side we have consolidated the party, before the last elections, through young cadres. We recall that we have received almost 2,000 requests for membership.

Today we are in the presence of a considerable number of young militants to whom new responsibilities have just been assigned, at the APC as well as the APW [Governorate Popular Assembly] level.

Moreover, we are very optimistic and we believe the future will undoubtedly belong to the youth who is aware that the party is the real area for serious work.

Because of this, this look toward the future forces us consequently to open a horizon for these young people, so the torch of militantism can be passed on to them.

[Question] Concerning the campaign of fighting social evils, what are the activities of the national commission of the party?

[Answer] Indeed, we have contributed to the quality of militants in the fight against social evils.

Knowing that this wilaya is experiencing a special situation, considering that it constitutes a stopping-off place between the interior and the outside, it is exposed to certain negative aspects. In this regard, our work has been oriented in the direction of protecting the revolution and the citizen. As it has also been centered on making the citizens aware through the various meetings devoted to that goal. Our work is also continuing on all levels.

One of the most important things we have accomplished has undoubtedly been the various activities undertaken by the CNP Cultural Center. This is an important center geared to the level of all the young people, where one is in the presence of different cultural means, and of prestige.

In addition to its cultural role the center is in charge of a political activity, making young people aware. Consequently this enters into the domain of the campaign of fighting social evils.

Interview with the Wali of Tlemcen, Rachid Mirazi

[Interview by S.M., translated from the Arabic by M. A. Taleb]

[Question] Mr Wali, Tlemcen is one of the country's wilayas that benefited from a special program in 1970. What image does it present after ten years of development in this exact framework?

[Answer] Since 30 June 1970, when the Council of Ministers adopted a special program for socio-economic development, Tlemcen has undergone radical changes in all areas.

From that you can consider the decade just past as being a point of departure for realizing the special program and a solid base for effective execution of the two four-year equipment and development plans. This multiform development generally has as its objective the expansion of this wilaya, so it can play its role of participating in the national building.

On that subject, since the adoption of Tlemcen's special program, several achievements have seen the light of day in the economic, social and educational areas.

Development efforts undertaken by the wilaya have necessitated investment expenses amounting to 15,000,000,000 DA, of which 4,422,000,000 DA were for decentralized work, in the period from 1970 to 1979. The rate of achievement of the special program in all sectors has reached 46 percent.

[Question] Broad prerogatives have recently been assigned to the popular assemblies, have been uncontested, and the assemblies have played their role. So what are their prospects for action in the future?

[Answer] Naturally, the assemblies have fully played their role in working out plans, in presenting studies or choosing terrains to serve as locations for installation of factories.

The APC in particular played a large part in realizing the greater part of the special investment programs of this wilaya. This in addition to the communal development programs which were realized for the most part by many APCs with their own means.

As for the future, the APC, which is also an economic and social institution, is to furnish still more efforts so that the next five-year plan may be in a position to have at its disposal all the means indispensable for its success.

And there I would like to make an important comment about the communes and their new assemblies, which must scrupulously organize their structures. For despite the good will of the elected representatives and their sincerity in the work, the expected good results cannot be obtained without the creating of specialized services under the protection of the APC, charged with studying, planning and directing the projects for realizing the programs and coordination. All this for the purpose of perfect cohesion in the realization, to put an end to certain negative aspects and thus guarantee that the positive work will continue.

[Answer] Training is very important and is closely related to development. Among efforts undertaken in several fields are elementary, intermediate, secondary and higher education; other training efforts had to do with improving agriculture, civil engineering and urbanism.

And to provide training, several enrollment structures have been created:

Enlarging the agricultural technology institute, thus bringing its enrollment capacity to 300 pupils.

Enlarging the Mansourah Agricultural Professional Training Center and building an agricultural training center at Maghnia, as well as one at Ouled Mimoun, with a capacity of 200 pupils.

Concerning civil engineering and urbanism, we have opened an institute for training technicians. Its enrollment capacity is 500 pupils. For professional training, the existing structures have been consolidated by the opening of a professional training center for adults in Maghnia, its capacity being 88 places, with board guaranteed for all the pupils. To this will soon be added the building of an adult professional training center for young women in Tlemcen and two other centers at Beni-Saf and Ghazaouet. The enrollment capacity of the first will be 132 places and that of the second 200 places.

[Question] Housing is among the citizens' major concerns. What are the wilaya's realities in this field? What has been done thus far? Is the wilaya encountering difficulties in this area and what are the causes?

[Answer] In fact, availability of housing to the citizens is more than a necessity, and the wilaya is continually making great efforts to satisfy the growing demands in this sector.

Within the framework of various programs the wilaya has been the beneficiary in urban housing of 10,190 housing units, 2,000 of them already built. Another 4,000 units are in the process of being built. The rest are in the planning stage or under study. Individual building, for its part, is being made use of to alleviate the crisis, when it becomes apparent that 1,700 plots of land have been sold and 6,000 other plots will be sold soon.

In rural housing, 6,400 units have been built and another 2,500 are on the point of being built, out of 10,000 units to be developed. To this are to be added 13 socialist villages encompassing 1,760 housing units, and 6 socialist villages in the process of development.

But despite all these accomplishments, the housing problem is still with us, especially in the districts of Tlemcen, Beni-Saf and Nedroma, whose buildable land is few and far between because these districts are much more mountainous.

Add to that the growing demands of the citizens, arising from this region's expansion. The wilaya receives daily about 300 requests for housing, not to mention the delays in building them.

[Question] Tlemcen is famous for its art and its history and possesses important historic relics. Has tourism in this area benefited from good investment? Is there a plan to protect and preserve the patrimony?

[Answer] It is true that Tlemcen, because of its geographic position and its varied topography, possesses important touristic assets, not to mention its dry climate.

Tlemcen may be considered a tourist region, thanks to the existence of beautiful beaches like those at Beni-Saf, Ghazaouet and Marsa Ben M'hidi, as well as a forested mountainous region suitable for camping. Moreover, there are historic relics in the city of Tlemcen and its region.

The wilaya is seriously inclined toward tourism. As witness the three hotels with a total capacity of 660 beds. As for welcoming foreigners, we hope the new Tlemcen airport will be an important factor in the development of this sector.

As for protecting and preserving the relics, the Ministry of Information and Culture is permanently in charge of this. Besides its concern for protecting the historic sites, every year it encourages the organization and holding of festivals of traditional music so it will not be forgotten and allowed to die out.

[Answer] I should like to focus my conclusion on the fact that these ten years of development have proven, if proof is needed, that the decentralization policy has made possible a local economic take-off that will be a great contribution to building the nation. This period has also demonstrated that the state is clearly disposed to satisfy the needs of the citizens.

In the future the work will consist of optimally using the means for realization, which cannot fail to have a positive influence on our development.

Skikda's Topography

Algiers EL DJEICH in French Jun 80 pp 12-19

[Article by A. Laib and T. Bouanika: "A Wilaya in Search of Lost Time"]

Formerly a district of the Constantine wilaya, with hilly topography, wooded regions and small but very rich alluvial plains, Skikda has always been considered an area vital for the economy of the hinterland. As much for its supplying agricultural materials as for its being opened up by sea roads.

Since antiquity the port of Rusicada has played a large role in trade. In fact it was through that port that the Romans shipped the wheat from the high setifian plains to Rome.

But history being what it is, how is it with Skikda today, this wilaya of which very little is known, except perhaps for its petrochemical plants or, to football fanatics its football equipment--or even that heap of cliches, of preconceived notions that have come to light about human behavior, about juvenile delinquency? Two myths that are overrated, well-tended, amplified. Two myths that poorly conceal the shocking reality of Skikda. A long veiled reality, distorted by the complacent speeches of certain newspapers.

We acknowledge first of all that Skikda is neither one of the small peaceful villages of the Mediterranean coast, nor, even less, is it one of those ill-famed towns of detective literature.

It is not so much the epiphenomena that are important in this wilaya, but rather the real causes that have engendered a visible--very visible--sickness in the city as well as in the country. And in Skikda the country is a mere stone's throw away; the proof, those shantytowns that have literally blossomed in recent years around it and have expanded so far as to penetrate into its most intimate corners. Bouabaz, Sebaa Biar, Le Match, Zef Zef. These are the names given to quarters that have been very rapidly submerged by those makeshift constructions built in one night, which scarcely differ from rural habitations.

Let us say right away that in Skikda there is a vast difference between the city and the country where, according to the most official figures, 80 percent of the population lives in shacks. The sole innovation: corrugated iron has replaced the traditional thatched roof, and--a sign of modern times that reminds us we are well into the 20th century--an occasional television antenna sticks up among the very precarious rooftops.

Industrialization in Skikda: is it a Mistake?

Struggling along, barely, clinging to a subsistence economy which is basically agrarian, the rural zones have violently suffered the repercussions of industrial development.

Already remote from progress, isolated, they have seen their situation aggravated with the putting in place of a very important industrial infrastructure only a few km from Skikda. A point of view bitterly defended by the great majority says that the great evils the wilaya is experiencing come right from those industrial installations that have absorbed a large part of the agricultural manpower.

Skikda, they say, is a basically agricultural wilaya, and excessive industrialization has upset the already fragile equilibrium on which the region's economy is based. In fact this has led to an unprecedented exodus toward Skikda in particular, where hundreds of families from rural areas have elected to take up residence. In shantytowns, of course.

Statistics show that 3,000 peasants are currently working in the industrial zone, where salaries are very alluring. This figure represents at least 35 percent of the region's farmers, who have abandoned their land almost permanently. Even the assignees of the Agrarian Revolution have not been able to resist the attraction cast over the whole surrounding countryside by this petrochemical area, a veritable Eldorado where the wages paid by foreign corporations are the highest in the country. The high rate of withdrawals alone illustrates this attraction. A moral pollution of the peasantry, says the wali. Of the 2,133 registered for allotment, only 1,183 remain. In the district of Skikda withdrawals have been the highest: over 75 percent. Another example, the agricultural village of Guerbes, 250 housing units, for which alone 20 requests have been registered for allotment.

The primary consequence of this exodus, which is encouraged by the fact that living is so difficult in the rural environment, is the marginalization of work on the land which has brought with it a heavy demand for fruits and vegetables; production having reached its lowest level.

Another consequence is the price explosion. Not only for fruits and vegetables, but for everything that can be sold. And although throughout the past--the recent past--the tight-fisted employers of the people (they cannot be called anything else) resorted to artificial shortages to justify such an increase, today they simply impose their prices--in the proper meaning of the word.

The high cost of living that hits the populations hard is also explained by a kind of competition established by the foreign colony working in the industrial zone. The merchants align their prices by basing them on the extremely strong purchasing power of the 6,000 foreigners living temporarily in Skikda.

The Origin of the Evils

But another point of view runs counter to the first. In the eyes of many leaders the effects of industrialization have never been negative. To them, the error lies in the procedure followed by the development planners. In fact, agricultural development, although it has been part of the national political debate for years, has not followed industrial development. And in Skikda the imbalance between these two sectors is very visible. The most striking manifestations are in the contradictions that exist between the city and the country.

Actions or Sections	No. of Housing Units	1979 Deliveries	Payment for Deliveries 1980	1981-82
Individual construction	601	-	601
Socialist villages	1,790	50	890	850
Stabilizing self-management sector	691	-	216	475
TOTAL	3,082	50	1,707	1,325

The first great difference is housing: the few permanent structures date back for the most part to the colonial epoch. Here and there farms can be noticed (or the vestiges of farms), mostly occupied by individuals having no relation to work on the land. According to the last census, carried out within the framework of the stabilizing of self-management fields, approximately 600 housing units are occupied illegally. To this phenomenon is added the enormous delays in building the agricultural housing written into the various national development plans. Until the present time the wilaya has had no agricultural socialist village (?). The one at Guerbes, whose emplacement is very poorly chosen (it would have made a marvelous tourist village, certain leaders think--very much aloud), will be completed this summer, they say.

For rural housing has its importance in stabilizing the peasants. As the wali says:

"I am convinced of the Algerian's peasant origin and that the Algerian is still tied to his land, even if he has been detached from it for years, for objective or subjective reasons.

"I am sure the Algerian will return to his land if he is given the means and if someone will create the conditions to do it. Moreover, this will enable us to give agriculture all the importance it should have, all the interest and all the efforts it requires."

The agricultural housing needs of the wilaya were estimated in 1979 at 9,130 units. Since 1974 the wilaya has only been given 3,082.

Of 1,790 housing units provided for, 1,340 are in progress and 450 not started.
*[expansion unknown]

The delays are therefore enormous and the gap is difficult to fill, the wilaya's authorities believe. And this has led them to energize construction in the rural environment. The first measures: to accelerate projects in progress and create a wilaya company that will be in charge of building the agricultural villages, the SOPRECOVSKI [expansion unknown]. Adding to the relatively long list of other companies of the same type, the SOPRECOVSKI will build about four housing units per day, starting this year. It will work in close collaboration with the Rural Housing Technical Committee, an authority presided over by the wali which will be in charge of supervising the realization of all the programs provided for up until that time. Programs to which must be added 46 additional agricultural villages to be built under the five-year plan. These villages will all be designed by a wilaya study bureau, the SODESKI [expansion unknown].

All of these programs are addressed to the self-managers in the socialist agricultural sector, to the Agrarian Revolution assignees and to the cooperators from the CAPAMs [War Veterans Agricultural Production Cooperative]. Private farmers and citizens living in rural areas but having activities other than agriculture, will only see their problems solved by means of individual building, which is believed to be the most realistic solution. It would still be necessary for the aid granted by the state (17,500 DA) to be re-evaluated in terms of the current prices of construction materials, an APC chairman believes. A sizable problem arises before that solution can be applied: where to build? Most rural dwellers live on land whose legal status is still to be determined. In some zones with a heavy concentration of habitation and localities, citizens are formally forbidden to build any buildings at all. The solution, then, is to be found in land reserves. The authorities have asked whether the plots will be actually given over to the great mass which is chiefly concerned in the operation. In that case prices cannot be aligned on a price scale, but must be symbolic. What is important is that the problem be solved. The principle was adhered to at the first APC session last April, and its application is imminent.

A problem that is no less delicate remains to be solved. This is the clarification of the status of certain lands on which are established populations who have been there for generations. Many people request authorization to build on it without being satisfied: refusal, both on the part of the administrative authorities and the owners of the land (basically self-managed and CAPAM domains). It would be futile to attempt to convince these populations to move, unless the most objective conditions making it possible to do so were created there.

The Real Causes of the Decline in Agricultural Activity

They are numerous. Industrialization is not the only or even the main cause of the rural exodus, the abandonment of the land. It would be, rather, "the difficulty of living in the rural environment" that has led the active population to be uninterested in agricultural work. Young people especially prefer to seek their "fortunes" elsewhere, to emerge from poverty by going to work in the petrochemical field. For in this milieu that is both hard and rough, all that they lack--schools, health structures, means of transportation, roads, water, electricity--, the list of their needs is a long one. And the land is unrewarding. Only the old have stayed in the production units of the socialist sector and the Agrarian Revolution. In the CAPAMs and in the small private developments as well.

In Skikda the problem of agricultural manpower arises in a special way. Studied in its structural and social aspects, it reveals first that:

> the proportion of seasonal workers to permanent workers reaches 70 percent in the self-managed domains. In the CAPAMs it is--370 percent! One might as well say that the real seasonal workers are the permanent workers (and vice versa); many of the permanent workers are of very advanced age. Thirty percent of the moudjahidine in the CAPAMs are over 55. In the self-managed domains 32 workers are over 60. In the cooperative sector of the Agrarian Revolution there are 102 assignees who are over the active age.

On this subject, the wali believes

"In this connection, we must seriously concern ourselves in the beginning with rural youth. Especially those who have been unable to pursue their studies. So we must take much more interest in those young people by creating training structures tied in with agriculture and setting up an agro-industry that will give importance to the agricultural product."

Secondly, the agricultural sector has at its disposal "a work force that includes everyone," a heterogeneous manpower. In the cooperative sector the criteria for allotment set forth in Art 119 of the Agrarian Revolution ordinance have not been respected. Hence a human component of varying perspectives, generally having no tie with purely agricultural activity. This has brought with it a low productivity and decreased agricultural production. And an under-utilization of the mechanical means arising from poor technical training and an absence of maintenance. In addition, the lack of spare parts, to which is added an infrastructure low on buildings and storage hangars, has caused a large number of tractors to be immobilized.

The wali said that a number of measures have been taken to meet this situation of anarchy:

"First at the CAPCS [Communal Multi-Service Agriculture Cooperative] level: we have returned them to their original mission, which is to be the technical-administrative support for the agricultural units; which has not been done without "damage," since over half of the directors of these multi-service cooperatives have been suspended from their duties; six of them have been brought to court for misappropriation of funds, thefts, etc.

"Then in the production units we have forbidden individual stock raising. This action, though very difficult--because enormous interests come into play--has been conducted with a certain success. From 40,000 head of cattle we have gone to 20,000. In the agricultural units the total number of head of cattle has been reduced 80 percent.

"In the third place, we have instituted plans for crops compatible with the wilaya's fruit and vegetable needs. Their application is compulsory. For 1979 these plans were 90 percent respected.

"Finally, we have begun to release elderly persons from agriculture in such a way as to rejuvenate and make the sector more dynamic. Moreover, we put everything to work to develop rural housing construction so as to sedentarize the peasants in their units."

It would have been more interesting to have had some figures related to the financing of the agricultural sector. These figures could have cast additional light on the nature of the evils agricultural is suffering from. Unfortunately the information could not be furnished by the BNA [National Bank of Algeria] (because decisions are excessively centralized there).

Other problems stem in general from natural weather vagaries, not the least of which is the configuration of the topography. Only the districts of Azzaba and El-Harrouch are relatively well endowed with plain. One cannot speak of the Skikda plain, for it has almost disappeared, to give way to industrial installations and new housing towns.

In the area of hydraulics, although the wilaya records the heaviest rainfall in the country (2,000 millimeters per year), it is seen to be rather light. This wealth of water is very poorly exploited because present storage capacities are very meager. The only solution would be to build dams and small hillside reservoirs which will make it possible to increase the usable agricultural area and irrigate the land which is considered to be among the best in the country.

To these difficulties are added specific problems in the self-managed domains, CAPRA and CAPAM. They are mainly problems of parceling out the farms and the immense size of families. Eleven self-managed domains cover between 1,000 and 2,000 hectares. As for parceling, an example of this is given by CAPRA Belloucif (Zighout Youcef), which is comprised of 200 hectares, divided into--17 portions. The Lahki domain in Salah Bouchaour has 922 hectares and is divided into 19 portions.

SECTOR	NUMBER OF TRACTORS	TRACTORS IN DISREPAIR
Socialist sector	1,000	200
Private sector	400	70
TOTAL	1,400	270

Another specific problem is that the orchards are aging. Nearly 50 percent of the citrus fruit trees are over 35 years old. Moreover, the very important olive patrimony is still poorly protected, leading to double deterioration at the production level. Enormous losses have been brought about by the harvest methods (shaking down) and lack of maintenance (essentially pruning) of the already-old olive trees. Although the age limit for olive trees is easily over 1,000 years, nevertheless a process should be initiated of regenerating old plantations and developing new ones.

Comprehensive Solutions

Faced with the most difficult of situations, the wilaya's authorities have assumed as a first phase a body of very energetic measures. Measures that appeared to be unpopular because they drastically changed many bad habits (see the interview with the wali).

In a second phase the authorities drew up a plan of action that denotes a desire to see the end of the most visible problems:

> In the field of hydraulics, the wilaya has taken the initiative in creating a wilaya-owned company in charge of drilling and developing irrigation projects (FORAGERSKI [expansion unknown]).
> In parceling, and the immensity of the farms, the agricultural leadership expects to find lasting solutions, consistent in their restructuring of the land. The operation that has been going on since December 1979 with a certain scientific rigor will soon be completed.
> Parallel with the rehabilitation of self-managed farms and the retirement of elderly persons, it is proposed that an ambitious technical training program for agricultural workers be drawn up.
> In order not to create an imbalance between rural areas themselves, the authorities have decided to distribute the technical cadres rationally among the regions and production units.

It is also believed that the communal delegations will be a large contribution to setting agriculture to rights. The plans for cultivation will no longer suffer the huge gaps so prevalent today. The technicians will participate in working them out.

But the cornerstone that largely conditions the success of the agrarian policy is still control of marketing. The effectiveness of the system put in place is closely dependent upon the production level of the agricultural developments, the Agrarian Revolution representative in the wilaya believes. These developments, he says, are producing only 20 to 25 percent of the fruits and vegetables; the greater part is supplied by the private sector, which prefers to market its production to middlemen, who are very powerful in the wilaya. The amounts turned over to the CAPCSes and COFEL are very low, which naturally results in the private sector being predominant; it becomes easy for the private sector to set prices. Prices that are among the highest in the country.

The authorities expect to find a solution to this major problem in reactivating the CAPCSes and furnishing them the means to make the cooperatives the technical-administrative support of the production units.

With the taking of a whole body of measures concerning sectors having a direct or indirect relationship with agriculture--and more or less affecting agricultural activity--, the authorities expect to be able to redress one of the most difficult of situations. It is difficult because it has inherited a very restrictive development concept. We add that it also comes from a style of thinking that has the visible imprint of demagogy.

Transportation: Eight SNTV [expansion unknown] Buses for an Entire Wilaya

[Box by A. Laib]

For the 22 communes of the Skikda wilaya the SNTV has made available to users the miniscule and ridiculous number of only eight buses!

In reality the wilaya was provided with 33 buses and coaches, a supply that some leaders with warped minds considered very adequate and far surpassing (sic!) the transportation needs of this wilaya.

This general conclusion arrived at by these aces of prediction led the SNTV to transfer 25 coaches to SONATRACH . Twenty-five coaches which the latter company is using two hours a day at the most, to transport its workers from Skikda to the industrial zone (less than 8 km away) and vice versa.

The citizens of the 22 communes and hundreds of hamlets that border on them are subject to the repercussions of the less than honorable practices of the SNTV, which does not deign to grant any power of decision at all to its Skikda agency.

The consequence of this "centralist" vision: little service is provided by the SNTV; it has no interest in relatively long routes.

Hence the paucity of communes and even districts directly connected with the wilaya seat.

A flagrant insufficiency of transportation can be noted between Collo-Skikda and El-Harrouch-Skikda. As for direct connections between Skikda and Azzaba, and Skikda-Zighout Youcef, that is simple: they are nonexistent.

In the matter of transportation for travelers, there is also a private sector, which does an equally bad job of fulfilling its commitments.

In Skikda may be noted the presence of 14 transportation contractors who have available a total of 26 cars. Very old cars, some of them over 30 years old; decrepit equipment constituting a permanent danger to travelers' security.

Until the SNTV becomes aware of the situation, until the problem of meager service is solved on the local scale--which the wilaya authorities are currently doing--the already serious situation tends to deteriorate further with the birth of a negative phenomenon, that of the clandestine taxis which impose their own law of price fixing for fares.

For about 10 km you will be made to pay 5 DA per fare. For a "round trip," to go and return, it will cost you 60 DA, and if you take your "taxi" well after nightfall that price might easily be multiplied by two. All this at your own risk and peril.

A Single Departure for Algiers

Although the Skikda wilaya is considered an industrial center, thus bringing about an incessant coming and going of people, up to now it has at its disposal only a single coach providing the connection (indirect) between Skikda and Algiers.

The departure time--0530--is very ill chosen; it is true that at that hour it is difficult, indeed impossible, to take any means of locomotion at all to get oneself to the bus station. A bitter trial for the inhabitants of the surrounding villages who must get up at 0300 to be sure of not missing their bus. A quite normal bus in which hygiene remains totally absent.

Health: an Infrastructure That Falls Very Short of the Needs

[Sidebar by A. Laib]

Divided into six health sectors, the Skikda wilaya has only seven hospitals with very small capacity, a total of 1,170 beds in all, and for everyone. Using the norms established by the Health Ministry--according to which the wilaya of Skikda should have 2,064 beds--the shortage seems enormous.

Moreover, the health buildings are too old: the El-Harrouch Psychiatric Hospital is 80 years old. The one at Azzaba should have been destroyed before independence. As for the Skikda Hospital--a former barracks--, it needs large-scale repairs. Finally, the Collo Hospital, of more recent construction, needs stabilization work; the land on which it is built is in perpetual motion.

Health coverage is still very poor because of an infrastructure considered to be very short of the needs. The Skikda wilaya has only three polyclinics instead of 17; eight health centers, whereas there should be 103; and 64 consultation rooms, whereas there is need--hang on tight--for 258!

Means for research are also a sizable problem because they are very inadequate.

There are only three centralized surgical units (one of them private) in the city of Skikda, four x-ray stations which are most often broken down, and four analysis laboratories (two in Skikda, one in Collo and one in El-Harrouch).

There are also six private offices; 13 dental chairs and 17 pharmacies.

This alarming situation continues to worry the authorities a great deal; they seem to be redoubling their efforts to alleviate its affects.

The first action in that direction to be emphasized is that the wilaya has endowed each commune with an ambulance.

The second action, still to the wilaya's credit: interesting national and foreign doctors by furnishing them with furnished apartments, which has enabled the wilaya to have a total of 26 physicians, encompassing all specialties.

The third action: creation of a paramedical school in Skikda and an annex in Collo.

But despite all this, the shortage remains quite significant in relation to the required norms. To satisfy the health needs would require 15 more doctors, 121 pharmacists and 118 dentists, just as 1,840 other paramedical agents would need to be added to the 735 already in place.

To the inadequate infrastructure--which will come to a kind of conclusion with the launching of a health construction and equipment program--is added the problem of medications, which would have to come from Algiers. In Skikda, it is being proposed that a wilaya warehouse be created, so that frequent inventory gaps need no longer be suffered.

With these very limited means the health leadership, to his credit, has registered a large number of mass actions, the most important of which was the systematization of school hygiene. And Skikda may be considered one of the few wilayas to have decreed an effort in this direction.

Health checks have affected 400,000 pupils who possess all their reports (the reports that follow them throughout their schooling). Each pupil is checked, not by a health technician, but by a physician. Which has made it possible to detect and diagnose many diseases in time.

The second large mass action was written within the framework of purification. It dealt with codification of all water locations existing in the wilaya (environmental hygiene), and massive vaccination of all children from birth to six years of age.

Tourism: Unexploited Resources

Skikda has enormous unexploited touristic assets, In fact, in this wilaya is found the most beautiful bay in the world, Chetaibi.

Yes, Chetaibi Bay is the most beautiful in the world, with its natural beauty and its marvelous contours eclipsing those made to seem like Eden by publicity hoop-la.

I arrived hardly believing it. And Kamel Lassoui, assistant director of the Altour agency in Skikda, smiled at my astonishment. It was he who gave me this information in an interview he kindly granted me to inform us about tourism activity in this wilaya.

First of all, he said, Skikda is a coastal city, thus offering summer visitors the possibility of swimming recreation. In addition to Chetaibi it has three beautiful beaches in the districts of Collo, Skikda and Azzaba.

Then, Skikda is a mountainous wilaya, thus being capable of satisfying lovers of mountain tourism. Although fires do enormous damage every year, the forest remains very dense in some regions.

Finally, it offers possibilities for green-country tourism appealing especially to students (vacation colonies) and senior citizen tourists.

But the absence of welcoming infrastructure and roads with access to certain areas constitute a handicap to the development of tourism in this wilaya.

Altour has only one urban hotel, Es-Salam, a four-star establishment that instead performs the function of dormitory for the executive personnel of foreign corporations.

This being so, the authorities know full well that the development of tourism goes hand in hand with the creation of certain conditions, chiefly material and infrastructural. Thus, for the project of constructing a touristic complex at Stora, an ancient Roman port located 3 km from Skikda, the authorities are first planning a number of infrastructure projects before installing the complex itself. Stora, as the wali said, will become the Sidi-Fredj of the Skikda wilaya.

Education: no High School Built Since 1962

[Sidebar by A. Laib]

The Skikda wilaya is in ninth place in the rate of schooling, with its 73 percent of educated pupils. The very poor enrollment infrastructure is responsible for the relatively low rate. In fact no high school has been built since 1962. The two institutions of this type have a very limited capacity and the only girls' high school, En-Nahda, dates from 1924. It has only 200 boarding beds.

The El-Larbi Tebessi boys' school, although more important, does not satisfy the requests for admission to the boarding regime.

The board of education tries to satisfy as well as can be expected the expressed needs in school matters, at the primary as well as at the intermediate and secondary levels.

By practising "veritable gymnastics" on the classroom curriculum, the board has managed to create four additional secondary institutions.

Institutions that stay alive thanks to classes taken in the intermediate school, which itself struggles along with the help of the primary school.

The delay in school building is considered enormous. Hence a large-scale action to build a very large number of schools, CEMs [College of Intermediate Studies] and two large-capacity high schools (1,000 places each, of which 300 are for boarders).

With regard to teaching personnel, Skikda's ITE [Technical Education Institute] continues to train some of them, the rest being supplied by Constantine.

The board of education expects to Algerianize the intermediate course in 1984.

School Bus Service: to be Regulated Locally

Because they generally live very far from their schools, the children of the rural areas have to use the most bizarre means to get there. Those who live on heavily-traveled roads are relatively better off than their comrades whose homes are in isolated regions.

As an example, the children of the "Djenane El-Anab" locality (on the Skikda-Azzaba axis) have to cut through by way of the mountain to reach Beni-Bechir (Skikda-Constantine axis), or go along the Skikda-Azzaba-Constantine side road, in the hope of catching some means of transportation.

A means presented in the form of--or rather, strangely resembling--a bus. A private bus belonging to a long-gone period, whose appearances are at once short and furtive. Absences, on the other hand, are curiously prolonged.

Aware of the gravity of the situation, the wilaya leaders have taken over this phenomenon, which, one hopes, will come to an end with the creation of local government control and transportation syndicates in each commune.

Already, as an early temporary solution, the wilaya has endowed the communes with trucks equipped to transport pupils. Although many settlements are not yet affected, it is believed that all the difficulties having to do with school bus service will be ironed out in a very short time.

Medea's Development

Algiers REVOLUTION AFRICAINE in French 1-7 Aug 80 pp 17-25

[Article by Kamal Zemmouri: "Medea: the Development Dams"]

[Text] When one thinks of development and starts looking for its fruits, one sets out to enumerate the plants recently installed: the industrialization-development partnership has become one of our faults. If one leaves it at that for the wilaya of Titteri, one will quickly arrive at the conclusion that the wind of development has never blown on this immense territory in the center of the country. The total industrial investment in the region is ridiculous. Only Berrouaghia, with the SONACOME [National Mechanical Engineering Company] complex, has experienced a mini-industrial upheaval. Everywhere else the priority has been given to agriculture. Fate is fair.

Medea: a wilaya beyond all reproach. This at least is the message that men of the soil and the city will pass on; a message supported by a sometimes dry and arid countryside. The effects of the different development plans will constitute, according to the sacred word in this region, more of a "sprinkling" than anything else. The former Titteri is immense. The new wilaya of Medea, although reduced to more reasonable proportions, is nevertheless still very vast. The fruits of development, especially of the special program, are thus sometimes concentrated in an urban center, sometimes disseminated right in the country. So it is hard to draw up with the naked eye a first balance sheet of Titteri's special program, as its operations are diverse and ostentatious. The "special" will have given priority first to agriculture, then to education. Industry occupied a laughable place there, something about which no one dreams of complaining.

Thus, to speak of the Titteri "special" is chiefly to speak of agriculture. Over a fourth of the credits will be dedicated to an integrated agricultural development plan for the region. As will be seen later on, the bases for future development existing today in this great region in the center of the country, have to do with union between East and West, North and South. Another positive observation is the judicious nature of the sectors to which credits are allotted. Above all they have been eager for the region not to deviate from its real economic vocation, but that it fortify it, with the help of the agricultural plan induced by the "special," and also by the famous Sidi-Slimane plan.

The third wing that constitutes the basis of regional development: hydraulics. In that area there is stagnation. Without these three elements nothing can be done downstream.

The Medea wilaya is situated on a privileged axis that supports most of the North-South traffic. This situation should enable it to play a decisive role in the national economy and consequently assure it of a swift and harmonious development. But the diversity of its geographical aspects is going to form resistance to prompt actions.

With a total area of 8,704 square km, the Medea wilaya is divided into three large natural zones: the north, where the mountainous tell forms a quasi-continuous band encircling the region from Ouarsenis to the Tablat massif; the center and the west, where the plains of the Tell are situated (the Merachadas and Beni-Slimane plains); lastly, the south, where the southern piedmont and the steppe plains are stretched out.

However significant it may seem, however, the total area of these zones is only one sixth of the area useful to the agricultural economy, the region's main economic activity. In fact, 77.5 percent of the wilaya's active population works in agriculture and makes a living for almost all of the regional population, which is estimated at 48,395 persons.

The Titteri special program made it possible to immobilize a considerable mass of credits to enable the region to emerge from a chronic under-development. Agriculture, which with training made off with the better part of the credits (30 percent and 26 percent), saved the region from the hazards of a rural exodus, as happened in other neighboring wilayas ;the absence of heavy industrial solicitation made the people "cling" to agriculture, the region's future. There are virtually no shantytowns in the wilaya. The urbanization rate (22.9 percent) is still very low (out of 483,954 inhabitants, 350,586 live in rural areas).

The financial envelope granted by the government as part of the special [program] was 1,000,000,000 DA, distributed as follows: 30 percent for education and training; 26 percent for industry and handcraft; 11.5 percent for housing; 8 percent for social equipment (hydraulics, 7.4 percent; tourism, 1 percent; transportation and communications, 7.8 percent; public health, 1 percent; administration, 2.3 percent; miscellaneous, 5 percent).

More Than Tail-End Operations

The Titteri wilaya has undergone important changes, as much on the economic level by means of the combined effect of investments in all activity sectors, as on the territorial level as a result of the administrative division that made it possible to cut this immense territory down into more homogeneous areas, for greater efficiency and more strictness in the actions of men, by means of the appropriate structures. The economic transformation of the region which, still a long way from having permanently eliminated the under-development, has nevertheless imprinted the irreversibility of its having surpassed itself; this is basically due to the impetus of the special. Today it can be said that the program has been realized almost in its entirety; there remains only what specialists call "tail-end operations." The order has just been given to bring all the special program operations to an administrative end.

By acting more intensely than elsewhere on agriculture and training, the special program made possible a combined action on two factors fundamental to the economic take-off: man and the land. In education and training, the realization of the program enabled this region to be enriched by 2,000 primary classrooms, 4 high schools, a normal school, two teachers' training centers and 10 CEMs, for a total of 14,000 places. The rate of schooling thus will go from 32 percent in 1970 to 95 percent in 1980. This action was to be supported by the construction of a whole new sports and recreation infrastructure, including 8 youth clubs, 6 multi-purpose rooms, 6 stadiums and 7 games areas, one swimming pool and one specialized center.

The improvement in the standard of living of the region's citizens has been considerable. In housing, the former Titteri wilaya has received 2,000 individually-built housing units and 1,724 housing units, of which 511 are semi-urban.

The road network has been expanded, thanks to the building of 95 km of wilaya roads and 339 wilaya lanes, to which are added the 72 km of the first plan.

Under the heading of means of realization, corporations have been created to take charge of the planned projects. Thus, the Wilaya Works Company, born in 1971, has from its earliest years been entrusted with a fair number of projects. SOREC-SUD [expansion unknown] and EPBTP [expansion unknown], two other companies with regional interests, have reinforced the existing potential. The execution of the operations of the school program, which were launched on the terrain, are a good illustration of this strengthening of the region's capacities. Of the 13 CEMs and the 4 high schools (combined plans), SOTRATIT [expansion unknown] is building 3 high schools and 3 CEMs, the EPBTP is building 3 CEMs, the Medea Communal firm is building 3 CEMs, the remaining 5 being entrusted to local private firms.

From 30 percent for agriculture to 1 percent for health, the difference is very great and yet--the results are there and are eminently positive, considering the low investment. Efforts were focused in very precise directions, which was apparent in the resolutions recently taken by the Central Committee of the party in the national health policy area. The wilaya's health infrastructure is rather like what one finds elsewhere, that is to say a large-scale hospital center in the regional capital, several polyclinics scattered here and there. Also, the wilaya's authorities are concerned with drawing its isolated populations closer in, by creating structures and training personnel for communities of 100 inhabitants. There are 4 polyclinics and 14 health centers for nearly 600 douars [translation unknown] of 100 to 1,500 inhabitants, for preventive and curative needs. Now the needs of the micro-communities (100 inhabitants minimum) are beginning to be considered. A mobile team is systematically "sweeping" the communes for one to two weeks, to fulfill the population's real needs (vaccination, school hygiene, rural water treatment, diagnosis of tuberculosis and malaria, etc.). At the same time these trips provide complete knowledge of the health situation of the people and are a palliative until such time as light structures can be established.

Easy access to health care is available today to 60 to 65 percent of the population. The 100 percent figure will be reached in 1990.

Since 1975 the Medea Paramedical School has been training people for the wilaya's own needs (local recruitment). Algerianization is going full swing (85 percent of the physicians practising in rural areas are foreign). From 150,000 in 1973 the number of consultations increased to 550,000 in 1979, although the personnel increased only one and a half times. The effort of the health workers should be emphasized. "With 20 percent or 1 percent of the program authorization, the results would have been the same for the health sector," we are told. A paradox? No, given the dispersed nature of the population. The prospects for the third plan are clear: complete the putting in place of average health structures and then one can speak of hospitals and improving hospital structures.

The Best Part

Agriculture has had the best part of the "cake." What is more natural? It was necessary to set in motion a huge program of recovery and development of the soil. Also, studies of topography, morphopedology, hydrology and socio-economics were carried out in their entirety. They made it possible to release a development plan integrating water, stock raising, arboriculture, terrain for courses, defense and restoration of the soil and finally agrofood industry. A complete process of development, in short.

In the Medea wilaya the word "integration" is more than a theoretical idea discussed in meetings; it is a tangible reality whose impact has been strengthened through the years. In the four corners of the wilaya the countryside is taking on a new look. New lands are emerging from the void, erosion is shrinking back on the mountainous slopes where every year 4,000,000 [hectares of] arable land were being eliminated. Terraced crops have made their appearance in the northern of the wilaya, right on the Tell; a new perspective for the peasants. Trees too, to which they were little accustomed, have made a very much noticed and no less appreciated entrance.

Development of the road system has made it possible to open up some isolated regions and better disseminate socio-economic progress. The bases for a potential development effort are now laid in the Titteri wilaya, to see that men do not allow this capital to be eroded.

Of the 930,000 hectares that make up the wilaya, 840,000 are agricultural and 330,000 form usable agricultural area, the SAU [expansion unknown] or productive land. The remainder being in courses, pastures, etc. The agricultural land is divided as follows:

Self-management: 58,500 hectares (40,000 SAU)

ENRA [expansion unknown]: 520,000 hectares (45,000 SAU--first and second phases of the RA [expansion unknown].

Private sector: 305,000 hectares (270,000 SAU).

As may be seen, the private sector receives the lion's share.

The agricultural investments of the special have been characterized by special parameters in the three geographic zones that make up this region: for the mountainous zones of the north, action has dealt mostly with strengthening the forested massifs, implanting fruit and grape orchards, and large cattle units. In the interior plains small cattle raising development has been carried out, with aviculture and soil development. Finally, in the steppe-covered zones in the southern part of the wilaya, the main activity has been prospecting for and developing water sources, as well as course lands, with direct effects on the third phase of the Agrarian Revolution.

To examine these operations in detail, we note that in four years 2,000,000 plants were distributed to the small producers of the region, making possible implantation of 1,000 hectares of vines for production of table grapes. The results of this operation were made complete by the creation of 92,000 working days of work and 360 new permanent jobs. Every year sees additional production of 37,000 quintals of table grapes. Fruit arboriculture has been substituted for food cereal crops which were in the wrong place on these slopes (12 percent) where trees adapt better than anything else. The peasants are taking part in it today, and are pleased with this initiative, which has affected 3,000 hectares and created 744 new permanent jobs, with an annual fruit production of 109,400 quintals.

The agricultural part of the "Medea special" has also been characterized by the putting in place of tree nurseries: 30 hectares of plants offer a production capability of 300,000 plants per year, making it possible to cover 250 hectares per year. Out of its own capabilities the Medea wilaya in a position from now on to make its planting programs concrete.

To Gain Ground

Under the heading of animal production, the "Medea special" has given birth to an infrastructure for promoting cattle raising. The goal of these cowsheds (four), which include 400 heifers, is not to produce milk or beef, we are told, but to "gain ground." One might speak of a nursery for cows in which genetic performance of the beasts is the principal preoccupation. Since 1977 the Medea wilaya has put on the national market 100 heifers per year, "always at least that many to be imported," or an integral foreign currency savings of 600,000 DA. In this region in the center of the country we are witnessing a self-centered development guaranteeing the bases of agricultural development. "Self-sufficiency must be provided first of all, then in a future stage, dissemination to the border regions." The increase in beef will be 50 tons per year and in milk, 600,000 liters per year. These four cowsheds have made possible the creation of 54 new permanent specialized jobs.

In the context of this integrated program one is witnessing the promotion of small stock raising. Before the special went into operation there was virtually no aviculture tradition in this region: marginal aviculture being the panacea of an insignificant female manpower. Three criteria militated for creation of an aviculture cooperative at Berrouaghia: the protein shortage, the improved rural income and the climatic conditions. They are "producing" (one day's chicks are sold to the breeders) 200,000 chicks per year, again the nursery idea. An annex is in charge of veterinary care and the distribution of adequate food, as well as popularizing modern breeding methods.

The regional avicultural center has already expanded beyond its original framework, since breeders in neighboring wilayas are supplying themselves with chicks from Berrouaghia. Today it is believed that this development by the special is providing an additional white meat production of 380 tons per year and egg production of 1,200,000 eggs per year.

But everything is not going well for this pilot center. The concern for placing avicultural workers, who are neither industrial workers nor farmers, under the protection of a legal status guaranteeing them social coverage they can be sure of, has caused the center to be transferred to the ONAB [expansion unknown]. Well, since then production seems to be plummeting!

Apiculture has also attracted the attention of the programmers because a 5,000,000-dinar credit has been granted for apiculture promotion. In the special nursery spirit in this wilaya, an infrastructure was set up to supply hives and swarms. Actions are being conducted, upstream and downstream, to extract and market the honey, as well as to popularize the working methods of apiculture. Before the special there was a traditional apiculture which was operated from the cork oak trunk. Now there are 1,000 apiculturists with wide experience in modern methods. In three years 10,000 hives have been distributed. Regional honey production has gone from 2 to 3 tons per year to 30 tons per year.

In the city of Medea a multi-service veterinary center is operational. "It is an impediment to the agriculture services," we are told. Another paradox? It was later explained that the planner had operated in a 1980 perspective, in which everything was to be in a rational economic beginning. The accumulated delays in realizing the objectives of the special causes this center to be ahead of the wilaya's overall agricultural development. Its profitability varied only in the old days.

The three axes of agricultural development in the region illustrate the concern for safeguarding the natural balance between north and south. This balance involves preserving speculations by favoring their integrated development. There is hope for implanting an agro-food industry (PMI [small and medium-sized businesses]) for conditioning and processing products, a natural complement to an integrated agricultural development. The effects of agricultural development on employment are of course sizable, but they alone will not solve the question of the future job market. Although it has been possible to contain the rural exodus, only the judicious establishing of units of small and medium-sized industries (adapted to the lack of water and the region's interests) can be a solution.

To Safeguard the Natural Balance

Following the example of other wilayas, the Medea wilaya is not sheltered from vicissitudes due to its meager water capacity. Without water there is no development, agricultural or industrial. The rainfall in the wilaya varies. It goes from 300 millimeters in the south to 800 millimeters in the north. Subterranean potential is poor. As for hydraulics, the special program's impact represents 80 liters of water in 100 for the wilaya, which is chiefly concerned with the drinking water supply as well as numerous purification operations. However, given the scattered character of the population, it is still difficult to answer the growing needs; "From how many houses grouped together can one supply water at home?", they are wondering in Medea. The criterion remains to be defined. The norms are 150 liters per day per inhabitant in the cities. The figure is 120 in rural areas. These norms are rarely reached; in Ksar-el-Boukhari for example the inhabitant has only 67 liters per day at his disposal. Moreover, the imbalances between real and theoretical flow bring out serious water management problems; is it were necessary to add up the quantity of water lost one would certainly arrive at frightening figures. For the city of Medea, every group of 50 houses has its own distribution system; there the situation is good, for the average threshold of 120 liters per day per inhabitant is reached.

All the settlements in the wilaya have been affected by the hydraulics program. Distribution systems in very good condition, often new, exist nearly everywhere. Unfortunately, as was emphasized about hydraulics, "we have too often found a total absence of maintenance, insufficient exploitation of the pumping stations, non-existence of individual water meters and flat rate taxation, which causes water cut-offs. Evaluation of needs satisfaction must obviously take these factors into account."

Considerable effort, often with limited means, has been made in hydraulics in Medea.

As for water supply for the industrial zones, this is provided from the urban systems. It is therefore the same water that is divided between the city and the industrial zone. By doing this Medea risks experiencing serious difficulties if radical measures are not taken. In fact, the city is currently being supplied by the treatment station of Oued Chiffa. The flow furnished by that installation climbs to 10,000 cubic meters per day in winter and falls to 6,000 cubic meters in summer. Which has led to launching projects for the transfer of water from Oued Djir to this station and harnessing sources in the city to compensate for the summer shortage. However, this same stabilized flow will not suffer because Medea is currently is giving Berrouaghia one third of the flow supplied by Chiffa. It is anticipated that in the summer of 1981 this situation will be adjusted, since the regional capital will receive from Berrouaghia at that time 4,000 cubic meters from the Ghrib. With this reversal of the situation, Medea should no longer have water problems, as long as the antibiotics factory currently under construction is not put into operation. That industrial unit, in the excavation stage at this time, is expected to use 5,000 cubic meters of water per day in 1983 and 10,000 cubic meters of water per day in 1990, which is the equivalent of the consumption of the whole city. To prevent what would be a real catastrophe for the Medeans, it was decided that a direct Ghrib-Medea pipeline should be built, to accommodate a flow of 24,000 cubic meters per day. Work is to begin in 1981.

In purification and supply of drinking water and industrial water it may be said that the situation is in good hands and if the delicate question of the management of this vital patrimony is settled, everything will go well in the future in the Medea wilaya.

Nevertheless, the water question will not be settled for all that. One of its basic aspects is still in question, the whole basis of the development of this region: irrigation. Irrigation with what? We have previously emphasized that water resources are laughable, the quality of the water when there is any is often mediocre. The wadis are not what the "perennial" specialists say they are; their flow is not only inadequate but very irregular. The wells yield less than 6 liters per second.

Although special credits for hydraulics have been focused on answering social needs (AEP [expansion unknown] and purification), from now on stress will be placed on more ambitious projects, such as dams and water reservoirs. Here, optimism seems seriously affected. The five-dam project, which would have given this region national quality food granary, seems to be sleeping at the bottom of some drawer or other. The new Mitidja has not yet been born. The Beni-Slimane plain is waiting for water. On the hillside basins of this great valley thousands of trees have been planted, sometimes on family land. Families have been moved and have converted to other crops.

Beni-Slimane is a plain of 270,000 hectares of which, if water flows profusely, 5,000 to 6,000 hectares will be developed. After a long silence the project seems to be starting up again with the initiation of a number of projects: 11 all told, of which six are in progress.

But it was not without humor that we were told in Medea that the five-dam project had "fallen in the water." There lies the problem: without water in sufficient quantity, nothing of consequence, of regional or indeed national dimension, can really be done. Flight from responsibility? Everyone delights in laying the blame on someone else. "Beni-Slimane began with a special program, then a decentralized program, then it was sitting on a centralized plan," we were told in the wilaya. This program has been neither abandoned nor challenged, but it is nevertheless compromised by problems of realization.

Meanwhile, the peasants of Beni-Slimane go on with their daily lives. Seventy percent of the land belongs to the private sector and there are 70 inhabitants per square km.

The project is defined by the "administrative" texts as "rural renovation is in agreement with the whole and with the overall result of the actions; when conceived and realizable according to a coherent plan, their goal is to cause all sectors of the economy to pass at the same time from the traditional or conventional state to the most modern state possible in an area determined by the national territory," and they add, "such conditions are only realizable with exacting preliminary planning and a massive intervention." What would have been the case for Abadla would not have been the case, at least for the moment, for Beni-Slimane.

On the local level, what can be done is being done today. Reforesting operations have resumed (developing the hillside basins of the eventual water reservoirs)--tree plantations are increasing--sylvan-pastoral areas are being developed (arboriculture, cultivation and stock raising in partnership).

Beni-Slimane is in a way a presentation of Algerian agriculture with its ins and outs, on a reduced scale.

Then what is preventing this ambitious project from seeing the light of day, this wealth from blossoming? Water, always that indispensable water, which comes back like a haunting leit-motif to remind us that without it nothing is possible. Well, we have learned: to save the plain from silting up and guarantee its development, it is necessary to mobilize at least 60,000,000 cubic meters of it. We note that on the Beni-Slimane plain, in the hillside basin of Oued Isser, superficial runoff has been estimated at 267,000,000 cubic meters per year. Runoffs from the hillside basin of Chelif are mobilized by the Bouzghoul and Ghrib dams and are utilized in the wilayas downstream.

Five dams for a total capacity of 50,000,000 cubic meters should in principle satisfy the needs of the plain (Ladrat-Besbes-Annasseur-Mellah East and West). What is the status of these projects today?

The Beni-Slimane is considered Isser's water reservoir, on which is based a very important hydraulic program, chiefly depending on the realization of a dam necessitating a holding capacity of 250,000,000 cubic meters. At the central level it would seem that this large-scale project--which is national and therefore a priority project--might run the Beni-Slimane hydraulic project. In Medea official and competent voices affirm that the five dams are called upon to pour their waters into the Isser wadi. The two projects are not contradictory, but highly complementary.

The integrated Beni-Slimane program is thus dormant for lack of water, but also for lack of man's sensitivity at all levels. The populations of the high mountains who were displaced by reforestation are waiting for someone to solve their social situation, which solution is constantly being postponed for lack of an answer where the dams are concerned. No one can be satisfied with impromptu solutions indefinitely. New and profitable lands in the irrigated valley are the only compensation that can be offered to these people. In Beni-Slimane, the early optimism has suffered a blow.

Actions currently being undertaken are of course an achievement, but they are stagnating. Are we at the point where it is necessary to redefine Beni-Slimane's overall vision, on which all the projects were based?

In this region, where the population is nearly 100 percent rural, the peasant has not been solicited very much by the interveners. Motivation and popularization are two things unknown in Beni-Slimane. That has caused much damage in the management of investment. "When you tell a peasant his land is only good for DRS [Soil Reclamation Directorate], why then should he entrust to a business firm what he could do himself?" Cereal intensification, soil and crop improvement, DRS work, are so many operations with which the peasants can be intimately associated. The peasant must be helped to get away from the welfare mentality. Now, according to what we were able to find out in Beni-Slimane, that is very far away. One of the wilaya's young officials told us in this connection that only the rural leadership can "provide the mental ability to assume development."

What more is there to say of Beni-Slimane, this always-postponed answer to the needs of a whole region of the country, than that all the pitfalls encountered have already made possible a better approach to the macro-economic realities by contributing the solution to a number of theoretical problems.

Independently of all the difficulties inventoried, the Beni-Slimane question has to do with project management.

Like the Abadla, Haut-Chelif and Bou-Namoussa plains projects, this ambitious project must be supported by an exceptional structure, given its integrated and exceptional nature. In acting thus, one will be in a position to affect the means--financial, material and human--, to provide the coordination that has been lacking so far, in order to put the project into a dynamic that it should always have.

We will borrow our conclusion from the wali of Medea, who correctly commented that "the Medea wilaya can, because of its proximity to the capital, contribute toward reducing migratory movements. It can play the role of buffer and also--and especially--the role of stopping place between Algiers and the south, thus making it possible to provide the starting point for a true development policy for the territory, aimed at reconquering the high plateaus and the south toward a redistribution of the population, which we conceive as the priority for the coming decade."

LABOR SITUATION IN COUNTRY ANALYZED

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 15 Jul 80 p 17

[Report on the Labor Conditions in Bahrain: "University Graduates Are First on Unemployment List; Bahrainis Receive Lower Salaries than Foreigners"]

[Text] The subject of labor is of basic importance, particularly to all Gulf nations. Due to the similar working conditions in these countries, they all face the same problems. The workforce in all the Gulf nations is divided into 2 major categories: 1) Local, represented by the national labor force; and 2) Foreign, represented by foreign (imported) labor.

As an Arabian Gulf nation, Bahrain suffers from the same problem. The area's nations have been subjected to an influx of various foreign emigrants (from the Indian peninsula, Southeast Asia, the Philippines and Thailand). This immigration has resulted in many new problems, and has become so large that it is difficult to assess the extent of the risks of ignoring failing to deal with it in a programmed, scientific manner. This quick review of the labor situation in Bahrain will dwell on sound labor conditions as visualized by some specialists, officials and researchers in the field. This does not mean that we will be able to cover and discuss this subject from every angle. But we will highlight the negative impact of the use of [foreign] labor on the national workforce in Bahrain, and the economic, social and political implications of the importation of labor for the government. We will try to discuss, in a direct way, the reasons which led to the increased demand for foreign labor. We will then present some solutions which we find necessary to solve the labor problem in Bahrain.

Reasons for Increased Demand for Labor

Petroleum was discovered in Bahrain in 1932. During the following year, the government of Bahrain received its first revenues from petroleum amounting to 29,000 rupees (around £ 2,000). During the past 30 years, from 1936 to 1965, total petroleum revenues were 2,673 million rupees (around £ 200 million).

These petroleum revenues helped achieve better economic conditions, as a large number of those who worked in traditional businesses (pearl fishing, agriculture and commerce) shifted to the petroleum industry (Bahrain Petroleum Company Limited, BAPCO). A distinguishing and useful economic feature of Bahrain is its being a major seaport midway between the East and the West, where ships (and previously sailboats) anchor for food supplies and fuel during their long journeys across the oceans.

A sudden transition occurred, described by specialist as a "leap": A transition from a traditional agricultural and fishing society to an industrial society, represented by the petroleum industry.

In the 1970s, Bahrain was trying to move forward through industrial development. Its first industrial moves were: the establishment of the Aluminum Company of Bahrain (ALBA), which is an association of British, Swedish, French and American companies; the Bahrain Engineering Company; the fishing industry and other light and heavy industries, which are useful locally and to the Gulf in general due to the availability of natural gas.

According to 1965 statistics, there were 694 workers in the petroleum sector, 8,328 workers in the construction sector, 5,920 workers in retail commerce and 5,494 workers in the transportation sector. The number of workers in the fishing and agricultural sectors decreased to 4,654 workers, most of them foreigners (particularly Omanis).

At the beginning, the phenomenon of importing foreign labor was for the purpose of filling in managerial, administrative and technical positions in industrial projects, due to the area's shortage of sufficiently trained professional workers. Citizens ignored certain technical and scientific jobs as a result of competition represented by the imported, trained foreign workers.

Groups of Workers

Some specialists divide the foreign workforce in Bahrain into 4 groups:

1. The Adminstrative and Highly Skilled Group. This group was initially brought in to fill major administrative positions in the industrial sector and in companies and organizations (in the private sector). Although they represent a very small percentage of the incoming workforce, they cause problems and difficulties for local workers, because of their tendencies, as foreigners, to favor foreign workers, and because they insist on using the English language in all their daily transactions and correspondence. This problem clearly creates unemployment problems among both high school and university graduates.

2. The Technical Group. This group includes a list of technical professions such as: Engineers and assistant engineers, craftsmen, electricians and sophisticated equipment operators. This group could have been eliminated, had there been an organized plan for training nationals. However, such a plan was never taken up by government officials for serious consideration.

Recently, the minister of labor and social affairs, Shaykh 'Isa ibn Muhammad al-Khalifa, resigned. He had presented to the cabinet futuristic projects that could help the local workforce, but the cabinet rejected or, to be precise, put off consideration of these projects for fear of the risks involved in adopting these projects, or "national plan," especially the project to form a "labor council" which would ultimately direct the various aspects of labor affairs and oversee labor information policy in Bahrain.

3. The Unskilled Group. This is the largest of the 4 groups. The members of this unskilled labor group are brought in from East Asian countries, India and Pakistan to fill the gap in the labor market. These perform work that does not require any skills, but could be learned in time and through experience. These jobs include construction, cleaning, security, building roads and sewers, and other jobs that require a lot of physical effort.

4. The Servant Group. This group is currently increasing. It specializes in house cleaning and child care. It is a result of social change--the disintegration of the family system. It also reflects the beginnings of change in existing social conditions, like women going to work.

We would like to point out an important point here, which is that the concentration of imported labor in Bahrain in particular and the Gulf [area] in general has several political, economic and social implications. We will not dwell on this point or its causes. A review of the percentages of imported versus local labor reveals the following:

In 1970, imported labor [as a percentage of total labor] was 37.1. The percentage was higher for scientific and technical positions (40.2 percent), still higher for managers, administrators and business managers (47 percent), and still higher for service workers (53.7 percent).

We can see the picture more clearly through Table I, which shows the percentage distribution of vocations within each of the local and imported work groups. This table shows the latest detailed statistics prepared by a group of specialists.

Unemployment and its Causes

In recent years, the estimated rate of unemployment among females was 74 percent, while it was 26 percent among males. However, most of the unemployed among both sexes are graduates of Arab universities and institutes.

On the other hand, there is a group of employed nationals who have clear problems, the main one being obvious discrimination in favor of imported labor in many ways--some financial and some, which are more important, moral. This is known to and acknowledged by the officials. The officials may not acknowledge some issues, but they cannot refute their existence.

Table II indicates the relative distribution of national and imported workers according to salary scales, based on the last statistics prepared in 1976-1977 by the Manpower Administration of the ministry of labor and social affairs.

We can see the picture more clearly through the following examples:

. The Arab Company for Ship Building and Repairs employs 611 foreign and 359 local and Arab [non-Bahraini] workers.

. The Bahrain Company for Ship Repairs and Engineering employs 464 foreign and only 72 local workers.

This is according to 1978 statistics. There are some industrial organizations that do not employ any local or Arab workers, such as the Gulf Aluminum Factories (95 foreign workers) and the Bahrain Marble Factory (30 foreign workers). Even simple positions in these organizations are filled by foreigners.

There are also simple and easy jobs, all or most of which are dominated by foreigners (such as tailors, carpenters, blacksmiths, welders, and workers in restaurants, bath houses, agriculture, jewelry, hotels, etc).

Suggestions and Solutions

Based on these facts related to the labor force in Bahrain, which we have tried to state as briefly as possible, some suggestions and solutions have been made in economic, social and political studies to overcome the barriers of neglect of and negativism affecting the national workforce. The following are some of the proposed and visualized solutions:

. The government should achieve effective coordination between the manpower, production and educational structures. This can be achieved through development plans which would bring about change and provide work and necessary training to the citizens of this country. This requires an overall reorganization of present conditions through a program based on scientific precision.

. Educational and training methods (technical and vocational) should be organized, developed and planned. Sound objectives and policies for the development of human resources in the country and raising their productive levels to meet development requirements should be drawn up.

. The government should work on "Bahrainizing" all positions and professions in the government and private sectors. The English language should not be a prerequisite for any job. Instead, all organizations must be required to use the Arabic language in all their daily transactions. Work should be undertaken to qualify and train graduates to be eligible to work, acquire experience and achieve personal development and competence.

. The government should discontinue the policy allowing the transfer of sponsorship [of foreign workers] within the government and private sectors, so as to control the influx of [foreign] labor and achieve stability.

. More organizational and legal measures should be taken to check the illegal entry of foreign workers. Also, Arab workers should be brought in when qualified local workers are not available.

. The government should stop the trade in and exploitation of foreign workers for personal profit. This trade takes two forms:

a. The worker pays a specific amount to his sponsor, ranging from 150 to 250 dinars annually for non-technical workers, and from 250 to 400 dinars for technical workers. This amount is paid to the sponsor in return for his allowing the worker to reside and work in the country.

b. The second form of trading in foreign labor is through visas or work permits. The increase in the volume of trading in foreign workers is a result of the many gaps that exist in the present system, and the lack of a sense of responsibility and strict application of the law.

. The government should plan and program the operation of importing foreign labor so that no surplus should develop in certain specialities in excess of the actual development requirements of the local economy.

. The government should provide the necessary protection to local workers. They should be given incentives and priority, and provided with necessary health insurance and social security benefits.

These solutions are almost identical with those of the scientific studies [presented at] the recent symposium held to study the dimensions of economic and social development in the Arabian Gulf.

GUIDANCE TO REDUCE NATIONAL OIL CONSUMPTION URGED

Cairo AL-BATRUL in Arabic Feb-Apr 80 pp 18-21

[Article by Yahya Muhammad Zamzam: "The Way to Guide Oil Consumption in Egypt"]

[Text] The high rise in oil prices should alert responsible officials in Egypt to a number of serious matters. The most important of these is the necessity for moderation in the consumption of oil and the need to hasten the search for alternative sources of energy. This must be done to conserve Egypt's petroleum reserves, which are still in the ground, for a longer period of time.

There are many ways to institute guidance for oil consumption in Egypt. But whatever method of guidance is chosen, it must depend upon changing some of our national habits, which are no longer in keeping with methods of development in the world. Among the most important methods of guiding oil consumption are the following:

1. The weekend should be 2 days for all government institutions, except schools and universities.

2. Television transmissions should end at 11 P.M.

3. Working hours in both public and private sector commercial establishments should not be broken into 2 periods.

4. Work in all state institutions should begin at an early hour, and we should go back to using summer daylight saving time.

5. The only commercial establishments permitted to stay open from 6 P.M. to 11 P.M. would be restaurants, grocery stores, coffee houses, and pharmacies.

The high and rapid rise in world oil prices, which has been accompanied by tremendous jolts to the economies of the nations of the world; the rise in the prices of industrial goods; and the skyrocketing prices of gold, have become a cause for dismay and alarm. Why have we had this tremendous rise in oil prices and what are its effects on the Egyptian consumers and the Egyptian economy?

Will the various Egyptian government agencies fail to take quick and positive action to institute and firmly implement methods of guiding oil consumption in Egypt? Consumption of all types of petroleum products is increasing daily, at very rapid rates. It is both exhausting the country of much of its foreign currency reserves and preventing it from exporting increased amounts of oil.

In Egypt, oil is the source of everyday life in the domains of energy, industry and transportation, and will continue to be so at least until the end of this century. Egypt, thank God, has sufficient oil for itself and exports about 40 percent of its oil production to other countries. Oil still occupies first place among Egypt's exports. For this reason, it is our duty not to squander this scarce and valuable source of wealth in the space of just a few years. If this happens, we would have to start importing oil (energy) from abroad at very high prices. This would constitute a tremendous drain on our reserves of foreign currency at our present stage of development.

We must also take into account the fact that alternative sources of energy such as solar energy and wind-generated energy are still in the experimental stage. Here in Egypt, solar energy could become a basic source of energy in view of the fact that Egypt enjoys sunshine the year round. Also, it would be possible to utilize wind-generated energy in the coastal areas. Likewise, in both Upper Egypt and the Delta, it would be possible to generate additional energy using plant and animal remains.

For this reason, we should conserve petroleum not only to use it as fuel, but to use it as a raw material in many existing industries, such as the fertilizer, iron and steel, and petrochemical industries.

In spite of the fact that petroleum on the world market has undergone numerous price increases, its local prices for Egyptian consumers have not been affected by these increases. To realize the dimensions of the problem which we will be talking about, and for us to know the value of each drop of petroleum we consume, we must be aware of world market prices of petroleum products consumed in Egypt. We must then compare them with the local prices for which these products are sold to Egyptian consumers. They are shown in the following table:

Product	World Market Price (15 Nov 79) (CIF)	Sales Price to Egyptian Consumers*
	Eg. Pounds	Eg. Pounds
Bottled gas (per cylinder)	3.950	0.650
High-octane gasoline (per liter)	0.207	0.130
Regular gasoline (per liter)	0.200	0.110
Kerosene (per liter)	0.223	0.030
Solar [fuel] oil (per liter)	0.226	0.030
Mazut (per ton)	105.000	7.500

*Takes into account an increase of 20 milliemes per liter of gasoline and 5 milliemes per liter of kerosene, solar oil, and diesel oil which went into effect 15 December 1979.

The above table suggests that the government is taking great pains to provide Egyptian consumers with their needs of petroleum products at prices which are far lower than world market prices. It is doing this by providing a subsidy amounting to about a billion dollars in foreign currency (the difference in amount between what Egyptian consumers pay for petroleum products, at local prices, and the world market prices of these products). This situation alerts us to the necessity of guiding consumption in Egypt without raising the prices of petroleum products, except in the case of some products which will be mentioned later on. This is because any increase in local prices imposed by the government would affect the prices of many everyday commodities and needs such as bread, agricultural products, industrial products, etc.

It is clear from the prices appearing in the above table that a cylinder of bottled gas is sold to the Egyptian consumer at about 16 percent of the cost of importing it. Also, gasoline is sold to the Egyptian consumers at about 60 percent of the world market price, and kerosene and solar [fuel] oil are sold to them at about 13 percent of world market prices. Finally, the price of a ton of mazut to consumers in Egypt is about 7 percent of its world market price.

We should bear in mind that in Egypt petroleum is our principal energy resource. We should know that water-generated electric power (from the High Dam and elsewhere) constitutes only about 10 percent of the total energy utilized in Egypt. In addition to this, petroleum is still the raw material used to produce more than a third of the electricity generated in Egypt. This use is increasing at a rate which constitutes a cause for alarm. If we consider these circumstances which govern oil consumption in Egypt, and take into consideration the constant increase in population, we can understand the increase of about 50 percent in oil consumption which took place during the 5-year period 1973-1978.

There has been a noticeable and unusual annual increase of 18 to 20 percent in the consumption of bottled gas. The fact is that Egypt imports about 70 percent of the bottled gas which it consumes from foreign countries at unbelievably high prices, the current price being 450 dollars per ton (the equivalent of 315 Egyptian pounds). This is in addition to expenses incurred in Egypt for transportation, storage and delivery of the bottled gas. At the same time, a ton of bottled gas is sold to Egyptian consumers at a price of 52 Egyptian pounds. This means that the Egyptian government pays 263 Egyptian pounds for every ton of bottled gas consumed. The amount of bottled gas expected to be imported in 1980 is 281,000 tons. This means that the subsidy paid by the government for this quantity of bottled gas, so that it may be sold to the consumers at a price of 65 piasters per cylinder, will amount to about 74 million pounds.

For this reason, all government agencies should make it their national duty to guide oil consumption in Egypt. It should be the goal of all of us to strive toward optimum and more efficient use of petroleum products so that we may economize and conserve. The reason for this is that every barrel of oil which the country conserves and does not consume can be exported abroad to earn revenue in foreign currency, which can be used to finance development projects, raise our standard of living, and support the national economy.

We urgently need to begin right away to put into practice methods of guiding oil consumption, and must see to it that the benefits from petroleum product subsidies are enjoyed by those who are entitled to them. Since this is the situation, the most appropriate thing for us to do is to begin right now to study and apply scientific means and methods of sound conservation in oil consumption. We must utilize all the media to promote oil conservation awareness among our citizens, and we must explain the dimensions of the situation and its importance in relation to the future of Egypt. We must also urge all of our citizens, wherever they may be, to cooperate in the implementation of this policy of conservation. We can all do so by borrowing some of the methods of energy conservation which have been successfully applied by the advanced industrial countries. We should borrow the methods which fit our circumstances and which would be easy to implement, especially if they do not involve any investments for which the government would have to assume the financial burden. Some of these conservation ideas are as follows:

1. Spreading Oil Conservation Awareness

This involves preparing guidlines for conservation in oil consumption, and publicizing them through all the information media; keeping track of how they are implemented; organizing information campaigns; calling upon all economic enterprises to participate in this program; and establishing criteria for measuring conservation. This is a task for the Higher Council for Energy.

2. Non-Centralized Approach in Implementation

This means that each government, industrial, or economic unit is considered responsible for implementing energy conservation guidelines and keeping track of the success which is achieved in this regard. Each unit or enterprise which consumes large quantities of energy must assign an engineer, responsible for energy affairs, to monitor energy consumption and apply conservation methods. He should periodically make a presentation of data regarding energy consumption and the conservation which has been achieved, and should draw a comparison between these data and those of previous time periods.

3. Two-Day Weekends

All state institutions including banks and companies, (with the exception of alrge stores), should change their weekend from 1 to 2 days. There is no doubt that this would lead to conservation of a great deal of the energy used to run buses, trains, subway lines, and private cars, as well as the energy used for elevators, lights, and air conditioners. However, large public sector stores should be open during this 2-day weekend so that people who are employed in state agencies would be able to take care of their needs. The weekend for people working in these stores should consist of 1 weekday.

4. Business Hours of Commercial Establishments Should Not Be Broken Into Two Periods

Business hours for these establishments should be from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M., with a half-hour rest period. This system would bring about a large saving in the energy used for light and air conditioning in these establishments. At the present, they are open till 9 P.M. In addition to this, under the new system, employees of these establishments would be using transportation from their homes to work and back two times a day, instead of four times, as at present.

As Egypt is a country which has a hot summer, when the sun rises early in the day, Egyptians should make use of the length of their day during this season. During the summer, work in state agencies should begin earlier. This system would bring about definite conservation in the consumption of energy and would not require any investments on the part of the government.

6. Television Transmission

Television transmission should end at 11 P.M.. The authorities should reorganize the schedule accordingly.

7. Bottled Gas

We should hasten to implement the plan to supply residences with gas through a pipeline distribution system. This would mean that the government would save a great deal of the money it spends every year to import approximately 70 percent of the country's needs of bottled gas. Another suggestion is to reduce the subsidy paid by the government when this product is distributed. This could be done by selling bottled gas to embassies, foreign enterprises, and hotels which operate in Egypt at prices which approximate the import prices of bottled gas. Ordinary consumers of bottled gas could receive coupons with which to buy cylinders of bottled gas at prices subsidized by the government.

8. Gasoline

There has been a noticeable and unusual increase in the number of vehicles on Egypt's highways and streets. There is no doubt that one reason for this increase is the low price of gasoline for consumers in Egypt. Another reason is the open-door policy which the country has pursued. All of this has led to an unusually high annual increase in gasoline consumption--15 percent a year. To put the brakes on this increase and guide gasoline consumption, the government has raised the price of a liter of gasoline by 20 milliemes.

9. Traffic and Transport

a. Concentrating on the government sector (the civil service and the military) to control gasoline consumption. This could be done by assigning a monthly ration of gasoline for each public sector vehicle or car pool.

b. Regulating traffic in places where traffic jams occur at certain hours of the day.

c. Promoting the use of car pools by private car owners living in the same areas.

Broadcasting immediate bulletins over radio and television concerning streets and roads where traffic has been detoured because of accidents or road repair, so that no traffic jams or bottlenecks may occur.

e. Implementing beltway projects around the city of Cairo to help eliminate traffic jams and bottlenecks inside the city which cause an increase in fuel consumption.

f. Improving the service and operation of single-fare buses in order to encourage private car owners to use these buses. This would decrease the use of private cars in some areas.

g. Encouraging the use of small cars. This could be done by lowering their prices, reducing the customs fees paid on them, and increasing the tax on larger cars. Also, an appeal should be made for vehicles traveling on fast highways to reduce their speed.

h. Decreasing, as much as possible, the long-distance transportation of all types of goods by means of trucks. This method of transport is costly, as it entails the consumption of large quantities of fuel. Transportation of such goods should be done more and more by other more economical means, such as railroad and river transport. In the case of river transport, though, it will be necessary to eliminate the obstacles which prevent easy use of the Nile River and inland-shipping canals, on a large scale, as means of transport which serves the national economy.

EGYPTIAN NATURAL GAS RESOURCES OUTLINED

Cairo AL-BATRUL in Arabic Feb-Apr 80 pp 8-10

[Article by 'Abd al-Hadi Qandil, vice president for operations of the Egyptian General Petroleum Agency: "Natural Gas"]

[Text] It has been 10 years since natural gas was discovered in Egypt in commercial quantities. The first natural gas field to be discovered was the Abu Madi field, in the northern part of the Delta. Then, the Abu al-Gharadiq field was discovered in the Western Desert. This was followed by the discovery of the Abu Qir offshore natural gas field in the northern part of Abu Qir Bay.

The appearance of natural gas definitely helped to change the pattern of consumption of petroleum products in Egypt. Industrial enterprises began to use natural gas as a fuel instead of mazut. This is becuase it is easy to handle and circulate natural gas, and becuase the use of gas in industrial furnaces and machinery reduces the cost of maintaining them. This is particularly true of Egyptian natural gas, because it is completely free of sulphur compounds which subject furnaces and machinery to corrosion. In addition to this, gas has a higher thermal value than does mazut. Natural gas contains 23,000 British thermal units per rotl, whereas mazut contains only 18,000 British thermal units per rotl.

Consumers of natural gas do not require the construction of warehouses for storage of their fuel. This means less capital investment and lower operational costs, and this helps to cut costs for industrial projects.

Another advantage of natural gas is the geographical location of its fields. In terms of economics, it has been very fortunate that Egypt's natural gas fields are close to the industrial regions and power plants. The power plants have already begun to utilize natural gas instead of mazut, particularly in gas-powered units, for generating electric power. Recently the electricity sector has expanded its program of constructing such units.

Natural Gas Fields

1. The Abu Madi field: Natural gas reserves in this field total 20 billion cubic meters. This would be enough to satisfy consumption for 20 years, on the basis of extracting gas at a rate of 3 million cubic meters per day.

2. The Abu al-Gharadiq field: This field has reserves of 20 billion cubic meters. This would be enough to satisfy consumption for 20 years, on the basis of extracting gas at a rate of 3 million cubic meters per day.

3. The Abu Qir offshore field: This field has reserves of 27 billion cubic meters. This would be enough to satisfy local consumption for 30 years, on the basis of extracting gas at a rate of 3 million cubic meters per day.

Exploitation of the Natural Gas Fields

Exploitation of the natural gas fields began in 1975, as follows:

1. The Abu Madi field: Gas from this field is being supplied to the fertilizer plants in Talkha and is being used instead of naphtha, which is now being exported.

Also, preparations are being made to supply the power plant in Talkha with natural gas, to be utilized in place of solar [fuel] oil with particular properties which is being imported, at high cost, especially for power plants.

Likewise, natural gas, in place of mazut, will be used by the textile, dye, and supply companies in al-Mahallah al-Kubra.

At the present time, the daily yield from this field is valued at about $500,000. In coming years, the effective yield will go up to about $1 million, as a result of conserving large quantities of naphtha and mazut, and as a result of saving money utilized to importing special solar [fuel] oil.

2. The Abu al-Gharadiq field: Exploitation of gas from this field began in 1978, when its gas began to be supplied to the cement production plants in the Hulwan and Turah areas, as well as to the iron and steel plants in Hulwan. It has replaced mazut. The result of this has been a saving in the consumption of mazut to the tune of about half a million dollars per day. In addition to this, there has been an increase in the rate of production in companies which utilize gas.

3. The Abu Qir offshore field: This field began to be exploited in 1979, when its gas was supplied to the fertilizer plants in Abu Qir and nearby power stations. The yield of this field has been valued at about 400,000 dollars per day. This corresponds to the value of the quantities of naphtha and mazut, otherwise consumed in these areas, which it has been possible to conserve.

Use of Natural Gas Instead of Liquefied Gas in Homes

Home fuel consumption basically depends on butagas [bottled gas], both for gas ranges and hot-water tanks. Local production of this commodity is not nearly enough to meet the needs of the population. This has led to the importing of large quantities of it in order to meet consumer demand which is increasing every year, at rates of more than 15 percent annually. For this reason, the Egyptian General Petroleum Agency has undertaken a study on implementation of a project to supply residential areas with natural gas instead of bottled gas. This will result in a saving of foreign currency which is used to import the bottled gas.

As a first phase of this project, it has been planned to supply natural gas to residential areas in Hulwan, al-Ma'adi, Madinat Nasr, and Heliopolis. These locations have been chosen for the following reasons:

1. These areas are on the outskirts of Cairo.

2. Residences, as well as street planning in these areas, are appropriate for initiating implementation of the project.

3. These areas are presently experiencing population growth, and will continue to do so in the future. It will be feasible to set up natural gas distribution systems similar to those for other utilities such as electricity, water, and telephones.

4. In these areas, it will be easy to begin setting up natural gas distribution systems. They will be compatible with those for other utilities, such as water, electricity, and telephones.

At the present time, this project has begun to be implemented, and it is expected to be completed by 1982.

Savings Which Will Result From Household Use of Natural Gas

It is estimated that the initial quantities of natural gas which will be used will be about 200,000 cubic meters per day.

This is the equivalent of about 80 tons of bottled gas per day. This amount will increase gradually till it reaches 600,000 cubic meters a day, that is, the equivalent of 240 tons of bottled gas per day. At current import prices, this quantity of bottled gas costs about $120,000 a day. Using natural gas will also relieve the government of some of the burdens it is assuming. For example, there will be a saving in the use of the cylinders necessary to provide bottled gas service. It takes two cylinders to service each cylinder in the possession of the consumer, and the government pays for this. This is in addition to the expenses of filling the cylinders, transporting them, inspecting them, reconditioning them, etc.

Price of Supplying Natural Gas to Consumers

Pricing policies are always subject to nation-wide government planning. This is because the government often chooses to provide price support for a product in order to provide price stability to the consumer.

There is no doubt that the government will devote special attention to this subject, because it wants to assess the cost of providing services to the consumer.

Possibilities of Producing Liquefied Gas From Natural Gas

Methane and ethane are considered to be the basic components of natural gas which has been discovered and is currently exploited in Egypt's fields. They constitute about 90 percent of the components of our natural gas. The remaining part consists of heavy hydrocarbon components which are extracted in condensed form and which are redistilled, resulting in gasoline, kerosine, and solar [fuel] oil. However, there is a considerable proportion of propane and butane in the gas from the Abu al-Gharadiq field. This propane and butane is extracted and carried to locations where it is bottled in gas cylinders. In this way, the Petroleum Agency is trying to make optium use of the compounds of Egypt's natural gas.

Future of Natural Gas in Egypt

The three natural gas fields currently being exploited are considered to be the nucleus around which other fields, rich in natural gas, will be discovered. A lot of data has been collected which justify optimism about such further discoveries in the Delta area. Since our goal is to make full use of the prtroleum and gas we produce, serious steps are being taken at the present time to implement the project dealing with collecting associated gas in the Gulf of Suez area. The gas is being collected there in order to use it in fertilizer and cement manufacturing projects as well as in electric power plants in Suez. It will be supplied to this area by means of a pipeline which will go from the Shuqayr area to the Suez area.

Current Uses Made of Natural Gas

Natural gas is currently used in the following ways:

1. As a processing material in the manufacture of fertilizers as well as iron and steel. Preparations are also being made to utilize it in the sponge iron project in al-Dakhilah.

2. As fuel for the fire in the furnaces of cement plants, electric power plants, and textile mills. There, it is used in place of mazut and solar [fuel] oil.

3. As a replacement for liquefied petroleum gas (butagas) for household purposes.

PLANNING PROCESS DISCUSSED, NEED FOR IT EMPHASIZED

Cairo AL-BATRUL in Arabic Feb-Apr 80 pp 14-17

[Article by 'Abd al-Fattah al-Bardi, director of the Planning and Follow-up Division of the Egyptian General Petroleum Agency: "Development Planning in Petroleum Sector"]

[Text] The General Importance of Planning

One of the basic aims of any society which strives to achieve progress is to raise the standard of living of all of the individuals of that society. There are two routes one can follow to achieve this objective:

1. Increase productive capacity by adding new productive resources, or

2. Improve the utilization of current productive capacities, that is, raise productive efficiency.

To determine the manner and priority of following either of these two courses, one must engage in definite planning which incorporates the objectives to be achieved and the means by which they are to be achieved.

Planning is considered to be one of the most important principles of modern administration. In its general sense, planning means preparation for the future. The process of planning basically begins with the hypothesis that the future shall differ from the present. For this reason, it is necessary to become thoroughly familiar with the present situation in order to be able to plan for the future. The process of making predictions for the future is considered to be the first essential step in the overall planning process. Its purpose is to visualize the best possibilities the future holds in order to prepare appropriate alternative plans.

The prediction process requires collecting facts which pertain both to the past and to the present. After this is done, and after an analysis is made of all relevant factors which influence the conditions of society, an assessment is made of future circumstances and needs--both for the near and distant future. Careful prediction is the basis of the hypotheses on which planning is based. Good planning relies on the degree of effort and care taken in the preparation of data concerning the past and the present. This is because these data are the basis for outlining the strategy of the prediction process, and, consequently, of the planning operation.

Planning and Government Commitments

The government has committed itself to responsibilities which exceed its resources and capabilities. In addition to its responsibility to defend and liberate the land, it has undertaken:

1. The responsibility to guarantee employment or self-employment for everyone.

2. The responsibility to provide social welfare in terms of housing, health, education, and services.

3. The responsibility to protect administration of all state institutions as well as most of the production enterprises.

5. The responsibility to make goods available to the masses and supply basic goods and services at prices which are often less than their real cost. It does this by means of both direct and indirect subsidies.

Responsibility for these commitments has led to the fact that the burdens being assumed by the Egyptian economy are much greater than the resources it is able to draw upon, including resources provided by the efforts of Egyptians and those obtained by attracting foreign capital.

It is clear, then, that planning cannot take place in either a partial or haphazard fashion. It has to be basic and comprehensive. Otherwise, efforts which go into planning--no matter how intensive they quite often are--will be in vain. Thus, the problems of planning must be dealt with by means of a complete and integrated approach.

The Progress of Egypt's Development Plan

In the late fifties, Egypt began to use the methods of short-term planning (in most cases, annual planning). Egypt drew up its first 5-year plan in 1960 with the object of doubling Egypt's national product in 10 years. However, although this was an integrated plan with defined economic and social objectives, it was overcome by the economic conditions and major changes which followed the issuance of the nationalization decisions in the middle of 1961. The result was that the first 5-year plan no longer expressed the aims of the new Egyptian society.

In the second development plan, which was for the years 1965 to 1969, the emphasis was clearly on the production of goods and the establishment of basic industries in an effort to bring about progress in the national economy. A large proportion of the plan's investments was concentrated on heavy industry. In view of the economic circumstances which prevailed during the greater part of this time period, we find that the following considerations were observed in preparing assessments of the investments needed for some of the years of the plan:

1. Postponing completion of past projects which had not been implemented to any great degree.

2. Slowing the pace of construction down to the necessary minimum.

3. Postponing new projects which, by their very nature, could be put off without causing any harm to the national economy.

Then, from 1970 to 1977, planning was done on an annual basis. Wartime conditions made it necessary to give a strong impetus to projects which would bring immediate results or which would basically serve the needs of the war or the domestic front. As a matter of fact, the economic, political, and social problems faced by Egypt during the previous periods, in spite of the existence of 5-year plans, forced Egypt to resort to planning on an annual basis in most cases. This was because making predictions for periods of time of more than 1 or 2 years was considered impossible, due to the high frequency of surprise developments.

But things have changed nowadays. There is no doubt that the nature of planning today differs from the concept of traditional annual planning which was applied before. Planning nowadays is carried out on the basis of profound study of problems and factors of change, both nationwide and by sectors. Studies make use of past experience and of forecasts relating to the time period of the next plan within a framework of long-range planning and a comprehensive cultural strategy.

Planning of this sort clearly requires additional effort, work, and time. It also requires mature study and creative thinking consistent with the nature of the economic, social, and political factors of change.

It is on the basis of these principles that 5-year plans began to be prepared in Egypt as of 1978. According to these principles, if a change in circumstances should occur, it would call for partial or isolated corrective action without tampering with the "basic strategy." The latter defines the general direction toward achieving society's greater objectives in the future and in the long run.

Determining the Priorities of Investment Planning Factors

On the national level, the objective of the development plan is to guarantee proper use of capital to increase production, and to guarantee that there will be a balance between the production of goods and services. Another objective is the achievement of social justice.

Defining the plan's objectives, or defining the dimensions of the economic problem, is what determines the manner of choosing and determining the plan's investment factors. We clarify below the most important elements which affect determination of the order of investment priorities:

1. The large deficit in the balance of foreign trade.

2. The inability of national investments--savings--to meet the demands required by economic and social development.

3. The failure to reformulate ideas of development strategy to keep pace with the requirements of the nation's people.

As a result of this, alternatives have arisen on the basis of which the priorities of the investment plan in the country can be determined. These alternatives may change as the years go by, or as implementation factors or economic or social conditions may change. On this basis, determination of the priorities of the investment plan could be as follows:

a. Implementing necessary projects for replacement and renovation in order to maintain productive capacities and raise productive levels. Renovation of plants with worn-out machinery includes supplying them with modern industrial technology to improve quality, cut costs, and eliminate bottlenecks.

b. Hastening to complete projects which are currently being implemented, on a priority basis. This should particularly apply to projects whose implementation is well under way or which are very near completion. The purpose of this is to reap the economic and social yields expected of them as soon as possible, and eliminate the phenomenon of too many projects which are not productive.

c. Implementing the new projects on the basis of priority to those which have ample sources of funds through loans, easy terms provided by suppliers, or joint ventures. This is within the general framework of the government's policy.

It is also possible to determine the order of priorities of the plan's factors as follows:

a. Allocating the necessary investments to projects to put idle capacity to work, or increase the efficiency of existing productive capacity, be it to increase production of goods for local consumption or goods for export.

b. Allocating investments to joint projects which have access to foreign money, and promoting the economic open-door policy which is oriented toward doing business with the advanced countries of the world, especially in areas which require advanced know-how and technology, and involve the participation of Arab or foreign capital.

c. Allocating investments to projects which meet or further the requirements of reconstruction and development, particularly projects which increase the efficiency and raise the technological level of the contracting and construction sector. The purpose would be to enable this sector to a assist in the implementation of the various projects of other sectors. This is particularly relevant, becaure the basic bottleneck in development efforts is due to the fact that investments allocated to the construction industry are inadequate.

d. Completing ongoing projects.

e. Implementing replacement and renovation projects.

It is also possible to reorder implementation priorities as follows:

a. Directing investments to projects which concern the needs of the masses and correspond to needs of the consumers, especially projects which have to do with providing an adequate food supply, clothing and housing.

b. Concentrating on renovation and expansion of basic facilities and utilities which have been noticeably neglected in past years. This is because these are considered to be a basis for activating and expanding the country's capacity to absorb additional foreign investment and aid from abroad.

c. Directing investments to projects which serve to improve or guide consumption and are in keeping with the policy of revitalizing large pl a policy which has the objective of modernizing, developing, and increasing productive capacities so as to keep pace with modern technological developments.

d. Making investments in projects which would lead to improving the balance of payments situation or which can obtain funds from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development or other international sources, or through joint ventures. A comprehensive plan should be prepared concerning the utilization of foreign aid. This plan should determine the areas in which such aid would be most effective. Efforts should be made to utilize such aid and loans within a definite time frame which corresponds to Egypt's needs for them.

e. Giving the local and foreign private sectors a basic role in the implementation of production projects and in substantive participation in development projects.

There is no doubt that defining the objectives of the investment plan on a national level will guide us in choosing the basis for determining the priorities of investment projects. Flexibility of implementation may require changing the basis for making this choice from time to time. But strategy becomes more definite as we develop our ability to determine our resources and needs in a more accurate fashion. This means continually reveiwing the investment plan, bearing in mind changes which may occur. Changes will be taken into consideration, and the plan will be modified in light of actual implementation and in light of realistic needs. But such modifications would be within very narrow limits, so that the plan's basic objectives can be achieved. Also, the plan should be reviewed at the beginning of every year. New investments would be added, previous investments would be deleted, and new factors of change would be incorporated as needed.

PERES CRITICIZES CAMP DAVID ACCORDS

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 15 Aug 80 p 16

[Article by Shimon Peres: "The Jordanian Option--The Real Substitute for the PLO"]

[Text] Mr Menahem Begin repeatedly claims in the name of King Hussein that territorial compromise is, in his eyes, a non-starter for negotiations. In his opinion, the absence of a negotiating partner apparently invalidates the objective of the negotiations. If this is the situation, it would have been interesting to hear from the prime minister the identity of the partner from the heads of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, for his autonomy plan. Even the negotiations with Egypt on the autonomy have failed because Egypt is not ready to accept the Israeli interpretation, and Israel is not ready to accept the Egyptian interpretation.

However, if the "full autonomy" plan has not yet revealed a partner ready to accept it, it has already succeeded in bringing about a Palestinianization of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The document which the government of Israel signed at Camp David was a kind of "Balfour Declaration" for the Palestinian state, and its author (by an irony of fate, his name is Menahem Begin) is, unwillingly, one of those who has laid the legitimate and political foundation for a Palestinian infrastructure within the 1967 borders.

All the obfuscatory actions of the Likud government will be to no avail. It has committed itself in writing--and the United States Government also signed this commitment--that "the solution from the negotiations on the final status" of the West Bank and Gaza "must also recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and their just requirements." This is stronger language than that of the Balfour Declaration, and it contains an explicit recognition of the existence of a "Palestinian people" with legitimate rights and just requirements. Mr Begin himself was apparently shocked by the language of the document which he signed in English (and this is the language which commits the parties) and requested President Carter's permission to write in Hebrew "the Arabs of the Land of Israel" instead of the "Palestinian people." President Carter is not Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, and he apparently believes that if a prime minister wants to improve his image in the eyes of his people, then this is an aesthetic issue, not a political one. Permission was given, and Mr Begin disseminated an imprecise translation of his commitment at Camp David.

It must be remembered that the autonomy plan is a temporary plan--for 5 years. The subsequent period will be determined in negotiations in which "Egypt, Israel, Jordan, and representatives of the Palestinian people" will participate, and the purpose of which will be "the resolution of the Palestinian problem in all its aspects."

In other words, the government of Israel committed itself to a solution of the problem of the Palestinian people in two stages for everything concerning the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The first stage--a self-governing authority, the second stage--a complete resolution of the Palestinian problem. It takes more than a little chutzpah for someone who initiated this unfortunate idea to cast the blame on someone else, regarding the creation of PLO option because negotiations with Hussein would transfer, as it were, territories to the PLO. Mr Begin "forgot" to point out that even in regard to the negotiations with Hussein, the Alignment announced that it would insist that the IDF and the network of settlements remain along the Jordan Valley and that no foreign army will be able to cross the river.

Mr Begin has prepared for himself an awesome alternative for the future: either a PLO option within the 1967 boundaries or another military confrontation.

The Alignment is not interested in annexing an additional 1,300,000 Arabs to the State of Israel against their will. It believes that it is not worth it to sacrifice the Jewish and Zionist character of Israel on the imaginary altar of "not an inch." The real dispute is not over the annexation of territories but over the annexation of inhabitants. Only for Marc Chagall are the inhabitants cut off from the land. In actuality, whoever wants to annex Shekhem is also prepared to annex its inhabitants to Israel. A state with 3 million Jews and 2 million Arabs will naturally change from a Jewish state a Jewish-Arab state with both sides competing for every plot of land, for every street, for every house. Such a state will also lead to a dezionization of the Jewish people--from a working people, it will become an administrative people living as a dependent on the work of others.

For these reasons the Alignment is seeking a geographic solution which will permit us to withstand external dangers, and a demographic solution which will permit us to withstand an internal danger--the conversion of the Jewish settlement in Israel to a settlement which lives in diaspora conditions in its own land.

In order to defend Israel, Israel needs defensible borders in the Golan Heights, the Jordan Valley, and the Sinai Desert.

In order to remain Israel, we require a clear, solid, and vital Jewish majority and that most of the labor in Israel be Jewish labor.

As for the Palestinian problem, we believe that it is one problem, and therefore, one solution must be sought: a Jordanian-Palestinian state, a state within which there will be a majority of the Palestinians who are obviously inhabitants of Jordan and the inhabitants of Judaea, Samaria, and Gaza who are obviously citizens of Jordan. We are opposed to two solutions--in the Likud version--a separate Jordanian solution and a separate Palestinian solution. The two solutions will in time naturally become two states, and the two states will have two armies. The states will continue to compete with each other for mutual domination, and the two armies will lengthen the conflict between each other and between them and ourselves. We oppose the idea of exchanging one conflict for another and calling it a "solution." Therefore, we are opposed both to the separate Palestinian state and the separate Palestinian option of the Likud.

We favor inviting King Hussein to the negotiations. If he comes, good. If he doesn't come, he will bear the burden of the refusal. There is no reason for Israel to appear as a "rejectionist front" which every morning states its "no's" when in truth, it is seeking a "yes" to peace and a "yes" to security. It is likely that King Hussein will oppose a "territorial compromise." However, he has agreed to Security Council Resolution 242. The evacuation of "all the territories" was expressly removed from this resolution in which "the evacuation of territories" is stated. It is necessary, therefore, to try to conduct negotiations with Hussein, not on what he has not yet agreed to but on what he has already agreed to: 242.

Not only our adversaries but our friends are asking us a number of questions regarding this option, the Jordanian option, and we must respond to them. Why, they ask, didn't you conduct negotiations with Jordan previously, and if you did, why have they not been fruitful? The answer is that we did conduct negotiations, and they were fruitful. Not ostentatious and ceremonial fruit, but real fruit. The fact is that there is virtually no infiltration of terrorists into Israel from Jordan. The fact is that bridges of far-reaching normalization span the Jordan. The fact is that a system of ties between the West Bank and Israel has developed without adversely affecting the system of ties between the West Bank and Jordan. We have not reached a formal peace because of Jordan's location on the Arab map, more than because of the system of relations between it and Israel. We have understood that Jordan cannot be the first candidate for making peace with Israel. It is this limitation which also now offers renewed hope for an attempt at talks with Jordan in that there is already a large Arab country, the largest of the Arab countries, which has signed a peace treaty with Israel. The precedent exists, the continuation is sought.

Why, they ask, does Hussein respond negatively whenever the possibility of negotiations between us is mentioned? The truth is that for the most part, Hussein's reactions are rather selective. He says that he is not ready to conduct negotiations on the basis of Camp David, however, he has not retracted his agreement to Resolution 242.

It must not be forgotten that Sadat also spoke with the language of the Khartoum decisions ("no negotiations, no recognition, no peace with Israel") until he came to Israel. Just as his words did not distrub his actions, it must be assumed that the life of the Rabat language (that the PLO will conduct negotiations on the future of the territories) which Hussein uses will be extended until it is possible to begin real negotiations.

Isn't there too great a gap, they ask, between the positions of Jordan and those of Israel? Certainly there is such a gap. Each side is involved in stating its full positions, without trying to bridge them, because there is no need for bridging as long as real negotiations are not being conducted. It is indeed possible that even in the negotiations we will be able to bridge the positions of the parties only partially. Then there will be a partial agreement. However, a partial agreement is preferable to a deepening confrontation.

We prefer the Jordanian option for reasons of viewing Israel as a Jewish State. We prefer it to the Likud's Palestinian option which is likely to bring Israel up against a stone wall and to another confrontation. We prefer it not because it has no complications and difficulties but rather because without it, we will continue to pave the way for the PLO which has achieved a not insignificant impetus since Camp David.

SUPPORT OF CAMP DAVID ACCORDS URGED

[Editorial: "The Process Refuses to Die"]

[Text] The deputy foreign minister of Egypt responded to Mr Begin's letter in a cautionary (though not threatening) tone, when he emphasized that there was no prospect of renewing the autonomy talks if Israel refused to fulfill certain conditions. Yet, at the same time, he avoided cancelling any prospect which might lead to the renewal of the talks. Egypt is finding it very difficult to continue the discussions as long as Israel persists in taking certain unilateral measures, according to the Egyptian diplomat. "But we are not dispairing of them (the Israelis)...I would not say that the situation is hopeless."

The passage of the legislation on Jerusalem (the product of Geula Kohen) has pushed Anwar Sadat into a confused position. There were enough problems in the dispute over settlements, and there was no need to add to that the differences over Jerusalem, especially after we had avoided the issue in the Camp David accords. Nevertheless, the mistake was made, and not even Mr Uzama el-Baz can expect the Israeli Government to change the law. One might even conclude from his expression that he does not expect the law to be repealed. On the other hand, he is practically begging Israel not to take any further unilateral action. We would not err if we guessed that Mr el-Baz was referring to the move of the prime minister's office to East Jerusalem. It may be assumed that the prime minister will close his ears to any such appeal. It was his personal idea to transfer the prime minister's offices to East Jerusalem, and since the Renaissance party has harvested achievements from the law, it is unlikely that the prime minister's party will give up his one achievement.

This is also the case regarding another Egyptian request, which Mr Uzama el-Baz avoided mentioning, but it is believed that Cairo will raise the issue in the letter which it is now preparing in response. This refers to the Egyptian demand that Israel declare that East Jerusalem, i.e., the sovereignty over it, will be a subject for negotiation--if not in connection with autonomy, then at the end of the 5 year transition period. Mr Moshe Dayan, the former foreign minister, referred to this when he said that all issues were up for discussion, even those on which Israel had fixed its position. Mr Begin could meet Cairo on this question, without giving up the principle of his position, but it is unlikely that the prime minister will be so inclined as to accept the advice of Mr Dayan.

The prime minister can ignore the signs which are emanating from the Egyptian side. He can also appreciate the fact that, for the present, we will lose nothing in continuing the exchange of letters, and that this will enable us to continue to discuss matters with the Egyptian president without actually negotiating. However, our political position will not improve in this way, and the freeze which has already yielded the Venice declaration of the European Common Market countries, and could yield an initiative on the part of the president of Rumania, which Mr Begin would find difficult to condemn as a new manifestiation of the spirit of Munich. From one of the comments of General Kamal Hasan Ali, it may be concluded that Cairo is not enthusiastic about the initiative of Mr Nicolai Ceauscescu. It would prefer to pursue the Camp David process, and to seek a summit meeting with the U.S. president, whose international position is being strengthened following his victory in the struggle to win the nomination of his party for the U.S. elections. The Camp David process is struggling to stay alive. It will not die easily, nor will it be easy to bury. Apparently, Egypt is not interested in its demise, and it does not want to be its grave digger. It would be well if this job does not fall to the Israeli Government.

SOVIET COOPERATION SEEN NEEDED FOR MIDDLE EAST SETTLEMENT

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 8 Aug 80 pp 13, 20

[Speech by Nahum Goldmann delivered at a meeting of the executive committee of the World Jewish Congress in Amsterdam on 10 July 1980 in a discussion of Soviet Jewry]

[Text] In recent years I have been completely cut off from all formal Jewish activities concerning Soviet Jewry, and I have avoided making public statements. For a long time I served as chairman of the special committee which Ben Gurion established with the participation of Golda Meir, Zalman Shazar, and Moshe Sharett, the purpose of which was to deal with the subject of Soviet Jewry in strict secrecy, until I resigned because of a disagreement over policy. I did not participate in the Brussels convention, however, I agreed that the World Jewish Congress would be one of the international organizations under whose auspices it would be arranged. If I am speaking out today, it is because I believe that it is my obligation to tell you about my completely different approach to the entire problem. I will endeavor not to be controversial, and even if you are likely to feel resentment regarding the information which I will relate and the interpretation I will give it, I ask you to be patient.

For more than 40 years I have been in constant touch with the Soviets. I first met Maxim Litvinov (the then foreign minister) in Geneva in 1935, and in March of this year I spent 4 hours with Ambassador Dobrynin in Washington. Between these two, I have surely met with at least about 12 important Soviet diplomats. In recent years I met regularly with Tito and Ceausescu. I also frequently see those who are considered experts on the subject of Soviet Jewry, including my friend Calman Shulman from the State Department. While I reported on this regularly to the members of the Labor Party government in Israel, I do not report to the Begin government. I did this twice--to no avail.

When we come to consider the problems of Soviet Jewry, the crucial importance of the general picture in the world becomes known. The Jewish problems throughout the world, including Israel, are dependent first and foremost on the attitude of the Jewish people, however, the world situation stands in second place. The famous saying of Ben Gurion, "It is not important what the goyim think, what is important is what the Jews do," was, of course, completely absurd. Without world public opinion and the United Nations resolution, a Jewish state would not have been established in 1948.

The Tragedy of America

The basic fact, in my opinion, is that the United States can no longer be decisive on any important issue in the world today without cooperating with the Soviet Union. This is the tragedy of America today. For more than 20 years I was an American citizen, and when I gave up this citizenship in order to become an Israeli, Dean Rusk repeatedly asked me not to do it. I sympathize with America, it is a place which arouses much love, however, it is also very doubtful. My attitude today to America is one of much sorrow and empathy. As I see it, the United States has suffered a tragic fate in the last 50 years. Through the years the Americans have been very isolated and fortunate. Then came World War I in which they were forced to intervene and then World War II, after which they had to be the number 1 power. They were not ready for this: in psychological terms, generations are required in order to become a world power, and the United States never had this aspiration.

The Americans were very happy as long as they were generous, good-hearted, and democratic but with no global burden on their shoulders. However, fate suddenly called upon them to assume world leadership. Even before they had managed to adjust to this situation, they ceased being the number 1 world power. They must now recognize that they must discuss every important issue with Russia, that they cannot, for example, solve the problems of the Middle East without the Soviet Union. Russia is growing stronger and stronger. Europe is no longer exclusively bound to America, and if it unites, it is likely to become a superpower itself. Within 10 years, China can also become such a power. As of now, the United States is one of the two superpowers.

This is the general background. It is absurd to assume that we can solve the Middle East problem and the problem of Soviet Jewry by confrontation with the Russians. It was a great mistake on the part of American Jewry and Israel, to slander the Soviet Union as anti-Israeli. Our entire policy on Russia has been completely mistaken, and I do not believe that the development of the current situation was unavoidable.

The Conflict With The Russians

We could have maintained the best relations with the Russians. This applies both to Israel and to world Jewry. Already in 1942, when Weizmann leaned toward accepting Wedgewood's advice that a Jewish state should become the seventh member of the British Commonwealth, I warned him: Do not do this, boss, you will abandon every prospect that the Russians will at some time vote for the establishment of a Jewish state, as I believe they will do.

During World War II, the Soviet Union rescued hundreds of thousands of Jews by permitting them to enter Russia from Poland, and later, it permitted most of them to leave for Israel back through Poland. In the vote on the partition proposal in the United Nations, Gromyko caused a sensation when he supported it (Sharett almost fainted from emotion, however, I saw that the Soviet vote would be affirmative).

After the partition was approved by a two-thirds majority, Truman's aides--Marshall, Acheson, Patterson, and (Lovett)--asked the president to withdraw his support from the partition of Palestine, on the basis of a prediction that one day the Jewish state would come to an end with the slaughter of Jews, and instead grant the United Nations a mandate for 3 more years. In such a case, a Jewish state would never have been established in our time. One of the main reasons which motivated Truman to eliminate this option was Gromyko's comment to Dean Rusk that, in such a case, the Soviet Union would veto the American proposal.

When the War of Liberation broke out, who saved Israel? The Soviet Union. I heard Ben Gurion say often--privately and publicly--that he was pained over Soviet policy. However, he admitted that without Russian assistance, a Jewish state would not have been established. During that period America did not send one single rifle. In my office in New York, as chairman of the World Zionist Organization, an FBI investigator visited me throughout the year to determine if we had smuggled weapons to Israel through Mexico. It was the Soviet Union which provided weapons through Czechoslovakia.

The Soviets became hostile since Israel ceased being a neutral country. During the course of the talks which I held for many years with Soviet diplomats before the Holocaust, they had one complaint against a Jewish state. "You will be pro-American," they claimed, "since all the money will come from the United States." This was before we knew about the extermination of the Jews of Europe by Hitler, and I argued: You are mistaken. The Jewsish state will be built by manpower and money. Manpower which is more important will come from you, from the Jewish state in Eastern Europe, and the financial support will come from America. Therefore, we will have to be neutral.

With the establishment of the State, Ben Gurion, Sharett, and even Silver vigorously defended Israel's neutrality. It was then called a "non-aligned policy." They all agreed that we had to be neutral so as not to lose the support of the Soviet Union. However, when the Arab-Israeli wars came one after the other, and Israel was forced to depend more and more on the supply of American weapons, we were no longer able to depend on Russian assistance; as such, we grew increasingly dependent on the United States. This is how our conflict began with the Soviet Union.

However, I completely reject the view that the Russians are not for the existence of Israel. They proved this first by their support in the past; without the Russian vote, there would not have been a two-thirds majority in the United Nations. Secondly, they can always incite the Arabs against Israel, however the moment there will be no Israel, God forbid, they would be committed to the Arabs and would be unable to maneuver. There was a stage when they had virtually reestablished diplomatic relations with Israel. The matter depended on several votes in the Politburo. At the last moment they decided against such action, however, Dobrynin asked me to establish contact for him with the then Israeli ambassador Simha Dinitz, which I did. However, it led nowhere since ambassadors today, in the words of Kreisky, are "messenger boys."

The Soviet diplomats through the years refused to meet with any Jewish representatives, however, they always received me, and at my recommendation, Klutznick and Bronfman, since they knew that the World Jewish Congress was trying to be neutral.

After Stalin

The Soviet Union is not interested in the disappearance of Israel, and it is ready today to guarantee, together with the United States, the borders of Israel if there is a settlement. Among the many mistakes of which American Jewry is guilty, the most serious one was made when, under pressure from Israel, they motivated President Carter 3 years ago to cancel the agreement signed between Vance and Gromyko for the convening of a Geneva Conference. The Russians agreed at that time to be guarantors, together with the United States, of a comprehensive peace settlement; they would have found a way to bring the PLO into the talks as a part of an Arab delegation.

One of the reasons for the Russian invasion of Afghanistan was the removal of the Soviet Union from a negotiating position in the Middle East. Russians considered this American "brazenness." Russia is closer to the Middle East; therefore, how does the United States dare prevent them from taking part in dealing with this issue? There will not be a peace in the Middle East until another Geneva Conference is convened, and the Camp David Agreement alone will not bring a comprehensive peace.

Although it is true that in the past there were clear signs that the Soviets support Israel, a change took place in the last years of Stalin--when he was no longer rational and pursued everyone. The "doctors' plot" was only one episode, and it is possible that millions of Jews would have been killed had he lived. During that time I was the chairman of an unofficial committee which we set up without any publicity, and whenever we met with Gromyko or another Soviet official, I had a list of many Zionists who were in prison and in Siberia, a list which was provided by the Israeli organization Magen. The Russians customarily claimed that no Zionist was being held in the Russian prisons, and they demanded that I give them the names of such Zionists. I did not do this since in the Stalin era, they would shoot them. Since then, the situation has greatly improved. Today, we cannot only turn over the names but also cause a tumult. When the dissidents protest, they do not shoot them. In the worst case, they are sent to prison.

I do not justify this. I reject communism, and I am disgusted by all the sovereign nations. By nature, I am an anarchist, however, without bombs. Of course, I do not support a militarist regime, however, we must recognize facts: in comparison with the Stalin era, Russia today is a Garden of Eden.

We began to argue openly with the Russians after Stalin's death. I have often been accused of being too soft and moderate. However, I was the one who convened the first protest meeting against Russia in Paris, when Martin Buber and I spoke and telegrams of support came from Bertrand Russell, Eleanor Roosevelt, and many others. For 3 months the Soviets tried to block it. It was the first major protest on behalf of Russian Jewry. It was a diplomatic event, unlike the Brussels meeting which was a demagogic display.

Throughout the sixties and seventies, I spoke at dozens of meetings, however, I always said: "You must treat the Soviet Union as a superpower. We had to regard Russia as a major nation which it was, a nation which could like without Jewish support but which could bring a Holocaust on the Jewish people if it became anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli. We must continue to protest but in a respectful manner. Carter made the same foolish mistake. The expression "we will punish Russia" is infantile. Is it a girl's school? Do you punish a superpower? The United States can threaten the Soviet Union with war, that it will fight, protest--but not punish.

The Dual Aspect

And we made another major mistake. The Soviet-Jewish problem has always had two aspects: emigration and Jewish rights in Russia. The most important aspect in my opinion is not the struggle for emigration but rather for the rights of Jews. In the best case we can hope to extract 200,000 to 300,000 Jews; only a small percentage of which are determined to live as Jews in Israel. The remainder want to leave Russia primarily because they want a better life. Therefore, by ignoring the problem of existing in the Soviet Union, we would achieve the rescue of about 50,000 good Jews and the sacrifice of 3 million. We should have insisted at the very beginning on the right to maintain an organized Jewish life in Russia, at the same time with the struggle for the right of Jews to emigrate. By law, the Jews are recognized as a minority in the Soviet Union, where tens of such minorities live and have the right to have their own theaters, schools, and so forth. The Jews, however, unlike the other minorities, are not concentrated in one area. The Russians gave them Birobidzhan, where the Jews were able to use Hebrew as their official language, however, they laughed at this proposal, and justifiably so.

As I said to Gromyko, Jews are intelligent people. Why should they go to Birobidzhan next to Mongolia? Give them Kiev or Odessa and they will go! However, Dobrynin often asked: "Why didn't they ask for another territory?" To which I responded: Since Russian Jewry has no spokesman. First establish a body which will represent the Jews of Russia, and then they will be able to negotiate on a territorial concentration in one form or another.

The World Zionist Organization and most of the American Jewish organizations rejected my position that the struggle for the right of emigration and the struggle for the right to maintain a Jewish life in the Soviet Union are of equal importance. To mention one dramatic incident, I was invited to speak before the Zionist Congress in 1972 on the subject of "80 Years of Zionism." Several weeks before that, I spoke at the Council of Representatives of British Jewry, and I defended my position on the dual aspect of the struggle for the rights of Soviet Jewry. As a result, L. A. Pincus, who was then the chairman of the Zionist Executive Committee, canceled his invitation.

Without mentioning the discourtesy and the impropriety of this action, it was symptomatic of the one-sidedness of our policy on Soviet Jewry. The tone of the anti-Russian campaign in the Jewish community in America was no less damaging. When I once told the NEW YORK TIMES that it was ridiculous to compare Soviet anti-Semitism with Nazism, there was an uproar and the Presidents' Conference called me a traitor.

There are many signs that with another policy we would achieve much. However, much is also dependent upon the foreign policy of Israel. If we were striving more energetically for peace with the Arabs, the Russians could serve as intermediaries, together with the Americans. I told Ben Gurion many times: Just for the sake of 3 million Jews, the largest concentration of Jews after Israel, it would be worthwhile to change our Arab policy. From the point of view of this situation, what Israel is doing is bad and what American Jewry is doing with its "outcry" is bad. However, I have stopped arguing with Jews. I believe in the saying: What is intellect will not do, time will.

Everything depends on the world situation not deteriorating, and personally, I am optimistic. The Russians want detente, and Afghanistan was a lesson for them not to go too far. As I said to an important Soviet diplomat: Don't talk to me about pacts, etc. I know that in politics, treaties are only a screen. If you want to apply them, you use them; if you want to violate them, you forget them. He could not admit that they made a mistake, however, he responded that he understood me. The Soviets now want to save their prestige, and they are very grateful to Chancellor Schmidt for serving as an intermediary.

If the Jewish people, mainly the American Jews, learn from the past and choose to adopt a policy of diplomacy recognizing that you cannot successfully attack the Soviet Union but must negotiate with her with proriety and self-respect) while constantly raising the issue of Russian Jewry before public opinion because it must never seem as if we have forgotten them--then, I hope for the best, and I am rather optimistic. If one day, Israel institutes a different policy toward the Arabs, and the Arab countries reach an agreement with Israel, I still will not give up hope.

I believe that in such a case we are likely to receive an additional 100,000 Jewish immigrants from the Soviet Union, and also Jews from that country will be able perhaps to enjoy broader religious and cultural rights. It is possible, however, that we are approaching the zero hour in order to achieve this. In the Soviet Union, there are 3 million Jews--many more than those registered in the population census as Jews because many make use of their right not to be registered as Jews--and there is a possibility that we will be able to save many of them and to regain them as members of the Jewish people. In order to achieve this, it is necessary that detente continue to be the basis for international policy, and that a more intelligent policy be adopted by the Jews. I am optimistic about the first condition, and unfortunately, less so about the second.

COUNTRY ASKED TO ASSERT ITSELF WITHOUT BURDENING WEST

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 6 Aug 80 p 7

[Article by Dov Afal: "Improvement of Relations with USSR--A Mission Without Illusions"]

[Text] Recently, in public forums and in the press in Israel, ideas and proposals for improving relations with the USSR have been discussed. There is no reason for seeking justifications for Israel's interest in re-establishing relations with the USSR, relations which were severed by Moscow as punishment for our victory in the Six-Day War. However, it must be remembered that it is no secret that the USSR has made clear more than once, through unofficial channels and in speeches by its leaders (including Brezhnev), as to the circumstances and conditions under which it would agree to a renewal of relations with us.

The conditions are: Israel's agreement to withdraw from all of the territories occupied in the Six-Day War; involving the PLO in negotiations with Israel on a final solution to the Palestinian problem; including a solution to the problem of the Palestinian refugees, and the realization of the Palestinian right to self determination by the establishment of a Palestinian state on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip. We may add to this that Moscow officially supports the UN resolutions which recognize the right of the Palestinian refugees to return to their homes within Israel, or to receive reparations. The USSR has declared its readiness--within the framework of a comprehensive settlement--to participate with other members of the UN in giving guarantees of the security and independence of all countries in the region, including Israel.

Israeli governments--the Alignment as well as the Likud--have rejected these conditions and have worked to eliminate the USSR as an active factor in our region. In this repsect, there is no difference between the policies of the governments of the late Golda Meir, Yitshaq Rabin, and of Menahem Begin. It may even be assumed that the present Israeli prime minister views now, as one of the great achievements of Israeli diplomacy, the burying of the Vance-Gromyko declaration of October 1977, which marked out lines for Soviet-American cooperation in the solution of the problems of our region. This "achievement" by Begin and Dayan prevented American-Soviet cooperation in the settlement of the dispute in our region. It strengthened among the Soviet leaders the recognition (which was in any case strong among most of them) that the official leaders of Israel are not at all interested in the reconstruction of Soviet-Israeli relations, and in the placing of them on a strong and stable basis.

So, there is no logic or reason in all of the declarations regarding the need to seek ways to re-establish relations with the USSR, as long as it is not stated explicitly that Israel must recognize the right of the USSR to participate in a constructive way in the general and final solution of the Israeli-Arab dispute.

This does not mean that Israel must adopt the conditions, as formulated by Moscow after the Six-Day War, for the ending of the dispute. There is reason to assume that the USSR, as a full participant with the U.S., would not adhere to extreme pro-Arab demands and conditions (such as returning hundreds of thousands of refugees to the territories, or the withdrawal of the IDF to precisely the Green Line), which would cause a breakdown of the negotiations at Geneva or anywhere else.

Moreover, the USSR rejects the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty and the Camp David agreements in their entirety, and identifies with the PLO, Syria, and Libya.

However, let us assume that in October 1977, Moshe Dayan would not have succeeded in burying the agreement between Vance and Gromyko, or let us imagine that Israel would have "bet" on the realization of the declaration of the two foreign ministers of the USSR and the U.S. and would have subjected the joint platform of the USSR and the U.S., as it was formulated in the statement of the two ministers, to the test of reality.

In the journal of the Soviet Communist party, KOMONIST, of June, Professor Yevgeny Primakov (during the Nasser period a reporter for PRAVDA in Cairo, and now a member of the Soviet Academy of Science--Near East section) mentioned the "key problems" to a general solution of the Israeli-Arab dispute, listed in the Vance-Gromyko declaration of 1 October 1977: "the evacuation of Israeli forces from territories occupied in the 1967 war; the Palestinian problem--including the assurance of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people; an end to the state of war and the establishment of normal peaceful relations, on the basis of mutual recognition of the principles of sovereignty, territorial integrity, and political independence." Professor Yevgeny Primakov is not numbered among the friends of Israel. It is possible, therefore, that he would willingly improve and update the text of the declaration by the foreign ministers of the USSR and the U.S., and introduce some changes, such as the explicit demand that the PLO participate in negotiations for a peace settlement, and the assurance of the right of the refugees to return to their homes beyond the Green Line. There is no reason to engage in the game of "what would happen if," but we still can ask: Would Foreign Minister Gromyko, as one of the two chairmen of the peace conference, have troubled Prime Minister Begin to give up all of the Sinai in return for a peace settlement with Egypt? Would Gromyko have been opposed to a transition period of 5 years? Or to the idea of autonomy in itself as an interim temporary solution to the Palestinian problem? There is of course no possible logic in answering such a hypothetical question. In any event, it may be assumed that the USSR would be very interested in collaboration with the U.S., in settling the dispute in our region.

It is also permissible to raise the idea that both the U.S. and the USSR would stand by an explicit definition of the substance of autonomy and its scope, so as to prevent the failure of the process towards achieving a general peace settlement.

In theory, it could be said that the agreement of all interested parties (i.e., the Egyptians, Syrians, Israelis, Jordanians, and Palestinians) could put an end to the dispute between the Arabs and the Israelis in a comprehensive form without the participation of the Russians. It must also be taken into account that the USSR could bring about the failure of a general settlement, if, as a participant in the negotiations, it insisted on the return of the refugees from across the Green Line, on the absolute withdrawal of Israeli forces behind the Green Line, and the establishment of a Palestinian state on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip, as the only solution to the problem. There is also a basis for suspecting that some important factors in the Russian upper echelons hope that a Palestinian state would need and ask for its aid in realizing Arafat's "dream" of establishing a democratic Palestinian state in the whole area of Palestine, by exploting the demands of the irredentist Arab minority in Israel.

Nonetheless, we must also make clear to ourselves that the participation of the USSR in general negotiations should convince extremist factors in the Arab world in general, and within the PLO in particular, that their hopes and struggle for the dismantling of Israel through the aid of the USSR are anchored only in their illusions and dreams, with no connection to reality.

There is also no basis for any illusions that the USSR, since the countries of Western Europe have expressed their support for the participation of the PLO in negotiations of a general settlement, will now proclaim its withdrawal of recognition of the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people. There is also no basis for the illusion that the USSR will give up its demand for the creation of a Palestinian state just now, when the UN General Assembly, by an impressive majority, has affirmed the realization of this demand. There is also no basis for the dreams of an "about face" from the American orientation of Israel, and the machiavellian notion of the possibility of maneuvering between the USSR and the U.S. No informed stateman, either inside or outside of the USSR believes that Israel can deviate from the American line, both for economic and military reasons, as well as because of its special relations with American Jewry.

Let us also note that, unfortunately, the demographic and economic balance of power between the Arabs and Israel is stable, and is not going to tilt in favor of Israel. One may not expect the USSR to respond to attempts by Israel "to endear" itself. The USSR (like most other countries in the world) will continue to give overriding importance to its relations with the Arabs, as compared to any special relations with Israel.

There is also a reasonable possibility that the USSR will view the establishment of good relations with Israel, which maintains special relations with the U.S., as an important component in its efforts to maintain peaceful relations and cooperation with the U.S., within the framework of the new and updated version of detente for the decade of the 80's. This possibility is worth consideration by the Israeli Government, which might free itself from the Don Quixote vision of the special strategic mission of Israel, as the "only stable country in the Middle East, worthy of special treatment by Western Europe and the United States."

The real problem for Israeli policy now is to garner its strength to protect its security and future, without becoming a concern to the Arab world and a factor in its confrontation with the USSR.

EBAN: LIKUD HURT RELATIONS WITH LATIN AMERICA

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 7 Aug 80 p 5

[Article: "Israel and Latin America"]

[Text] Of 33 countries called for the establishment of the state of Israel in November 1947, 13 of them were Latin American. When Israel struggled for admission to the UN (and as a result to all international agencies), 18 of the 37 affirmative votes came from Latin American countries, which at that time numbered 20 in the UN. In 1967, when the USSR and the Arab countries supported passage of a resolution calling for Israeli withdrawal to the June 4 lines, without peace--all 22 Latin American countries voted against the resolution.

It is clear that the countries of that distant continent played a decisive role in Israel's struggle for international recognition and acceptance in the world community. Since Israel had arrived late in that arena, an imbalance was created: Latin America gave to Israel what Israel was unable to give to Latin America, which had already achieved independence and sovereignty before Israel--and before most of the countries of Asia and Africa.

This fateful partnership came as a surprise to us. Due to its distance, Latin America was cut off from all Jewish life in Europe and the first steps towards Hebrew settlement in Israel. When the curtain rose on the Jewish tragedy in Europe, because of World War II, the Jews turned to countries far and near for support and encouragement. There was reason to suspect that the countries of Latin America would not accept the Jewish nature of the Zionist aspiration. Many of those among the Jewish leadership expected spiritual difficulties stemming from the theological concepts of the Catholic church. The helping hand which was extended from Latin America imparted an atmosphere of comfort to our struggle for liberation. This friendship was not part of any "debt" or "ultimate end." We could realize the principle of mutuality only in the sphere of a feeling and recognition of thanks. In time, the state of Israel developed a network of connections with the countries of Central and South America, and its flag flies throughout the continent. Public opinion in Israel grew so accustomed to sympathy from Latin America, that no attention was paid to another phenomenon: the readiness of many Latin American countries to locate their embassies in Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, in contrast to the hesitant and reserved position of the great powers.

Against this background, it is difficult to avoid shedding a tear because of the development in relations between Israel and Latin America in the last half decade. At the emergency session which ended last week, only two Latin American countries (Guatemala and the Dominican Republic) voted against the votes of 22 countries of that bloc, which had voted the other way 13 years earlier.

This change is due in part to changes in the social structure and world outlook of the countries of Central and South America. The formation of the "Third World" front brought the Latin American group closer to the Arab world, and moved it away from Israel. The oil organizations, especially OPEC, created common Arab and Latin American positions, but to my sorrow it is impossible to explain this deterioration in relation only to factors beyond our control. To a substantial extent it is due to Israeli neglect.

The termination of aid programs and Israeli participation in Africa after the Yom Kippur War could have freed up budgets and manpower, for expansion of cooperation and development projects in Latin America. From 1974 on, the opportunity was not exploited in its full scope. In spite of the devotion of ambassadors and workers of the AMLAT section of the foreign ministry, there was an atmosphere of apathy in the highest levels of government which bred oversight and carelessness. I have had the opportunity to evaluate this process from the point of view of personal experience. When I was a member of the cabinet under the late Levi Eshkol and the late Golda Meir, I made official visits to 10 Latin American countries. There were dozens of visits to Israel by Latin American heads of state and foreign ministers. Since the revolution in 1977, this movement has almost completely ceased.

During the Likud regime the prime minister or a foreign minister has not made one visit to a Latin American country. At every session of the UN General Assembly it was my practice to hold briefing and discussion sessions with the whole Latin American contingent. This tradition was abandoned several years ago, and not renewed. In discussions by the prime minister and foreign ministers in the Knesset and in the media since the rise of Likud to power, there has been almost no mention of the existence of the Latin American continent. During my tenure as ambassador to the UN, I attached great importance to the Latin American group. I insisted that the full importance of it could not be appreciated without controlling the language of most of the countries of that continent, with all of the sweat and effort involved in such a task. I have not heard that my successors have viewed this dimension as essential and irreplacable for anyone who wanted to fully plumb the possibilities of advancing Israel's relations with this large group of friendly countries. And I am speaking of a continent, in which Arab nationalism and Islam are not represented to the extent that they are in Asia and Africa.

Now the Likud government has reached the acme of its carelessness in that it has developed a demonstrative and verbal policy regarding Jerusalem, without even superficially taking into account the attitudes of the Latin American countries. The announcement by the government of the move of the prime minister's office to what it defines as East Jerusalem, brought about the announcement by the government of Venezuela of its departure from the capital city. I am certain that MK Geula Kohen attaches no importance to the international dimension of Jerusalem. Her whole inclination is to attack the achievements of the Camp David accords, and in her eyes Jerusalem is only "a means to an end" in that quest.

I am not claiming that the existence of several national flags in Jerusalem is the central basis in the new reality that the people of Israel is in its capital. However, every Jew with historic imagination must recall the special universal element of Jerusalem in Jewish thought in every generation. "Jerusalem--the navel of the earth." "Jerusalem will be a light to all nations, and they will walk in its light." Generations in Israel have thrilled to the visionary words and poetry which present the image of "the mountain above the hills" to which "the nations flow" in a covenant of peace and justice with the creator of the world. The state of Israel has "merited" a government which prefers an official building on Shaykh Jarakh over the existence and nurturing of the international image of the covenant of Israel. The broad continent which is the home of liberation movements and stormy struggles, whose fate crossed with that of the people of Israel at a decisive moment--this continent has not once crossed the consciousness or lips of the Likud government in the 3 years of its tenure.

Another abandoned one which shall remain in the wilderness--until there is a change in the regime in Israel....

JEWISH AGENCY PLANS 70 NEW WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS

TA180939 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 18 Sep 80 p 1

[Report by Dani Rubinstein: "The Settlement Department Plans 70 New Settlements in the West Bank"]

[Text] Despite the government's announcement on the establishment of only 10 more settlements in Judaea and Samaria, which would complete the Jewish settlement plans in the West Bank, the Jewish agency's settlement department headed by Matityahu Drobles yesterday published its plan to establish 70 new communal and urban settlements in the West Bank between now and 1985.

The plan specifies the blocs of settlements that would stretch from the southern Hebron hills to northern Samaria in the following order: the Yattir bloc--7 settlements; the western front Hebron bloc--3 settlements; the Giv'on bloc--2 settlements; Halamish and Modi'in in western Samaria--4 settlements; the Bet Al and Shilo bloc--5 settlements; the Ari'el and Qarne Shomron blocs--5 settlements; the Qedumim and Elon More blocs (near Nabulus)--6 settlements; northwest of Nabulus and the Shave Shomron bloc--6 settlements bordering on the green line in Samaria; the Rehan bloc--3 settlements; northern Samaria (Janin area)--5 settlements; the Tirza bloc--4 settlements; the Jordan Valley and northern Dead Sea--8 settlements (4 of them near Jericho). [figures as published]

According to the lists and plans published by Matityahu Drobles, these settlements include only part of the 10 settlements that the prime minister said would complete the settlement complex in the West Bank.

The settlement department--whose activities are coordinated with the government--has now published this settlement plan for establishing 12 to 15 settlements a year in accordance with the master plan Drobles submitted to the government about 2 years ago.

The plan does not make any mention of Begin's pledge to limit settlement activities to only 10 more settlements. Such a pledge was given to the United States, and Minister Ari'el Sharon reiterated it to Ambassador Sol Linowitz during the latter's recent stay in Israel.

In his plan Drobles explains that a race against time should be launched now in order to establish facts in the field and to "remove any traces of doubt regarding our intention to keep the territories of Judaea and Samaria forever." The date cited on the plan is September 1980.

The DAVAR correspondent noted that the government's announcements about the upcoming completion of settlement in the West Bank stirred ferment among Gush Emunim members who in the last few days announced their intention to resume the organization of settlement nuclei in the West Bank.

QALQILIYAH PROTESTS ELECTRICITY LINES--The Qalqiliyah Municipality headed by Hajj Amin al-Nasir has sent a protest to the military government about Israeli Electricity Corporation lines being extended through the town. The electricity lines being extended through Qalqiliyah are intended for settlements in western Samaria. [Text] [TA210951 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 21 Sep 80 p 3]

RAMALLAH ART GALLERY CLOSED--Today the military government closed an art gallery in Ramallah which exhibits paintings by Palestinian painters, claiming that an unlicensed exhibition was shown in it. A military government officer summoned the gallery owner and confiscated the keys to the gallery. The paintings of East Jerusalem artist Sulayman Mansur had been exhibited in the gallery. Mansur told our correspondent Arye Gus that the themes of his paintings were not political but folkloristic. Two weeks ago the military government confiscated five paintings by another artist. [Text] [TA212018 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 21 Sep 80]

CHILDREN ALLOWANCES--The military authorities in Judaea and Samaria will pay allowances for children to the military government [Arab] employees for every child under 18 years of age. Up to four children the allowance will be about 250 Israeli pounds per child and from the fifth child upward the allowance will be about 140 pounds per child. Our correspondent Arye Gus notes that Jordan pays allowances for children only up to the fourth child while Unwra pays up to seven children. [Text] [TA181952 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1800 GMT 18 Sep 80]

GOVERNMENT, E. JERUSALEM COMPANY--The government and the East Jerusalem Electric Corporation have agreed to open negotiations to settle the crisis developing between them. Our correspondent Pinhas 'Inbari has learned that the Energy Ministry has promised not to start local procedures against the corporation in the near future and has even promised to strengthen it by supplying it with generators and other assistance. The corporation has agreed to discuss changes in the area under its concession and our correspondent mentions possibilities such as ceding the electricity supply to the Jewish settlements and IDF camps or to the Jewish neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In return the corporation will be allowed to supply electricity to Hebron. The chairman of the board of directors, Anwar Nusaybah, presented this agreement to the corporation's directorate today and no opposition was voiced. In contrast, the corporation workers' committee rushed to release a statement that rejects any changes in the corporation's concession. Our correspondent notes that in the past this committee had already foiled a compromise attempt with the government. [Text] [TA181825 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1800 GMT 18 Sep 80]

UNEMPLOYMENT DATA RELEASED--Over 53,000 people were unemployed during the first half of 1980. According to data released by the Central Bureau of Statistics the number of employed men has decreased while the number of employed women has increased by 2.5 percent. During the first half of 1980 the number of unemployed was higher by a 55-percent average compared with 1979 and by 31 percent compared with 1978. The number of unemployed actively looking for jobs during this period reached an average of 53,000, which is equivalent to 4.1 percent of the civilian manpower as compared to a 2.9 percent unemployment rate in 1979 and 3.6 percent in 1978. The number of those seeking jobs through the employment bureaus reached 29,000 during the first half of 1980. In addition, the number of those seeking jobs for a long 5-week period reached 38,000, almost three-fourths of all unemployed during the first half of 1980. In general, the civilian manpower in Israel totaled nearly 1.3 million. [TA182001 Tel Aviv IDF Radio in Hebrew 1510 GMT 18 Sep 80]

PARTY FUNDS FOR AHVA--Yesterday the Knesset decided that the Democratic faction--which consisted of six Knesset members until July 1980--split into two three-member factions: Yiga'el Yadin, Shmu'el Tamir and Binyamin Halevi (Democrats) and Shmu'el Eliyahu, Shafiq As'ad and 'Aqiva Nof (AHVA). The implication of this decision is that the AHVA faction will receive party funds. Each one of the factions will receive about 4.25 million Israeli pounds at the rate prevalent in September 1980. JORDAN TAKES CREDIT FOR ILO CONDEMNATION OF ISRAEL

Amman AL-RA'Y in Arabic 29 Jun 80 p 20

[Report on press conference held by the Jordanian Minister of Labor, 'Umar al-Nabulsi, in Amman; date not given]

> [Text] Al-Nabulsi Explains Jordan's Role in International Labor Organization's Adoption of Resolution Condemning the Zionist Settlements Policy in the Occupied Arab Territories.

The conference of the International Labor Organization condemned the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. This was in a resolution adopted by the conference during its 66th session held in Geneva from 4 to 25 June.

During a press conference held on 28 June, Jordan's minister of labor, 'Umar al-Nabulsi, said that the Jordanian delegation had submitted this resolution to the conference where it was supported by a sweeping majority. The draft resolution, according to al-Nabulsi, was presented by the Jordanian delegation at the request of the Arab group of nations, which authorized Jordan last March to submit a draft resolution condemning the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

Al-Nabulsi said that the adoption of this resolution by the International Labor Organization has a special significance and is an indication of the progress of the just Arab cause. This action represents, in itself, strong support for the Arab position vis-a-vis the Israeli occupation and arbitrary measures which violate international laws, agreements and custom, especially with regard to the confiscation of Arab land, the establishment of settlements and the interference with the cultural freedom of Arab workers in Palestine and other Arab occupied territories.

Al-Nabulsi emphasized that the resolution represents a rejection of the policy of "accomplished facts" which Israel tries to impose illegally and by force upon the Arab citizens. This resolution, according to al-Nabulsi, reaffirms the role of the International Labor Organization to follow up on all forms of injustice which affect workers, in accordance with its constitution. Accordingly, the organization sent delegations to the occupied territories. Their reports exposed the negative effects of the Israeli settlement policy upon the social and economic situation of the Arab labor force. The delegations' reports emphasized that the continuation of these policies frustrates the Arab citizens in their everyday life and work.

Al-Nabulsi talked about the resolution adopted during the 1974 conference of the Internatinal Labor Organization concerning the policy of racial segregation adopted by Israel toward Arab workers in violation of their traditional freedoms. He added that the Israeli change of section 83 of the Jordanian labor law, at the beginning of this year, constitutes open interference with the traditional rights of Arab workers and forbids them from organizing themselves into union groups. Al-Nabulsi said that another measure of oppression taken by the Israeli authorities against the Arab citizens was the announcement by the Israeli minister of energy concerning Israel's intention to confiscate the Electric Company of Jerusalem. Al-Nabulsi talked about the resolution of the International Labor Organization which condemned the actions of the Israeli authorities concerning the establishment of settlements on confiscated Arab land. The resolution:

1. Expresses concern over the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories and the serious economic and social consequences of this on the rights and socio-economic interests of the Arab labor force.

2. Strongly condemns the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other Arab lands occupied in June 1967.

3. Urges the Israeli authorities to stop immediately the construction of settlements in Palestine and other Arab occupied territories including Jerusalem and to dismantle any existing settlements.

4. Calls upon all its members to stop all aid to Israel, especially aid which could be used for the establishment of settlements in the occupied Arab lands.

5. Calls on the board of directors and the director general of the International Labor Bureau to do the following:

a. Offer all kinds of assistance to the Arab citizens in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, in order to develop their technical and economic capabilities to face the consequences of occupation and the Israeli policy of settlements.

b. Take all necessary measures in order to carry out this resolution.

6. Requests the director general of the International Labor Bureau to submit annual reports to the conference concerning the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, in keeping with the provisions of this resolution.

Al-Nabulsi talked about the draft resolution which was submitted by the Jordanian delegation to the conference. It stated that based upon international principles, the international community has witnessed, since the Israeli aggression in 1967, open and deliberate policies and actions by Israel to establish settlements in Palestine and the other Arab territories in violation of the charter of the United Nations and the Geneva agreements.

The Jordanian draft resolution stated that "The occupation authorities, which have continuously defied Jordanian society, have recently escalated the confiscation of Arab land and intensified the establishment of settlements by evicting and disregarding the rights and interests of Arab land owners. It is necessary to emphasize that such practices are prohibited by the fourth Geneva agreement and are considered to be in serious violation of this agreement.

"The resettlement policy of the Israeli occupation authorities has and continues to have a serious and directly negative effect on employment and income of the local citizens due to the growing confiscation of the natural resources of the area, such as agricultural land and water sources for the use of the new Israeli settlements. This policy has led to a dangerous level of unemployment as well as to other dangerous labor problems resulting from the dispossessing of small farmers and others of their land and property. This policy creates a multitude of difficulties in an atmosphere of growing insecurity created and maintained by Israeli official plans to establish additional settlements in the rest of the occupied Arab territories.

"This Israeli policy and its impact on the livelihood of workers in the occupied Arab territories have led to dangerous results which obstruct economic and social development, and drive workers and farmers out of their fertile land.

"This policy of occupation has led to the dispersement of Arab society in the occupied Arab territories and Palestine. It has also caused social, economic, cultural and material damage to the workers of this land and to the future of their families.

"On this occasion, we would like to point out, Mr Chairman, the 12th point which includes paragraphs 99 to 102 of the third supplement of the report of the director of the International Labor Organization to the current session concerning the labor situation in the occupied Arab territories.

"The International Labor Organization and its previous conferences have taken pains to study the situation of Arab workers. For this reason, the current session is called upon to condemn the Israeli settlement policy and to take immediate measures to guarantee putting an end to the deteriorating situation of the Arab workers as stated in the draft resolution. This is a necessity, since the deteriorating economic, social and material situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories is a result of the settlement policy adopted officially and publicly by Israel in defiance of all international laws and of the constitution of the International Labor Organization.

"Foreign military occupation is abnormal, is condemned by the international community, and is illegal. For this reason, it is our duty as an international family to take this situation into account in dealing with the situation of Arab workers. No one can deny that the establishment of settlements and practices resulting therefrom are a blunt violation of the rights of the Arab workers and a threat to economic and social security in the occupied territories and the entire Arab world."

Al-Nabulsi added that the draft resolution was adopted by the conference after heated debates between the countries supporting it and the western countries which tried to block it under the pretext that it was a political resolution unrelated to the purpose of the International Labor Organization.

The Jordanian minister expressed his gratitude to the countries which supported and made this resolution successful.

FOREIGN DEPOSITS OF JORDANIAN BANKS ANALYZED

Amman AL-RA'Y in Arabic 29 Jun 80 p 6

[Article by Jihad al-Ra'i: "On Foreign Investments of Jordanian Banks"]

[Text] In comment on Fahd al-Fanik's article entitled "Where Are Foreign Investments of Jordanian Banks Heading" published under the "Economic Sphere" column of the Jordanian AL-RA'Y issued on Wednesday, 18 June 1980, and in view of the proposals and opinions which the article expresses on the basis of narrow conclusions that are far from the essence of the issue altogether, I have deemed it fit to write this comment:

Al-Fanik has attributed the reason for the increase in the assets which the Jordanian banks have abroad to two things:

First, "earning high and guaranteed interest for these assets instead of lending them to Jordanian projects."

Second, "the income tax law exempts foreign income and this opens the door for claiming that the interest earned for the assets deposited abroad is not subject to Jordanian taxes, even if the interest belongs to a branch existing in Jordan and even if the source of the interest earned is the citizens' deposits. The interest paid [by the banks] for these assets is counted as bank expenses for the purpose of taxes."

Because al-Fanik has not been able to go any further in defining the framework of this problem and its effects on the Jordanian economy in a manner that enables him to follow a course that leads to proposals dealing with the essential issues, rather than just observe some superficial points to discuss such a complex and thorny issue in reliance on some secondary symptoms, I will try to make some analyses to answer the conclusions of the writer.

First, al-Fanik specific statemant that all the assets of the Jordanian commercial banks abroad are investments in the scientific sense of the word is not true. Had al-Fanik taken the trouble of analyzing these assets and studying the reasons why any bank maintains assets outside the kindgom, he would have found that this practice is in accordance with regular formulas aimed at facilitating a bank's work and at serving its customers well.

Second, the Jordanian foreign currency control laws permit the banks to open non-resident accounts in foreign currency for residents and non-residents with the aim of bringing in foreign investments and the deposits of non-residents because of their effective role in bolstering the currency reserves and strengthening the kingdom's balance of payments. The same laws also permit free withdrawing and depositing in these accounts on encouraging terms to achieve the desired goal.

As a result of this permit, the banks are allowed to maintain sufficient foreign currency deposits abroad to meet their foreign currency commitments and remittances from and to these accounts. Al-Fanik has forgotten something in his comment on the City Bank budget when he said: "In 1979, City Bank was a model of the successful bank that deserves congratulation and that encourages other banks, especially our national banks, to improve their efficiency and their competitive situation in order to be able to stand fast and to protect their share of the banking market in Jordan."

Had al-Fanik examined the City Bank budget well, he would have found that most of its foreign deposits are assets belonging to non-residents and deposited abroad in foreign currency.

Assuming that the figures which the writer has sited at the outset of his article--figures that point out that the banks' deposits in foreign currency have increased from 12 million dinars in 1975 to almost 100 million dinars at present--are correct, then we find it extremely surprising that he considers this figure large when compared with the foreign assets in Bahrain which amount to 25 billion dollars even though the income of Jordan as a country is equal to Bahrain's income. It is surprising that the writer finds this figure large, especially in light of the basic principle seeking to transform Jordan into a successful center for the attraction of foreign deposits and investments at a time in which Jordan is passing a successful transitional period to bolster its economy and to maintain the exchange rate between the dinar and foreign currencies.

As for the al-Fanik's explanation of this increase in the deposits as the greed to earn high and guaranteed interest rate and, consequently, as a concealed means for evading income taxes, the current international interest rates are the best answer refuting this explanation. Rather, the increase in the interest rate for the Eurodollar from eight percent to almost 20 percent from the beginning of 1980 till March 1980 has exhausted the savings of all the developing countries and has led to a deficit in their balances of payment, considering that this increase led to an increase in the cost of local savings without the ability to correct local lending due to the presence of definite [interest rate] ceilings. Moveover, the international rise in the interest rates--a rise occurring as the result of reasons and goals visualized by the United States and the industrial countries to curtail the current international inflation--has had a negative impact on all the public and private economic sectors of the developing countries and at the expense of their savings.

It is concluded from this that the rise in the interest rates has not been in the interest of the developing countries. Consequently, this explanation denies the presence of any policies aimed at investment outside the country and at evading taxes at a time when the economy is suffering from recession, inflation and some liquidity [sic]. Moreover, this explanation confirms the lack of the ability to contain the negative influences on our national economy. Therefore, the talk about levying taxes on the so-called interest which the banks earn from abroad will have a negative impact on the process of developing and increasing the deposits of non-residents in the Jordanian banks. Moreover, the equation embodied in the desire of all concerned to increase government revenues through taxes on the one hand and to keep developing Jordan's role as a central financial center in the Arab area is an equation that requires detailed and careful study so that no measures harming this equation and, consequently, acting against all aspects of the national economy may be taken.

As for al-Fanik's explanation regarding the inclination of the Jordanian banks to invest outside the kingdom rather than lend their monies to Jordanian projects, the answer to this explanation is evident in the attempt of some Jordanian companies and establishments to borrow in U.S. dollars from the international Euromarket as of the beginning of 1976--an endeavor which continues until the present.

If these companies and establishments want to transfer their debts in Eurodollars into local loans, they have to pay the Jordanian banks interest prices and commissions similar to what they have paid the foreign banks and they have to offer the Jordanian banks the same guarantees that they have offered the foreign banks. At the same time, they have to follow the policy of favoring the foreign side.

Finally, I ask al-Fanik to review his article after a detailed study of the effects of the decline [ruju'] in the interest rate on the dollar and the increased floating of the interest rates paid for loans from the Eurodollar market so that he may understand the causes and dimensions of the problem and may offer us more of his invaluable opinions and suggestions.

MINISTER CONCLUDES WOOD AGREEMENT WITH MALAYSIA

[Article: "Minister of Finance's Return From Malaysia; Agreement to Supply Jordanian Lumber Company With Tree Trunks for Unlimited Period"]

[Text] Amman--Salim al-Masa'idah, the minister of finance, returned to Amman at noon yesterday after a visit of several days to the Republic of Malaysia.

Al-Masa'idah has said that during the visit, he held talks with the president of the Malaysian State of (Sarawak) on supplying the Jordanian Lumber Company with its wood needs.

The minister added that a joint agreement has been signed by the two sides in this regard and that in accordance with this agreement, the State of Sarawak undertakes to supply the Jordanian Lumber Company with good-quality tree trunks for an unlimited period and at the prevalent prices.

It is expected that Jordan's need of lumber will amount annually to 100,000 cubic meters valued at 4-5 million dinars.

The agreement was signed on behalf of the government of Sarawak by the state's prime minister and on behalf of the Jordanian government by Salim al-Masa'idah, the minister of finance.

The minister has also said that he held discussions with the Malaysian officials on the means to bolster and strengthen the existing economic cooperation between the two countries, to increase the trade exchange and to enhance the volume of imports and exports between the two countries.

Al-Masa'idah has further added that the discussions with the Malaysian officials also dealt with the possibility of setting joint projects by the two countries and of exploiting the means of transportation operating between the two countries to ship the crude Jordanian potash and phosphate exported to the southeast Asian countries.

It is to be noted that the Jordanian Lumber Company was founded with a capital of 3 million dinars and that the government and government establishments own more than 50 percent of this capital.

The company, located in the city of al-'Aqabah, is expected to start production at the beginning of February 1980.

The minister was received at the airport by the ministry undersecretary, the director of the Land and Survey Bureau and a number of high-ranking ministry officials.

NEW PETROLEUM INVESTMENT COMPANY FORMED

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 6 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] The newly-formed $380 million Kuwait Petroleum Investment Company is a departure from the previous policy of the government which had earlier confined all oil sector activities to the control of the State. While the four earlier companies are to continue to be state-owned, the new one will have a 30 per cent participation of the public.

Informed sources in Kuwait were reported as saying that the new policy was partly due to the desire of the government to create new avenues of investment within the country for Kuwaiti citizens. The flight of the capital in the past, in search of better interest rates and investment opportunities, had created a series liquidity situation in the country.

The Kuwaiti government will be in effective control of the company as it owns 70 per cent of the shares. Besides, the Board of Directors of the new company will have representatives from the Ministry of Finance and Commerce.

The new company will take over the downstream operations like trading in all types of oil derivatives, marketing and management of oil projects. Since downstream operations are mostly abroad, the new company is likely to be involved in joint ventures and acquiring share in oil installations abroad. It will also be investing in pipeline construction, refineries....

The $3.7 billion Kuwait Petroleum Corporation will continue to be the umbrella organization for all oil sector activities in the country. The 4 companies directly affiliated to it will be supplemented by divisions for marketing and planning.

The Kuwait Oil Company will manage exploration, production and drilling. The Kuwaiti National Petroleum Company will be confined to refining and the Kuwait Oil Taners Company [as printed] will concentrate on maritime transport. The Petrochemical Industries Company will produce petrochemicals.

The Kuwait Petroleum Corporation will also control gas production and marketing. A new company might be formed to manage gas production and marketing as the volume of trading increases.

The Arabian Oil Company, which operates in the neutral zone, will not be affected by the corporation's functioning. The Arabian Oil Company is jointly owned by Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and a Japanese company.

SOVIET INITIATIVE IN LEBANON EXAMINED

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 8 Jul 80 p 2

[Article by Sarkis Na'um: "The Soviets, Unification and the Army"]

[Text] The meetings which have been taking place for some time between Soviet Ambassador to Lebanon Aleksander Soldatov and Bashir al-Jumayyil and former President Camille Sham'un, as well as the Soviet ambassador's continual meetings with the staffs of the National Movement and the Palestinian resistance, have given everyone the impression that the Soviet Union currently supports the efforts to achieve reconciliation among the Lebanese themselves and between the Lebanese and the Palestinians and Syrians. This impression is reinforced by the fact that Soviet officials have not revealed any position to the contrary.

Individuals who have recently visited Moscow confirm this view. They say that the enthusiasm with which Soviet officials talked about the necessity of Lebanese reconciliation surprised them greatly, going far beyond their expectations.

These individuals say that the Soviets expressed their appreciation of the general principles of unification as announced by the administration a few months ago, especially since they view these principles as being in harmony with the political solution put forward previously by the National Movement through Walid Junblat. They also heard a sincere appeal for an end to the series of security disruptions and cooperation with the existing Lebanese Army, which is now in the process of being rebuilt in a manner which will satisfy all Lebanese.

The visitors indicate that they also heard a call for the elimination of the disparity in the positions within the National Movement regarding the issue of the army and the provision of assistance to help the authorities regain their military effectiveness. According to the Soviet appeal, this should be accomplished through political efforts and dialog before circumstances make it necessary to deal with this matter through means which are completely inconsistent with the principles of dialog and democracy.

The visitors themselves think it unlikely that this Soviet position will result in an initiative in the full sense of the word. They do say, however, that they sensed a determination to make a broad and peaceful move in this direction.

What are the motives behind this Soviet determination to achieve reconciliation and remove the obstacles blocking it?

Officials in the Kremlin say that behind this determination is a desire to see Lebanon regain its vitality, its role, its unity and its peace. But they also say, according to visitors to Moscow, that there are many other factors behind this Soviet position, the most important of which are the following:

1. The Soviet Union's desire to protect Syria, its friend and main ally in the area, from any pressure in Lebanon which might cause problems for it. This desire is heightened by the fact that Syria is currently the target of intense pressure both within the country and in the Arab and international spheres. This pressure is aimed at weakening Syria's resolve in the face of the American policy tied to Camp David and its offshoots and forcing it away from the Soviets in order to make the area largely closed to Soviet influence once again.

In this connection, the Soviets are earnestly afraid that new domestic and foreign developments might force officials in Damascus to withdraw their forces from Lebanon--or at least a large portion of them. Such a move would take place under the shadow of an explosive Lebanese situation, and this could ignite the entire area. The sole beneficiary from such a development would be Israel.

2. The Soviet Union's desire to protect the Palestinian resistance which maintains an effective presence in Lebanon. A continuation of the present climate, which has had a considerable effect on the relationship between the Lebanese and Palestinians at the popular level, would not be very encouraging, especially if it deteriorates further and is exploited by enemies of the revolution. For this reason, the Soviets would like to see a thorough clearing of the air between the Lebanese authorities and the resistance, as well as between the resistance and all segments of the Lebanese people. In this connection, circles close to the National Movement and the Islamic public say that the PLO wishes to restore the climate of trust between itself and the authorities and is working toward this goal. Resistance leaders have confirmed this more than once in their meetings with Lebanese parties initiated in Sidon and to be completed in Beirut. However, these sources also say that the resistance should only approach circles capable of delivering on pledges. This is because it is no longer possible to polarize the general public, with whom the resistance nearly ran into problems, and use it as an ally against everybody else, including the government.

3. The Soviet Union's conviction, based on information in its possession, that Israel may launch a military attack against south Lebanon which this time would cross the red line and reach the proximity of Saida. Such an attack would probably take place immediately before or after the American presidential elections when American desire to prevent or protest such action would be in limbo. The results of such an attack under a state of complete Lebanese reconciliation and good Lebanese-Syrian-Palestinian relations would be considerably different than under a state of continued fragmentation and explosiveness in Lebanon and a slump in relations between Lebanon, Syria and the PLO. The Soviets believe that the time is now ripe to achieve reconciliation, especially since there is presently a crisis, in their view, between Israel and members of the "Lebanese Front" who have been dealing with it.

BA'TH PARTY FORMS REGIONAL COMMAND, ANNOUNCES PROGRAM

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 3 Jul 80 p 5

[Article: "Results of Eighth Regional Congress of Ba'th Party Organization; Qansuh Announces 'Phased Political Program'; New Regional Command and Dissolution of Pan-Arab Front"]

[Text] Engineer 'Asim Qansuh, the secretary general of the Arab Ba'th Party Organization, has announced the "phased political program" approved by the eighth Regional Congress which was convened from 29 to 31 May 1980 and elected a new regional command.

Before noon, Qansuh held a press conference at the organization headquarters in the presence of the regional command members and representatives of the various parties and organizations of the National Movement.

In a long statement he read, Qansuh defined the Lebanese, Arab and international issues that have to be tackled or confronted. At the local political level, Qansuh spoke of the "active imperialist-Zionist scheme to fragment the area and to turn it into racist entities with the aim of guaranteeing Israel's racist presence, of justifying this presence, of guaranteeing continuation of the acts to plunder the Arab nation's resources and of tightening the control over this area."

At Lebanese Level

For Lebanon's unity, Qansuh called for struggle "to abolish all forms of partitionist government that are actually existing in some areas (Eastern Beirut, Kasrawan and Border Strip), to eliminate their political, military, administrative and security instruments, to urge the legitimate authority to spread its control over all the Lebanese territories and to confront all the political calls for numerous decentralized entities and for all forms of declared and concealed partition."

Qansuh has also expressed the belief that the other part of the plot is intended to "strike the Arabism of Lebanon." Qansuh has also called for "declaring the official Lebanon's abidance and all the Lebanese people's abidance by the Arabism of Lebanon, for fully confronting and Zionist enemy by virtue of his being the fateful danger to the homeland, for struggling to put an end to the Israeli occupation of a part of the south and to the false entity called the border strip and for denouncing and bringing to trial all those who deal with the enemy."

Qansuh then praised the "historic decision taken by comrade struggler Hafiz al-Asad on the entry of the Syrian Arab forces to Lebanon to put an end to the blood baths" and spoke of the success of these forces in "putting a stop to the sectarian interfighting (...), obstructing the partition, preserving Lebanon's Arabism and unity and protecting the resistance and the national and pan-Arab forces." He also pointed out that the Deferrence Force "has faced an unacceptable position because of the state's hesitant policy and because of the plotting of the forces that are tied to the Israeli enemy. This has dwarfed the role of these forces that have accepted, out of concern for the safety of Lebanon and of its people, to turn into a police solving the citizen's subsidiary problems."

Qansuh stressed the need for "Lebanon to abide by the requirements of its Arab belonging, foremost of which are participation in the Arab confrontation against the Zionist enemy, the struggle against the two Camp David accords, affirmation of Lebanon's commitments to the Palestinian cause, respect for the Palestinian resistance's right to struggle for restoration of the usurped land, entrenchment of the Palestinian-Lebanese relations on the basis of the agreements concluded between the State of Lebanon and the PLO and regulation of the distinguished relations between Lebanon and Syria in an atmosphere of trust and respect and strengthening these relations on the basis of the common pan-Arab destiny."

To fight the resettlement scheme, Qansuh said "our party believes in the struggle for:

"A national declaration signed by all the national and progressive forces and parties rejecting all forms of resettlement and condemning all of its manifestations so as to preserve the unity of the homeland's soil and people.

"A Palestinian declaration signed by all the Palestinian resistance factions rejecting and condemning all forms of resettlement and considering anybody involved in such resettlement a traitor to the pan-Arab cause and to the Palestinian cause.

"Efforts to put an end to all the security and non-security violations, to condemn their perpetrators and to bring them to trial before the Lebanese public opinion, as well as efforts for all the resistance factions' commitment to Lebanon's national destiny especially the fate of Lebanon's southern part.

"The presence of the Lebanese legitimate establishments in their various forms and with their various instruments in southern Lebanon, facilitating the work of these establishments and helping them to carry out their national and social duties.

"Condemnation of any action giving the impression that a substitute to the Lebanese legitimate authority is established in the south and bringing to trial the perpetrators of such actions on the charge of national treason.

"Considering the plotting forces as forces colluding in the resettlement plan as long as they work to establish areas under the control of the terror of their armed militias because this action prevents the Lebanese authority from performing its role and aims at weakening and toppling this authority so as to pass all the schemes for dividing Lebanon into sectarian and racist mini-states."

Government and Army

Qansuh said that to develop the government, the Ba'th Party "will abide by the democratic political struggle to develop Lebanon and to put an end to the various forms of factional and sectarian domination and armed control by any faction or sect, to realize democratic participation in government, to amend the parliamentary elections law so as to strike the sectarian representation formula, to secure the necessary balance between the authorities and to preserve the democratic liberties and guarantee their continuation."

As for building the Lebanese army, what is required is "a complete national plan emanating from the adoption of a clear national defense policy (...), the formulation of mobilizational and educational programs to develop the national sentiment and the sense of national and cultural belonging to the Arab nation (...), striking the imported programs, applying the national service law to all the Lebanese, creating formulas that serve to link the army with the national destiny of the Arab nation, adopting an armament policy on the basis of the national and pan-Arab interest, carrying out the military plans and training on the use of weapons with the Arab armies, especially the Syrian army, and strengthening, developing and increasing the numbers of the internal security forces."

Frontal (al-jabhawi] Action

After a historical review of the party's action, Qansuh demanded "a progressive national front that determines the tasks of the current phase" and that has "a unified and united political visualization, independent national decision and a sound popular course" and that focuses on "Lebanon's Arabism and the unity of its territories, strengthening the struggle against world imperialism, led by the United States and that has a program for a comprehensive confrontation against Arab reaction and supports the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front." Qansuh has urged "all the forces that stand in the confrontation and combat trench against the racist fascist forces, represented in the Phalanges and Liberal Parties," to join this front.

Social and Development Sphere

In the social and development sphere, the party has demanded the right of work for all and has called for dealing with the problems of education and school fees, for creating work opportunities for women in order to bolster their freedom, for supporting the productive economic sectors and for realizing the principles of social and developmental harmony so as to help the more backward areas. Economically, the attention has been focused on opposing "the domination of foreign capital, forcing the foreign banks to invest a part of their capital and deposits in the country protecting the national economy against the infiltration of foreign capital, establishing a fair lending policy for the productive economic sectors, struggling against the open-door policy represented in the free economy, enhancing the public sector's role in the foreign trade and demanding that the state take advantage of the socialist camp markets."

At the Arab level, Qansuh has attacked the two Camp David accords and has called for the establishment of "the broadest Arab front of the Arab liberation movement's factions within the framework of the Arab People's Congress and its Permanent Secretariat, supporting the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front, supporting Syria's steadfastness and considering Syria the first bastion of steadfastness in the face of Zionist aggression, supporting the struggle of the Arab masses in Egypt, led by the Egyptian National Front, bolstering the steadfastness of our people in the occupied territories and considering the PLO the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, supporting our people in Oman against the regime of Qabus, supporting the Eritrean revolution, condemning the suspect movements of some Arab regimes that are trying to outflank the Baghdad resolutions, especially the Iraqi regime, struggling for the reunification of the two parts of Yemen, supporting the Libyan Jamahiriyah, condemning Arab reaction and uniting the Palestinian resistance factions."

At International Level

At the international level, what is required is to "strengthen the relations between the Arab progressive organizations and parties and the progressive communist parties in the world, enhance the Arab nation's relations with the socialist bloc countries, led by the Soviet Union, confront all forms of the U.S. imperialist aggression against our nation, support the oppressed peoples and the world liberation movements, support the struggle of the Islamic revolution in Iran and condemn the U.S. intervention attempts, support the Afghan revolution and condemn the Pakistani-U.S.-Arab reactionary aggression against this revolution, support the Soviet backing of the Afghan people and condemn the European initiative seeking to give Camp David a new form that can be passed against the interests of our Arab nation."

New Command

The statement concluded by declaring the names of the organization's new regional command which is comprised of: 'Asim Qansuh, 'Abdallah al-Amin,

'Abd-al-Amir 'Abbas, Nimr Haydar Ahmad, 'Abdallah al-Shahhal, 'Ali Miqdad, Suhayl al-Qassar, Habib Daghir, Asad Suwayd, Haydar Hawmani, Dr Muhammad Shari, Muhammad 'Ali Qansuh, Dr 'Abd-al-Amir Dakrub and 'Umar "Umar.

Dissolution of Pan-Arab [al-qawniyah] Front

At the end of the conference, Qansuh was asked about the fate of the Pan-Arab Front after the Ba'th Party Organization's departure from it. He said: "When the sphere of national action becomes broader, more comprehensive and clearer--and this has characterized the local, Arab and international political line of the National Movement--then all the national and progressive forces should assume their role in the national movement. It must be pointed out here that one of our allies has taken stances that cannot be approved by the national or Islamic principles and that this ally has become in an unenviable position. Therefore, it has been better to solve the Pan-Arab Front after our departure from it and we are declaring here the dissolution of this front. As for our colleagues in the National Confrontation Front, we are in constant contact and alliance with them through this front's chairman, Minister Talal al-Mar'ibi."

TRADE DELEGATION'S TRIP TO EAST EUROPE DISCUSSED

Beirut AL-NIDA' in Arabic 5 Jul 80 p 4

[Article: "Delegation of Lebanese Chambers of Commerce and Industry Assesses Trip to Eastern Bloc Countries; Increasing Imports; Lebanese Production Weeks"]

[Text] The delegation of the Lebanese chambers of commerce and industry to the meetings of the joint chambers of the eastern bloc countries has made an assessment of the outcome of its trip to Hungary, the GDR and Poland.

The chairmen of the Lebanese chambers have asserted that the results of the trip have been positive and that the eastern side has expressed its understanding of all the issues brought up at the meetings by the Arab side and has promised to eliminate the causes of all complaints and to exert efforts to bolster economic cooperation between the eastern bloc and the Arab countries.

The chairmen of the chambers have also pointed out that the Lebanese delegation drew up the attention of the eastern side to the deficit which the Lebanese trade balance with the eastern bloc suffers and demanded that these countries' imports from Lebanon be increased in order to realize as much balance as possible in trade exchange.

The Lebanese delegation also urged the increased organization of joint fairs, the sending of delegations to Lebanon and the Arab area in view of the effect of such visits on the growth and enhancement of trade, on strengthening the relations and on familiarization with products.

During the meetings, the discussion dealt with organizing Lebanese weeks in the eastern bloc countries to introduce the Lebanese production and sell it to the eastern consumer. This idea has been welcomed and supported in principle by the four [sic] countries visited by the delegation. It has also been decided to continue the discussions with these countries' officials to crystallize and carry out this idea.

The chairmen of the chambers have further pointed out that the discussion with the joint chambers also focused on the issue of setting up joint projects in the sphere of tourism and industry and that the eastern side has expressed its full readiness to discuss the details of setting up such projects which are beneficial to both sides.

The Lebanese side also brought up the issue of supplying technical and technological expertise and of training Arab manpower, especially since there are numerous spheres in which this expertise is needed. The eastern side has expressed its readiness to offer such expertise and to exert efforts to bolster economic cooperation with Lebanon and the Arab countries in the various spheres.

The meeting [sic] was attended by 'Adnan al-Qassar, Gabriel Badaru, Muhammad Lama' (Beirut chamber), Najib al-Manla and Joseph Bulus (Tripoli chamber), and Alfred Skaf (Zahlah chamber).

The meeting was also attended by Dr Ilyas Ghantus, the assistant secretary general of the General Federation of the Arab Chambers of Commerce.

RENTAL EXEMPTIONS FOR MILITARY--The parliamentary management justice, finance, public works and defense committees approved yesterday decree No 2909 which provides for exempting the military personnel of the army, the internal security forces and the public security forces from the municipal fees paid on house rents for the year 1978 and the preceding years. The committees held their joint session yesterday morning under Munir Abu-Fadil, the deputy speaker of the Chamber of Deputies. The session was attended by deputies Shafiq Badr, 'Abduh 'Uwaydat, 'Ali al-'Abdallah, 'Abd-al-Latif Baydun, Salim al-Ma'luf, Mahmud 'Ammar, Tawfiq 'Assaf, Michel Ma'luli, Bashir al-A'war, Salim al-Dawud, Sam'an al-Duwayhi and Subhi Yaghi. It was also attended by Dr 'Ali al-Khalil, the minister of finance. After the session, Abu-Fadil said: "In view of the fact that the ministers concerned, with the exception of the minister of finance, have not attended the session and in accordance with the decision of the committees not to study any bill in the absence of the minister concerned, the discussion on the bills before the committees has been postponed." The decree approved by the committees states the following: "Article 1. The military personnel of the army, the internal security forces and the public security forces have been exempted from the municipal fees paid on housing rent for 1978 and the preceding years. The exemption applies to those members who were in the active service on the given date. Fees already paid may not be reimbursed. Article 2. This law shall go into force upon its publication in the Official Gazette. [Text] [Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 1 Jul 80 p 6] 8494

PROMOTION OF ARMY OFFICERS--Decree No 3195 was issued yesterday promoting Brig Gen Dr Jirjis Yusuf Qumayr, chairman of the Military Hospital, to the rank of major general as of the beginning of July 1980. Issued also was decree No 3196 which provides for promoting 15 first lieutenants in the army to the rank of captain and 18 lieutenants to the rank of first lieutenant as of the beginning of July 1980. The first lieutenants promoted to the rank of captain are: Nabil Wakim, Kamal Rashid, Habib Buraydi, Hasan al-Qurq, Tony Gharib, Edmund al-Khuri, Bashir Nashshabah, Fu'ad Mukanna, Majid Shams, Salim Karam, Durayd al-Kanj, Najib Sallum, Sami 'Abdallah, Khalil Habballah and Ghassan Karam. The following lieutenants have been promoted to the rank of first lieutenant: 'Abd-al-Qadir al-'Aris, Antoine Haddad, Yasir al-Khatib, Emile Hanna, 'Ali Kammal,

Hanna al-Maqdisi, Ghassan Khalifah, Ramzi al-Ayyubi, Muhammad Shabbu, Nasif 'Ubayd, Ibrahim Ghantus, Mustafa Hamdan, Fawzi Subayti, Radwan al-Khayr, As'ad Haddad, Muhammad Baydun, Michel al-Hashim and Hasan Jabir. As for the decree to promote officers with the rank of captain and above, it is still frozen until a decision is made on the problems involving it--problems that have caused Prime Minister Dr Salim al-Huss to refrain from signing it since December 1979. This has caused the promotions of nearly 200 officers to be frozen. [Text] [Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 3 Jul 80 p 6] 8494

FIRST ISLAMIC LAW SENTENCES TO BE EXECUTED ON 19 SEPTEMBER

AB181529 Nouakchott Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Excerpts] An editorial of the MAURITANIAN NEWS AGENCY has officially announced that the execution of the first sentences passed by the special criminal court whose verdicts are based on the Sharia [Islamic] Law will take place tomorrow. Concerning the practical organization of the executions, the Nouakchott District Council will place at the disposal of the inhabitants of the capital and the surrounding districts a number of vehicles which will, as of 0700, insure their transportation to the place of the execution situated some 2 kilometers from the town opposite the radio transmitting station [few words indistinct].

The execution of the sentences will begin at 0900. A murderer will be shot, while several persons guilty of theft will have one hand amputated. A tent will be erected for this purpose and after the operation, those amputated will have to raise the arm before the public on coming out of the tent.

The national press has interviewed the deputy governor of Nouakchott District, Mr (Hamoud Ould Bou), and Mr (Mohamed Tabana), judge of the fifth city ward and member of the special criminal court. Concerning the organization of the executions, the deputy governor explained that the chairman of the Military Committee of National Salvation and head of state and government, Lt Col Khouna Ould Haydala, has approved the execution of the verdicts which, as we have already said, concern cases of murder and theft.

For his part, Judge (Mohamed Tabana) recalled that Islamic law, and especially the Maliki rite, stipulates that a person guilty of deliberate murder must be killed in the same manner in which he committed his crime, but that one is allowed to execute the sentence with a sword. However, with the consent of the head of state, the special criminal court has specified the use of the gun in carrying out death sentences.

CROWN PRINCE DISCUSSES YOUTH AFFAIRS, PROSPECTS

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 29 Jun 80 p 3

/Article by Turki Nasir al-Sudayri: "Crown Prince, in the First Comprehensive Talk about Youth Affairs: My View of Youth Today Is Filled with Optimism and Regard for Youthful Powers"/

/Text/ What is new in this conversation in that it is new of its kind. We wished to remove it from the various issues of politics, domestic and foreign, so that we could devote ourselves to talk about young people in their various groups and the government's programs for caring for them and guiding them. His Royal Highness Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz, the crown prince and deputy prime minister, is also the chairman of the Supreme Youth Care Council, in addition to the other sectors his highness supervises directly or through his leadership position in the regime, concerning education, culture, and youth care.

Therefore the conversation with his highness was replete with everything one could discuss on our young people today and the government's programs to develop the various youth care sectors, as his highness was kind enough to answer all AL-RIYAD's questions in this conversation, which is to be considered his highness' first comprehensive one regarding youth issues and youth care programs.

Here is the text of his highness' interview:

Optimism and High Regard for Our Youth

/Question/ How does your highness view the situation of our young people today?

/Answer/ Our view of the young is filled with optimism and regard for the youthful powers which have established their full qualifications for bearing responsibilities and effectively participating in building a great nation.

With my faith in the youthful capacities which have proved their worth in serving the nation, I aspire to more activity from the young, in order that they may attain knowledge and be furnished with qualifications which will be adequate for the requirements of the age. The awakening resurgence in their country requires their minds and arms so that they may fill every vacuum and become specialized in every branch of knowledge and labor and achieve our hope that their nation will be built through their youthful arms.

Our Faith Is the True Armor

/Question/ Many various currents and ideologies are surrounding our society, especially those which are contrary or hostile to our faith. How can one immunize our youth against them, now that they have started to open out toward the world in various ways, including travel and contact with Western societies, reading and the influence of various media?

/Answer/ There is no dispute that today is not like yesterday. The well-developed areas have come closer and means of communication, as well as the media, which are developed, have contributed to a large extent in influencing societies with what is going on in other societies. However, this does not make us lose sleep with anxiety over the young people of our country. They have a true armor which will guarantee that any weapon aimed at them is crushed, an armor which is represented by our tolerant faith, in which there are teachings and strength which go beyond the greatest of deviations and the methods of those who embrace and propagate them. Faith in God complemented by useful knowledge through God's strength and power, are able to immunize our young people against every heretic and destroyer.

There are living examples before us in the current reality we are experiencing. The youth of our country have attained maximum refinement and many have lived in societies which are alien to them, seeking knowledge and learning, and have returned more firm and committed to their genuine religion and the lofty customs and traditions of their society. When the home and the school cooperate and a child is brought up between both replete with faith, then it is very difficult if not impossible for him to be influenced by currents and laws which man has set forth to combat the revelations of the great creator. Here the responsibility is jointly that of all,starting with the home, the mosque, the school and the university. When the mare is proper its brood must be good.

We Are Anxious To Provide All Means for Youth Care

/Question/ What are the Supreme Youth Care Council's plans and programs to raise the athletic level so that it will complete development programs in the cultural and pedagogical sectors?

/Answer/ It gladdens us to see various youth care activities proceeding successfully and with increasing development from the standpoints of quality and quantity, without having the success of one occur at the expense of another. As the athletic services offered to the youth of our country are progressing grom good to better, in a proper, palpable manner, the cultural, pedagogical and social services provided for them are also developing and achieving a great deal of success. This is the general youth care plan and we are anxious to provide all the means to guarantee that it realizes its goals.

The Activity of Feet and the Activity of Heads

/Question/ It is observed that sports influence the tendencies and concerns of young people in our country to a large degree, diverting them from all other cultural interests. Why are there no cultural plans within this trend, in the sense that sporting clubs could play an effective role which is not just confined to athletics? The same goes for athletic festivals and celebrations.

/Answer/ We believe that there is much that responds to these queries in our previous answer. Nonetheless, we are requesting athletic clubs to increase attention to non-athletic activities. There is no doubt that literary clubs play a great role in this sphere but we do not consider it appropriate to content ourselves with what literary clubs are doing. The notion of introducing cultural activities into the sporting clubs themselves has been raised and in my opinion is worthy of study and attention, because it has been observed that young people are not sufficiently receptive to the literary clubs. It is necessary to think about shifting cultural activity into athletic clubs, because we do not just want people's feet to be active, or just people's heads. Building a nation comes about through the mind and the body together, and both must be sound, proper and active. In my view it is necessary to think of creating different types of combinations of youth care activities.

On introducing National Education Curricula

/Question/ Our young people--I mean many of them, not young people in general--lack national feeling in many of their activities inside and outside the country, in fact abroad in particular. That is embodied in much conduct which harms our reputation, in their conduct inside the country, in front of foreigners who come here, and in addition there is a deficiency in their sense of active participation in our struggle for development. Aren't there programs to introduce national education courses, in some form, into the educational curricula?

/Answer/ Unfortunately there is some exaggeration in what you have mentioned. Feeling of citizenship in its loftiest sense is present among the young people of our country and their participation in the struggle for development is good and clear. As for deviant individual conduct, that is not a criterion. Our hopes are great that our young people will continue as they have been, the best representative of the Saudi citizen, people who are proud of their genuine roots and high morality in every place and time inside and outside the country. As for the insertion of new courses into the curricula, studies on this subject have not stopped, and all matters that serve the public interest are being carried out.

Concentrated Studies To Develop the Curricula

/Question/ The preceding question leads us to subordinate ones:

First, on the state of our curricula, which are now considered very defici ent in keeping abreast of our developmental aspirations.

Second, the draft system, which is part of the national education system.

I would like to receive a clarification from your generous highness on these two issues.

/Answer/ The process of development in our country is progressing, thank God, with speed and stability in all fields. Development requires constant change so that the general situation can keep abreast of the process of development and not be an obstacle to it. Therefore, thinking and planning have not stopped at all, and this applies to education and the curricula. This subject enjoys the exceptional attention of the highest levels in the government, research and studies on it are intense, and change will occur in a manner corresponding to the results of this research and these studies in order that the cirricula and educational methods selected will be among the best and most suitable.

Early Response to the Draft System

As regards the draft system, we have talked a great deal about it and the statute bearing on it will have all the details and data responding to the questions which might be in young people's minds. Here we are anxious to praise the great early response which we have felt among the young people from the first moment the idea was announced, and we hope that its implementation will contain the ingredients for realizing the interests of the young and the nation.

Skilled Technical Personnel--an Urgent Matter

/Question/ The presence of foreigners and people coming in to the country who participate with us in construction now is being observed in development programs and conversely our young people are absent from the fields of government and domestic activity, especially vocational activities, preferring to relax and rely on revenues which do not require production in various areas of investment. How does your highness view this situation?

/Answer/ As we have stated above, the great process of resurgence which the kingdom is passing through requires intense manpower to implant various projects, and that entails recourse to non-Saudi capabilities to meet the deficit. The role of our young people in this sphere is clear and conspicuous and there is a receptivity to vocational and technical training which bodes well, with God's permission, giving proof of the consciousness the young people of this good country enjoy. We hope that receptivity to this type will increase; the need for it is growing intensely, as the days pass, especially following the construction expansion. What is felt is that skilled specialized technical personnel are very much needed and the future of this type of education will be good, God willing.

Journalists Are the Object of the Government's Attention in Guaranteeing Their Rights and Appreciating Their Work

/Question/ May your generous highness permit us to ask about a group of young people who are assuming their national responsibilities of building the identity of this nation in a field which has exceptional importance and grave responsibilities, but are not being allotted any privileges in exchange for their difficult tasks? They are your children the journalists, and there are no statutes to reward their efforts and the problems they face in their work, either work or social insurance statutes, as is the lot of any ordinary worker or employee in a company. This certainly does not benefit them, except in the case of work disability or death; during their presence on the job, they have nothing but their salaries, which sometimes are much lower than the wages and salaries of company workers and employees.

The question is, how does the government now view the status of our press? Consequently, are there plans to support press organizations and encourage journalists with material and moral incentives which will entice them to exercise their responsibilities with greater desire and passionate enthusiasm?

/Answer/ The government is anxious to look after its people in every sphere, and those working in the area of journalism have been and still are the object of attention. Direct directives have been issued by the Ministry of Information to press organizations to issue an organizational schedule of their employees, noting down their rights and showing their duties. Some organizations have completed this and have conveyed the schedule to the Ministry of Information. From the general standpoint, study of the status of the press and journalists in general is continuing in a good, profound fashion, encompassing all existing subjects in the field of the press now, and sudden matters which might come up. What is important is that we are anxious that this serious study will bear fruit to guarantee that the rights of journalists are preserved, their work is appreciated and their future is guaranteed.

NEW AGRICULTURAL WELLS--The great al-Washm water project is among the giant projects which our righteous government, represented by the Ministry of Agriculture and Water, is implementing. This massive project will supply the towns of Shaqra', Marrat, Ushayqir, al-Qara'in, Ghasalah, Uthaythiyah, Tharmada' and some palaces and farms lying on the road. The Ministry of Agriculture, in its implementation of this project, has graciously realized the hopes which have long been aimed at by the citizens of these towns and every citizen in these towns gives thanks to all the workers who exerted efforts to bring the project into being and carry it out. In another area, the second part of the project has been assigned; that is the drilling of five artesian wells, which was assigned to the 'Abdallah al-Kharif Sons Company on 27 April 1980 for a contract with an estimated value of 3,971,180 riyals. Implementation of this project will take 8 months. The anticipated producibility of each well has been set at about 300 gallons per minute and the total anticipated depth is 450 meters. These wells lie at the end of the road passing from the al-Hijaz Road to the al-Qusaym Road, passing through al-'Asilah; these wells will lie on the right-hand side of the road. From these wells, the abovementioned towns will be supplied with potable water in adequate quantities. The contracting company is continuing the extension of its activity of laying pipes in streets and connecting them to homes. May God make those carrying out this project, foremost among them the minister of agriculture, succeed in what is good for the country and the citizens. /Text/ /Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 14 Jun 80 p 2/

ABQAIQ FIELD STUDY- An agreement has been signed by the Ministry of Oil and Mineral Resources in Dhahran with the Intercomp consulting engineering firm to conduct a detailed geological and engineering study of the Arab D zone in the Abqaiq field. This field was discovered in 1940, production in it began in 1946 and its current rate of production is 650,000 barrels a day of light oil. The agreement, whose value comes to $2.9 million, requires the company to conduct a comprehensive survey of the Abqaiq field and determine its characteristics and features in detail in order to determine the most suitable plans for producing and preserving its oil reserves. This project is considered the early part of the Oil Ministry's work in third 5-year plan, which is aimed at preserving oil resources, constantly evaluating oilfields and determining the best ways of operating them to conserve natural resources. /Text/ /Riyadh AL-YAMAMAH in Arabic 20 Jun 80 p 8/

RAILWAY PLANS--His Excellency Shaykh Faysal al-Shuhayl, general director of the Railway Organization in the Eastern Province, has announced that 4,499,000,000 riyals have been allocated to railway projects in the third 5-year plan. He went on to say that the organization's budget for the new fiscal year totalled 780 million riyals, to enable it to carry out the projects it is implementing. Shaykh al-Shuhayl said that among the authority's projects there is one to construct a direct rail line connecting al-Dammam to Riyadh by way of Khurays. A project to renovate the existing track is currently under construction; about 250 kilometers have been completed, the remaining 300 kilometers of track will be done in the next 2 years and the project will cost 450 million riyals. /Text/ /Riyadh AL-YAMAMAH in Arabic 20 Jun 80 p 8/ 11887

FOREIGN MINISTER GIVES COMPREHENSIVE DESCRIPTION OF POLICIES

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 16 Jun 80 pp 8, 9

/Article by Muwaffaq Madani: "A Comprehensive Conversation Extending from Reconciliation in Lebanon to Strategic Balance with Israel: 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam to AL-SAFIR: We Are Not an Alternative to Any Party in Lebanon"/

/Text/ A conversation with a competent, experienced politician like 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam is enjoyable and difficult.

Enjoyable because the man has presence of mind and well organized thoughts and is always ready for any question; difficult in the professional sense for the same reasons: you cannot "trap" him or entice him into saying what he does not want to say.

In any event, in this conversation with AL-SAFIR, which went on for more than 2 hours, a great deal concerning Lebanon and the political parties struggling there along the road to national reconciliation, the Palestinian resistance, the political directives which govern its base and command, Europe, and its "initiative" which ended dramatically at the hands of its allies the Americans.

The deputy prime minister and foreign minister of Syria was specific in his answers and precise in his choice of words, especially as regards the position on specific parties in Lebanon, from the government, the Phalange Party, President Chamoun and the Amal movement, up to President Franjiyah and the nature of relations between him and Syria.

It is true that Khaddam recognized that the chances of the "cabinet of activities," or "the political cabinet" as he prefers to call it, are no better than 33 percent, but, like President Sarkis, he considers that it is a try which merits some effort. If it is successful, that is good, and if not it will be of use in determining the positions of those who will be opposing its establishment in the future.

In the estimate of one of the major engineers of Syrian policy in Lebanon, and one of the most prominent persons in charge of carrying it out, the complication of the situation in Lebanon is represented by the issue of dealing with Israel. If a solution is found to this matter, it will be possible to enter into the core of the requisite, desired solution to the Palestinian problem.

Thus the complication is not a "Maronite one," as some like to call it in Lebanon, but a complication with Arab dimensions, and Syria therefore considers that it is concerned with it and with the means for solving it. The matter is not one of a tribal reconciliation between President Franjiyah and the Phalange Party or the al-Jumayyil family, but is a sign of a trend whose direct effects go beyond Lebanon and affect Syria, the Palestinians and the other Arabs.

This is as regards Lebanon; regarding Syria and its domestic situation, Khaddam said that what preoccupies its leaders now is the attainment of a stragegic balance with Israel, that is, so that Syria will be able to confront probable Israel aggression alone and crush it. This subject will be the basis of relations with "Arab brethren" (outside the perseverance front). Those who support Syria and stand alongside it on this subject are those who stress through their position that they are against Israel, al-Sadat, Camp David and the plans for American dominance; those who are silent resemble those who openly declare their allegiance to Camp David.

Therefore, Khaddam views the European summit in Venice and what issued from it as a mere rejuvenation of Camp David and he calls on the Arab brethren to "bring down the fantasies on political settlement for once and for all."

In any event, Khaddam's statements here are those of a "statesman" more than anything else; therefore composure and balance govern him, although he is not lacking in clarity.

This is the text of the conversation.

Syria and the Reconciliation

We began our conversation with 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam on where relations now "stand" between Lebanon and Syria. We asked him, "It is being bruited about in Beirut that Syria's position on the issue of reconciliation is unclear, especially from the standpoint of details, outside the context of desires, and that your visit to Ba'abda did not clarify what has been concealed. What exactly is your position on reconciliation?"

'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam said,

"I do not know why some people consider that our position is unclear. However, I do know that it is not Syria's place to talk about details or participate in them. By virtue of the nature of relations between the two countries, by virtue of Syrian contribution to the deterrent forces, and by virtue of the national responsibilities which Syria has taken on its shoulders, Syrian can contribute general directives, not detailed ones, because details of this kind continue to possess characteristics which concern the Lebanese parties themselves. In our discussions with our Lebanese brothers, especially with his excellency President Sarkis, Premier Salim al-Huss and Minister Fu'ad Butrus, the talk focused on principles and bases which can be relied on an a prelude to the process of national reconciliation, proceeding from the premise that reconciliation is the safest prelude first to restoring matters to their natural state in Lebanon and second to constituting a political front comprising all forces in Lebanon and standing up to the Israeli enemy.

"That is, reconciliation must achieve two objectives:

"The first objective is domestic and Lebanese: to protect the legitimacy, strengthen national unity in the country, and the phenomena of discord on the Lebanese scene, which are draining and fragmenting the government, and re-establish the identity and sovereignty of the state.

"The second objective is national and bears on the confrontation with Israel and the need to orient oneself toward that confrontation. If there is a domestic element and Lebanese domestic unity, as well as a national element; the stand on Israel."

A Front against Israel

/Question/ Is it possible to state how, in practice, one can establish a political front to organize the various Lebanese parties, in your opinion!

/Answer/ By front I do not mean political tactics or a political front in the sense that is used; I mean that the Lebanese people should be in a united front against Israeli aggression because Israel is not just now aiming at parts of the Lebanese territory but is aiming at all Lebanon.

/Question/ Could one consider the principles which President Sarkis set forth as a basis for establishing this front?

/Answer/ Yes. What President Sarkis set out is to be considered a proper basis and a common denominator which could serve as a prelude and a base for commitment to the course of national reconciliation.

/Question/ However, most Lebanese parties consider the format which the regime has set forth to be merely obvious points and they are asking for a clear specific working plan which will be a basis for the implementation of these principles and for the attainment of reconciliation.

/Answer/ It is correct that what President Sarkis is setting out are obvious points, but what the Lebanese actually need is agreement on these obvious points. If all the Lebanese agreed on the obvious points, the situation which exists now would not exist.

Consultations and after /Question/ Do you believe that the consultations President Sarkis held lately can provide us with the domestic front you are talking about?

/Answer/ There is a difference between a domestic front which has been formed and the fact that specific political parties have set out on the road. If you want to ascertain my personal opinion, I do not believe that these consultations have now achieved the desired results; rather, the goal is to achieve these results, and this will require the cooperation of all parties and their serious real commitment to the process of reconciliation and to the principles set forth. It is not desired just that one declare a political or media position, but also that one act in practice.

By the nature of the case, this program must pass through numerous stages, one of them, indeed the first, being these parties' serious commitment to principles, to matters which are taken for granted, and these parties' shift under the umbrella of the Lebanese state toward the promulgation of a tentative practical program to bring these principles about.

Toward a Political Cabinet

/Question/ Do you believe that it will be in the power of the cabinet formed in the light of these consultations to attain a stage in setting this program out?

/Answer/ In reality, our opinion now is the same as that which we previously declared in various circumstances in the past, namely that a political cabinet is necessary in Lebanon, that is, a cabinet which will combine the parties to the struggle and combine the interests of Lebanon and the interests of the Arab nation, since Lebanon is part of this nation.

However, it seems that there have been obstacles in the way of formation of such a cabinet. A cabinet of technicians was formed first, then a cabinet of technicians supplied with politicians. It seems that need has become urgently conspicuous to form a political cabinet.

/Question/ There is a belief in Lebanon that your position regarding the formation of a cabinet of "political" activities is unclear; would you like a cabinet of activities, or do you hold to a different format?

/Answer/ There are two formats for action in Lebanon. The first is for the government to take the initiative of adopting a decision, in accordance with its notions, set forth an action program, and impose this program on everyone, using the power available to it to do this. This is one solution and one method.

The other method is for the combatants to come under the umbrella of the government, set out a program and strive to carry it out.

Either solution has its negative and positive aspects, and neither solution will be adopted in isolation from existing circumstances.

/Question/ Now what do you advise, the first solution or the second one?

/Answer/ As I said, each solution has its circumstances. In the past phase, the first solution might have been better, but now new elements have become significant and what was valid in one phase may not be valid in another one.

Dealing with Israel

/Question/ Regarding a cabinet of people combating with one another, or what we in Lebanon call fighting one another, problems exist among the parties, and the consultations the president made did not eliminate them. Therefore the matter of forming a cabinet of people fighting one another seems difficult now.

/Answer/ In my view, through the contacts and discussions I held with a large number of our brethren in Lebanon, the main issue, or the main obstacle, is the subject of dealing with Israel and the position on that.

If this problem ends and clear, practical measures are adopted toward it, I do not believe that serious dispute will remain among the parties concerned, especially if the desire to achieve reconciliation is real.

/Question/ Some parties say that the Syrian position on the manner of settling the issue of dealing with Israel is not sufficiently clear and claim that they are awaiting clarification from you in order to specify their final position.

'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam said decisively, "Our position is clear,we have declared it many times. What is necessary is that these dealings in all their forms and types be eliminated and that a decisive position on them be adopted."

The Statement and the President's Role

/Question/ It has been said that you recently demanded or pointed out that an official statement should be issued on parties accused of dealing with Israel in which the areas where they do deal with Israel are spelled out. This has not yet happened.

In fact, a lead editorial appeared in the newspaper AL-'AMAL recently referring to this point, considering it an attempt to cause a rift between you and the Phalange. In the political information being passed around in Beirut, this type of statement has actually been written and presented to you. What is the truth?

/Answer/ No, it has not been presented to us. What has been presented to us are formulas or notions of recommendations which are supposed to appear, in the event of a reconciliation, in the form of statements, information or the like.

In any event, the subject of dealing with Israel must end in a clear, specific fashion, without ambiguity, and this ending must be announced and certain, but how? This is an issue which can be discussed between President Sarkis, considering that he is leading the process of reconciliation, and the parties directly concerned with the problem of reconciliation.

The Maronite Complication

/Question/ It is stated in Beirut that President Sarkis is relying on you, as the support for the process of reconciliation, in eliminating the Maronite complication.

/Answer/ Since the first moment Syria has been claiming that national reconciliation among Lebanese is necessary, and when there is reconciliation among them, Syria will not be able to be an alternative to any group nor will it arrogate to itself the right to play the role of any group. However, it can help through its brotherly relations and gracious efforts. This is what we are doing, and we believe that ending the Lebanese problem is something which will help us get greater powers in motion against the main scheme, represented by the Camp David policy, and against the conspiracy which is threatening to liquidate the Palestinian cause.

/Question/ Is it possible to cast clear, penetrating light on the dimensions of the Syrian-Phalange dialogue and the effects that imposes on the course of reconciliation?

/Answer/ In reality, there is no dialogue in the meaning of the word. "Dialogue" is an imprecise term. However, there are contacts, in the sense that we have not yet attained a dialogue and consequently there are no specific issues for discussion in front of us. There are contacts, as I said; these contacts were made and announced at their time.

/Question/ Is there a possibility that these contacts will be realized and will result in dialogue?

/Answer/ Yes--that is, as far as we are concerned, there is no absolute yes or absolute no.

/Question/ So there is a yes in Abu 'Ammar's fashion. What do you expect specifically from the Phalange in the course of this dialogue?

/Answer/ First we expect support for the legitimacy and acceptance of the existence and the sovereignty of the state, and an effort to liquidate all pockets which have dealt with or are dealing with Israel and the termination of these dealings, and we expect it, as I said, to help the state regain its sovereignty.

Chamoun and the Surprise of the Allies

/Question/ Are there corresponding contacts with President Camille Chamoun, on grounds that he is an ally of the Phalange?

/Answer/ From time to time, some politicians from Lebanon come to us bringing President Chamoun's thoughts.

We told 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam:

"Let us speak more bluntly. Some of your allies in Lebanon say that the Syrian-Phalange dialogue was a surprise to them and created confusion in their positions, especially since this dialogue would reshuffle the cards in Lebanon. Is it possible to explain and interpret what the consequences of the Syrian-Phalange dialogue will be?"

The "permanent" deputy prime minister and foreign minister of Syria replied by saying,

"I can state, first, that we have not surprised anyone. In all the contacts we have held with the Phalange, we have kept others informed about what went on.

/Question/ But it has stirred up doubts.

/Answer/ The other point is that Syria's policy is not open to public auction where one party can accept it or another one reject it. Syria has a clear political and national path and it exercises political activity in the light of that path.

When we say we want a reconciliation in Lebanon, this reconciliation will not be with one group but with all conflicting parties, regardless of our opinion about those parties and their policies and practices. However, we must provide all the circumstances to build smooth national ground for the reconciliation process. When we can attract all these parties to this ground, we will have contributed to achieving a great domestic act and a great national act in Lebanon.

Most frankly and objectively, I state that we cannot talk about a national reconciliation while political parties remain outside this reconciliation. We must act to bring these parties into the arena of reconciliation and eliminate all the causes preventing them from getting into this arena.

If we can do that, that will be good. If we cannot, we will have made an effort on behalf of the good.

I do not believe that anyone has doubts about our policy, because this policy is based on clear, specific traditions, principles, experience and practice. I would like to be blunt and say that our contact with any Lebanese group absolutely do not affect our relations with any other party and does not mean that we are exchanging our friendship and relations with one group for another.

The tentative goal before us is how to go about closing the Lebanese file so that we may be more capable of moving to confront what is being drawn up in the Palestinian file.

/Question/ Taking the Phalange Party, specifically, and the various stages Lebanon has passed through and is passing through now, could we have an idea of your evaluation of this party as a political phenomenon which exists in Lebanon?

That is, if we take the issue of dealing with Israel, for example, are these dealings part of Phalange policy or are they a new policy for this party?

'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam said,

"The axis of discussion is to arrive at a reconciliation in Lebanon. As I have said, there are parties. Regardless of our opinion on these parties, or their political path and political movement, Lebanon's interest is to provide a climate for the reconciliation to take place on smooth ground. Consequently, helping parties eliminate obstacles, whether those obstacles lie in the parties' constitution or in their policies, or in the constitution and policies of others, will be aimed at arriving at this goal.

"We by nature of the case always hope that no Arab citizen will have relations with Israel and that no Arab citizen will be implicated in dealing with Israel, because dealing with Israel is against the soul, is against the country, and is against the nation."

On Franjiyah and the Phalange

/Question/ Let us go back to the point on the Maronite complication. How can one arrange political relations between President Sulayman Franjiyah and the Phalange Party in order to facilitate a reconciliation in isolation from the circumstances of either, considering that Franjiyah is one of your most prominent friends in Lebanon?

/Answer/ President Franjiyah, a beloved and honored friend of the Syrian leaders, is a nationalist and a man with a good domestic and national past. Our relationship with him was not established after he assumed the presidency but is much older than that. Franjiyah the man has borne much pain for the sake of the political path he was presented, especially in confronting dealings with Israel, and consequently our relationship and friendship with Franjiyah are permanent and solid.

As to how to solve what you have called the Maronite complication, or "the difference between President Franjiyah and the Phalange," we are not concerned with that matter; it concerns the parties directly.

/Question/ It is said that Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus, on his latest visit to you, asked you to help the regime in Lebanon solve this problem.

Khaddam replied tersely,

"We didn't discuss this matter."

He then turned to us, smiling in a manner which indicated that he would say no more; we had to discuss another subject, and asked him:

Amal and the National Movement

/Question/ Let us talk about the latest meeting, which included representatives of the Amal movement, the Palestine resistance and the Lebanese National Movement, which took place under your sponsorship. What is your concept of the developments of the situation and the dimensions of this meeting, in terms of the relations among the parties you met here?

/Answer/ Our opinion was clear when the unfortunate dispute occurred; in brief, that is that this dispute would affect the domestic ranks.

I state with all frankness and objectivity that according to the information which was available to us at that time we concluded that there was some prejudice against the Amal movement. By the nature of the case, we considered that this movement was a major element in the domestic ranks in Lebanon and that it must be given an opportunity to exercise its domestic role in full. Consequently, any attempt to create rifts in domestic ranks will ultimately have negative consequences on all parties to these ranks.

In the meeting which was held in Damascus, a wholly positive attitude was discovered on the part of the Amal movement leaders, as with the representatives of the National Movement and the Palestine resistance.

This helped us arrive at the attainment of agreement among these brothers.

/Question/ Some modifications recently occurred in the political council of the National Movement. Walid Jumblatt was elected president of the National Movement and the Ba'th Party organization and the Socialist Union joined it. What is your appraisal of the modification which has occurred?

/Answer/ We consider this a good step along the proper road. Solidarity and cooperation among all national forces in Lebanon must be strengthened. We always hope that the scope for national action will expand in Lebanon and comprise everyone. What has happened is a step along this road.

/Question/ In your opinion, is the coordinating committee among the National Movement, the resistance and Amal a better context for an alliance, or must this alliance be developed by introducing Amal into the National Movement in addition to some other organizations?

/Answer/ The best way naturally is to shift from the state of mutual killing to that of alliance, mutual understanding and cooperation, then solidarity, unification or unity.

/Question/ Do you believe that the contradictions among these parties have ended and that the Damascus meeting established bases for serious alliance and cooperation among them?

/Answer/ We must all continue to exert efforts to eliminate the causes which lead to this sort of secondary contradiction. But have these contradictions been eliminated? That depends on the parties present on the stage.

/Question/ What about the subject of renewing the Arab deterrent forces, especially in the light of what some Arab parties are saying to the effect that they will not make their financial contributions?

Khaddam said succinctly with a smile "We are not concerned with this matter."

/Question/ Will there be a renewal of the deterrent /forces/ or not?

/Answer/ We are not concerned with their being renewed or not. This is all I have to say: we are not concerned with this matter.

His smile expanded, and we smiled with him.

Security and the Responsibility for Deterrence

/Question/ Let us move over to the issue of the security situation. It is being observed that there is no Syrian-Lebanese security plan to deal with the security situation in Lebanon, in the sense that the deterrent forces today are more of a reserve than a security force.

/Answer/ The problem is that if the security situation in Lebanon stays as it is now, which is unacceptable, and if the deterrent /forces/ continue to perform routine activities instead of Lebanese security, that also is unacceptable to us and to others.

We have chosen this task in order to get the parties to relax. Naturally we did not go into Lebanon to perform the role of a traffic policeman; routine activity is for the Lebanese policemen. Therefore it was necessary to take some measures first to urge all parties to a reconciliation and consequently to strengthen the role of the state in the security process, provided that that take place within the reconciliation process.

Therefore certain measures were necessary such as assembling the deterrent forces, so that we could remind the Lebanese that a day might come when the deterrent forces would not be responsible or ready or present to perform routine security tasks.

Security Is a Political Decision

/Question/ Do you believe that by forming a cabinet of activities, a cabinet of "people who are fighting one another," it will be possible to arrive at a secure security plan and formula which will be carried out on the ground?

/Answer/ Naturally; this is what must be at the head of its tasks.

/Question/ Does that mean that the security plan will not precede the political one?

'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam said:

"Security in Lebanon means political security, in the sense that if there is no political reconciliation among the parties, there will never be security, especially if there is no Lebanese decision to act decisively in this matter."

Measures before a Cabinet

We asked about the results of the talks Fu'ad Butrus held in Damascus, and Khaddam said,

"We agreed on the overall ideas which our brother Fu'ad Butrus brought, first of which was that of a political cabinet or a cabinet containing all persons who are committed to the reconciliation formula. We also agreed that it was necessary for the parties to take practical measures on the ground before forming a cabinet, imparting an impression of seriousness to the process of carrying out the reconciliation."

/Question/ What measures?

/Answer/ There are matters related to security, matters related to dealing with Israel, matters related to laxity and to the occupation of government institutions, and numerous other procedures.

/Question/ Do you and President Sarkis anticipate that the parties will respond to this concept?

/Answer/ If I say that we do not, that will mean that the road we are traveling is not a proper one. (He laughed.)

/Question/ That is, we can be optimistic.

He laughed.

al-Huss' Resignation and Construction of the Army

/Question/ It has been said that al-Huss' resignation was related to numerous things and many causes, among them, and most important, the issue of constructing the army.

/Answer/ We do not know exactly why al-Huss' cabinet resigned, because numerous sources gave us conflicting and contradictory information.

/Question/ But Premier al-Huss' information has it that you were in on the resignation before it occurred.

The European Initiative

We moved on to another subject with the foreign minister of Syria, and asked him:

"Did you expect that the Venice summit would end with what is called the 'European initiative?'?"

/Answer/ Assuredly we fully expected what happened. Through our analysis of the international political situation, and Europe's situation in it, we concluded that Europe would not be able to move very far away from American policy and that any European movement or European initiative would consist of a refined version of Camp David.

By the nature of the case, some of our Arab brothers experienced some illusions and waited for the European initiative, while the Europeans themselves were declaring that Europe would not be able to stand against American policy or oppose American policy in the Middle East--just as those Arab brothers had done with us with respect to the Americans, telling us, "Wait for this president, wait for those elections, and then America will do such and such."

We answered them, "The American president told us such and such, the American minister told us such and such, how do you want us to believe you and lie to the people who are directly concerned?"

The fact is that what we expected was what actually came out. The European initiative consists of the reinjection of new blood into Camp David, and I believe that the purpose in issuing this statement is to outflank the Arab position and prevent the formation of a strong Arab position against American policy in the region. We have taken the statement, analyzed it paragraph by paragraph, and found that in spirit it corresponds to and in many of its stipulations is almost a verbatim copy of Camp David.

In any event, some Arab parties have traveled more than they should in the direction of illusions, such as the illusion that Europe always has said "we will recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization if the organization recognizes Israel." The Europeans have never linked Israel's recognition of the Liberation Organization to the Liberation Organization's recognition of Israel.

Then some paragraphs in the statement speak of Israel's right to security and existence and talk of justice for all peoples, among them the Palestinian people. That means that they have given Israel security and existence, that is, specific demands, and have given the Palestinian people floating words, which are the same ones which were used at Camp David.

They have offered the word self-determination, but in the context of a comprehensive settlement and suitable resolutions to the struggle in the Middle East.

Thus self-determination is connected to Egypt and Israel, that is, to the parties to the struggle who were represented in Camp David, Egypt and Israel, while self-determination, as is customary and as is stipulated in the United Nations resolutions, is not connected to anyone.

That is, Egypt, Israel and Jordan are the ones which will determine the destiny of the Palestinians, and what is meant by the right to self-determination is those Palestinians who are in the West Bank or Gaza! Will they be given the right to return or to choose to return?

There are many major issues which lie within the contents of Camp David.

As regards the paragraph dealing with the Palestine Liberation Organization, some people unfortunately consider it a positive action whereas in our view it is a negative one. The text states that all parties to the struggle, including the Liberation Organization, must accept these principles. Consequently, they have linked the organization to this paragraph, and they have used the word "linkage" and not the word "participation." "Linkage" means that it have relations via a third party, which might be Egypt, Jordan, Singapore, Italy or whatever.

They took 4 hours of discussion to determine whether to use the word "linkage" or the word "participation," and they chose the word "linkage."

Thus they therefore have not said that the Palestinian people have the right to a national personality and self-determination and they have not distinguished between the Palestinian people and the Palestine Liberation Organization. This means that the organization could play another role through some detachments while other parties have another role.

In brief, the statement in its totality is a new Camp David.

An Attempt To Contain Syria

/Question/ There are people who say that this statement reflects some of ficial Arab policies, in the sense that it enjoys the endorsement of some of the Arab parties concerned and is perhaps the result of the current Arab position.

/Answer/ This will not change the facts at all. As long as Syria does not accept this statement, acceptance or rejection of it by others will not mean anything.

/Question/ Does that mean that it will not affect Syria's position or that it concerns some parties but not others?

/Answer/ What was requested of the initiative was that it include the Syrian position in the Arab stand.

/Question/ By whom? France?

/Answer/ I am not saying France. I am saying that America's attempts are to contain the Syrian position, but this will not change anything and will not contain our position. Our policy is inspired by the nature of our domestic situation and the national situation, and by many ingredients; therefore, it is not affected by the positions of one state or another, especially since the positions of Arab parties are mostly theoretical ones.

Perseverance and Europe's Arabs

/Question/ Let us turn to talk about the Syrian position in the Arab and international contexts. The fact is that there are two Arab lines besides al-Sadat's.

/Answer/ There is a line which is betting on the European initiative, and consequently is trying to draw close to the Egyptian regime; the other line is that of the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front, in which Syria is a founding party, and this clashes with the former line.

/Question/ Do you anticipate the a clash will lead to a complete rupture with those who are going to America via Europe?

/Answer/ In reality, the current Arab position must not be a surprise. In the past we propounded the slogan of Arab solidarity, in the conviction that the struggle with Israel was a national one and in the conviction that it was important to mobilize all powers in the national arena and realize the difficult circumstances in the Arab nation in an objective fashion. We realized that we might not be able to attain a unified Arab position in a serious, practical manner from where we were, but we always concentrated on the issue of solidarity for moral and national considerations.

Moral in the sense that we wanted to isolate al-Sadat's line and not provide it with an Arab covering; consequently we said that everyone who was against al-Sadat was with us. We realized that the position on al-Sadat was not sufficiently serious, and many Arab brethren did not really boycott him. The proof is that there still are Arab embassies in Cairo and there are a large number of diplomats there. Just withdrawing an ambassador means that the political boycott has not occurred in a serious manner. The economic boycott has not been carried out in a serious fashion either.

However, as I said, we wanted to preserve a minimum of solidarity because going beyond this minimum will serve al-Sadat and will serve Camp David.

Going beyond the Minimum!

Khaddam went on to explain what he wanted to get at by saying:

"At the summit conference in Baghdad, we arrived at this minimum at that time. Today, however, this minimum in our opinion is no longer acceptable, and there is a great deal of significance in that.

"At the Baghdad summit, we were not able to come up with a resolution condemning Camp David; what we did come up with was non-agreement to these agreements and rejection of their conclusions, while at the summit of non-aligned countries in Havana we did attain the condemnation of these agreements and branded them crimes. This reflects the current Arab situation. American imperialism is aware of the elements which make up the Arab position. It has worked and is now working to use these elements to go beyond the minimum and create a psychological state of despair and hesitation by creating peripheral disputes among Arabs, giving it a better opportunity to carry out its schemes.

"As regards Arab solidarity, I state simply that this solidarity, in its traditional sense, must be reviewed in a serious manner. It is not important that we talk about solidarity--what is important is that we talk about what this solidarity has achieved. If it has achieved the results we wanted, that is good, and if it has not achieved what we wanted, we must conduct a review of it.

"We hope that relations among all Arab countries will be normal and that brotherhood and good neighborliness will dominate relations. However, the goal of solidarity must not just be that of good neighborly relations among Arab countries. The main goal of solidarity is to provide the requirements of the struggle against Israel; if we do not use this solidarity in the direction of attaining this goal, that means that we are not travelling along the proper road."

'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam added, stressing specific notions to get at what he wanted to assert:

"In reality, the withdrawal of the Egyptian regime and its alliance with Israel and America constitutes a new element, a quantitative element; we state that it is an important landmark in the history of events and developments in the Arab region. Consequently, we have started to face a new state which we cannot confront through the means and policies with which we faced the situation before Camp David. The situation after Camp David is a new one, different in essence from the one before it, and confronting this state by previous methods will not be possible, in the sense that when we face the post-Camp David stage with the same previous methods we will be like someone facing a tank with a pistol. Therefore we in Syria consider that we must week new means which will enable us to cope with the new stage.

"By the nature of the case, this requires a radical review of our various policies, and this is what we have done and are doing now. We have started the review, and the national party conference next month will adopt radical decisions including all our policies. We are preparing for this today. As I said, one cannot face a new situation and a new conspiracy with previous methods."

/Question/ When will you set forth your new position?

/Answer/ Through the resolutions of the national conference in the party, then through the conference of Arab foreign and economics ministers which will be held next August, in the process of preparing for the Arab summit in November. We have prepared ourselves for this conference and during it we will present a full detailed work program of plan which we presume will respond to the challenges of the current stage.

We Must Create an Alternative

/Question/ Your statement inspires one to believe that there is a dividing point today which will become apparent following the conference of Arab foreign ministers, or exists and is apparent even without conferences.

Now, a specific format has been dropped from the Arab alliance, and Syria is demanding another format which it will present, while at the same time Arab parties are taking a tack which is totally at variance with Syria's; this has been observed in Syria's relations with some Arab countries.

/Answer/ There is no doubt that there is a new stage which will be imposed on us. America, Israel and al-Sadat have imposed a new stage.

The question which is raised is, can the formats which now exist liberate, regain the rights of the Palestinian people and stop the American attack on the area?

The regime in Egypt has started to give America military bases; 2 days ago it was announced that American forces will conduct serious joint maneuvers with the Egyptians.

Israel, al-Sadat and America today are working in a form different from the past, that is, Egypt, having been one of the major confrontation states, has today gone over to Israel's side and is outside the battle. Indeed, Egypt's power and all it represents have gone over to the other side as a result of al-Sadat's treason. Will it be possible, in the light of these conditions, to confront this situation with the relations existing among the Arabs today?

If it is possible, that is good. However, if it is not possible, and if an alternative is necessary, it will be necessary to look for this alternative.

'Abd-al Halim Khaddam went on to stress the slogan which has been raised in the Syrian political milieu: strategic balance with Israel. He said,

"What is important is that we exert efforts to provide this alterrative. What is required today is an Arab decision and a strategic military balance between Syria alone and Israel, not between the Arabs and Israel. This problem is a major one as far as we go and we therefore state that the formula we will propound and our policy in the future will set forth from this issue. Anyone who wants to join with us and place his resources for the confrontation with us we say is with us and against Israel, and we will struggle to get every Arab to be with us.

"In the past, our action was concentrated on Arab governments and we closed the door to interaction with and orientation toward Arab peoples. Today we will correct this course and will orient ourselves toward Arab peoples, since it is necessary to appeal and act so that the Arab masses may regain the initiative and regain their role of leading Arab action and guiding it in a national direction, that is, in the direction of the struggle with Israel."

Perseverance and Strategic Balance

/Question/ Is that the position of the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front?

/Answer/ This is a general position of the front's, but it will be set out in a specific manner at the coming meeting of the Arab foreign and economic ministers, then at the forthcoming Arab summit.

We in Syria consider the issue of strategic balance with Israel to be a major one and we will strive to provide the conditions for it, in any form and under the pressure of any circumstance, because we do not imagine that it will be possible for us alone, with our current resources, to confront this sordid American-Israeli-al-Sadatist tripartite alliance or the Carter-Begin-al-Sadat alliance. Therefore one must strive to achieve this strategic balance so that we will be able to make a confrontation.

As regards the perseverance front, I am anxious to point out that it has taken steps along the road to attaining the goals desired of it, in spite of the observation that our brothers in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah are facing extreme pressures, most conspicuously overt preparations by al-Sadat's regime to attack Libya. It goes without saying that I stress that we will stand alongside Libya and will consolidate its resources to confront any probable aggression, which will be a single battle, and we will not enable al-Sadat and his allies to achieve their objectives here or there.

Developments Domestically

/Question/ Talk about strategic balance with Israel certainly presupposes essential developments on the internal level in Syria, politically, socially and economically.

/Answer/ Yes, and President al-Asad has expressed this orientation in our policy on every occasion.

/Question/ Let us presume that you intend to refer to the need to expand the national progressive front and liberate the powers of the people. However, what practical measures have been or will be taken on the ground to achieve this orientation?

/Answer/ First, strengthening the role of the national front, strengthening the role of the progressive line in the country, strengthening the role of the forces with a real interest in the revolution--which are the workers and the peasants--and exerting efforts to build a domestic economy which will in a specific range enable us to provide the requirements for defense and the basic needs of the citizen.

These are the orientations the leaders are working to carry out at present, and they have started to do so.

/Question/ But it is being observed that there is an unjustified revival of the private sector at the expense of the public sector. Are there measures to limit this growth of the private sector and to limit the growth of the parasitic bourgeoisie which has grown along the fringes of the public sector and benefited from it?

/Answer/ Naturally there is a decree in this regard on the part of the leaders and we are now intending to carry it out. We are working to strengthen the public sector's leadership role in the domestic economy and are working to eliminate parasites and the flaws which plague the structure of the domestic economy in general and the public sector in particular.

Naturally measures are being discussed and carried out in this direction and I would like to state that the public sector is the commanding sector in reality in Syria. The total money invested in the public sector exceeds 90 billion Syrian pounds while the money invested in the private sector does not exceed 200 or 300 million Syrian pounds.

As regards the growth of the parasitic bourgeoisie, the necessary measures have been taken to prevent its growth and to eliminate it.

/Question/ You talked about strengthening the national front. What are the parties involved in the expansion of this front?

/Answer/ Every power which is committed to the goals of the front, its charter and the struggle to achieve these goals and this charter is considered to belong to this front.

What Crisis in Syria?

/Question/ The world's radio stations, Western ones particularly, have been actively disseminating much news and many stories about the presence of a domestic crisis in Syria, and intense emphasis has been made in talking about factional crisis. Explosions and the assassination episodes have been used as proof of the fact that there is a political crisis with a factional aspect in Syria. What is the nature of the crisis which exists in Syria? Is it possible to talk about measures which have been taken to confront them, what they have called dragnet operations and so forth?

/Answer/ First, I do not share the view that there is a crisis in Syria. There are vexations which have been visited on Syria, but there is a difference between a crisis and vexations. When we say "crisis," that means that there is a crisis in the regime, a crisis in the country, a crisis in resolving domestic problems. When we say "vexations," this means that there are foreign sources for these vexations.

I state, bluntly, there is no crisis in Syria, but Syria, at one stage, was exposed to some vexations, and I believe that these vexations, imported to us from abroad, will continue because they are connected to our continuing political line.

When we challenge American policy in the region, and stand against it, and against Israel and against al-Sadat's regime, we expect some vexations to occur. This is not an inference; facts confirm it. The main objective of these movements and vexations is to face Syria with two alternatives: to choose the Camp David road, whereupon the vexations will end and the country will relax, but our people and our nation will be split up because to follow the Camp David road means total liquidation of all the aspirations and the role of the Arab nation, or to continue traveling the other road, for Syria to continue its current policy, and consequently for it to be concentrated on, crushed and eliminated as an obstacle, because the main obstacle to Camp David is here in this country.

The Syrian word "yes" is a distinctive word in the region, and the Syrian word "no" is also a distinctive one in the region.

What is desired, at least, if there is no yes, is that there be no no, and consequently that Syria be eliminated.

Therefore attempts have been made which have taken the form of assassination attempts and explosions in order to stir up a factional climate. Those who are scheming realize that the atmosphere in Syria cannot be a factional one. France divided the current Syria into five statelets, these statelets could not exist, and France continued to try for 25 years but could not establish a foundation on a factional basis.

If direct imperialism (France) could not establish such an atmosphere, and failed to do so, do the schemers abroad anticipate success, especially now after more than 34 years of independence? By the nature of the case, when the schemers failed with the murders which were aimed at spreading a climate of factionalism, their orientation changed. I can give an example of this by saying that more than 10 religious men were assassinated in Syria on grounds that they were dealing with the government.

/Question/ Perhaps the entities which practice killing are numerous.

/Answer/ No, the murderer is a single one, a single body. It is the band of Moslem Brothers which is practicing the killing, and when it kills it announces the fact. That means that the issue is no longer hidden.

I can say that after they failed to stir up factional strife through murder they shifted to the stage of "national assassination." That type of assassination was aimed at blowing up the situation in the country, specifically in the first week or the first half of March. By the nature of the case, their conspiracy failed and ended. The government entities concerned are actually following up on the security question with full determination. In brief, one can state that some vexations have been caused for us in Syria which have assumed the nature of security problems and and which might in another stage assume another form, that is, the form of vexations of political pressure or economic pressure. They might assume the form of direct Israeli military aggression.

This is all aimed at carrying the Camp David conspiracy through, but we will persevere and fight.

The War and America's Scheme

/Question/ Talk is now proliferating inside and outside Israel about the likelihood of war, war against Syria specifically. How do you view this kind of likelihood?

'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam said:

"The Middle East region is the most important one in the world from the strategic standpoint and from the economic standpoint. It is clear that any disruption in the situation in the region will be reflected in the world economy and on world peace and security. America is now trying to strengthen its grip and dominance in the region, and if it can close the area off to the advantage of American policy, that will first mean tightening its grip on Europe, Japan and the third world and surrounding the Soviet Union. It is certain that the United States will always try to eliminate all obstacles in its way, and Syria is an obstacle in America's way.

"By the nature of the case, direct Israeli military action may have some results which would have the effect of thwarting American action. Therefore the orientation now is to use non-military means. However, if they become convinced that these means are failing, the strategic importance of the area will become more important than the consequences which will result from Israeli aggression. Thus the likelihood of war continues to exist."

/Question/ Let us continue the discussion on strategic balance. Is it in Syria's power to achieve strategic balance with Israel apart from the Soviet Union, considering that that is the friendly international party which is close to its political premises?

/Answer/ We in Syria have decided to attain a strategic balance and to use all the policies and means which will lead to this balance. Among these means and policies is the attainment of a qualitative improvement in relations between us and the Soviet Union.

/Question/ Are there practical measures?

/Answer/ The question is, how can we? This is a matter we discuss in the party leadership and with our brethren in the Perseverance Front. That is, we have approved the principle and are now discussing ways of qualitatively improving these relations with the Soviet Union.

/Question/ A military meeting was held lately in Damascus in the context of the Perseverance Front to carry out the resolutions of its latest summit.

/Answer/ Correct, and so far as I know this military meeting was very successful. The resolutions adopted in it were very good, especially as regards the Palestine resistance.

Relations with the Resistance

We asked 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam:

"What about Syrian-Palestinian relations? There are people who talk of, or perhaps express a desire for, a dispute between the resistance and Damascus."

/Answer/ All I know is that when our Palestinian brethren come to Syria they talk nicely to us and praise Syria's policy, positions and what Syria is enduring for the sake of the Palestinian cause, and we have not heard anything different from any of them.

I can truthfully state that there is no dispute with brothers in the resistance, and the noise that is going on about disputes probably arose from a difference in political vision and appraisal along the edges of the contacts which our brothers in the resistance sometimes make and which we are informed about after they happen, although when we meet and discuss matters we find that our viewpoints are in agreement and that it is not necessary for allies to make the same movements to prove their solidarity.

Our goals are clear: against Camp David, in favor of liberation; the Palestine cause is the central cause and any movement in that direction, especially after Camp David, cannot take place within the framework of what is called a political settlement. To talk about political settlement is to talk about surrendering to Israeli demands. It makes us live through illusions of imminent peace whereas the Israelis are moving within the realities of war.

Some of us are still investigating a word in a statement by some country or another which is talking about peace while at the same time Israel builds new settlements. In spite of this we consider that the issue of the illusion of settlement must be reviewed. We might disagree with some of our Arab brethren and might disagree in our views with some Palestinian brothers, but the Palestinian context, in our opinion, is in general on the side of the political path Syria is propounding. The climate of the FATH conference, which I attended, strengthened the path of rejection of the illusions of settlement and the firmness of the movement's combative stand.

The statement issued reflects the combative atmosphere and not one word of it contradicts our political policies. Naturally the base and leadership organizations of the Palestinian revolution are not in favor of Camp David or the plans or illusions of political settlement.

Perhaps the climate of enthusiasm with which those at the conference received the statement I made before the FATH movement reflect the notions I am driving at.

In brief, Israel and America will not form and will not allow the establishment of a Palestinian state, and anything they propound on the Palestinian issue consists of mines to blow up the Palestinian stage by creating contradictions in it. No one who tries to be friends with America and be on its side realizes that it wants to crush him. The Americans want agents, not friends, slaves who have no hand in decisions. I believe that the Palestinian stage is opposed to America and to Camp David and al-Sadat, by the nature of the case, all Palestinian organizations with a popular and leadership character have adopted specific positions, and there is no anxiety over this matter.

/Question/ Many Lebanese assume that agreement to a tripartite Lebanese-Syrian-Palestinian formula will constitute an entree into a solution of the Lebanese crisis. Do you believe it is possible to arrive at these proper trilateral relations?

/Answer/ This is what we are striving toward. What is important is that the situation in Lebanon not continue in the current manner, because its continuation will strangle the Lebanese and Palestinians and will lead to more contradictions and problems in national ranks, and this will be negatively reflected on the Palestinian position. Weakening the national ranks will weaken the position of the Palestinian resistance. Therefore it is necessary to make serious urgent efforts to shift the current situation in Lebanon to a new stage, a stage in which the Lebanese and Palestinians will relax, and we will relax with them.

DEFENSE MINISTER LAUDS DEVELOPMENT EFFORTS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Today the Fight Means Efficiently Contributing to the Work of Development"]

[Text] Mr Slaheddine Baly, Minister of National Defense on Wednesday went to Meknassy where he presided over a people's meeting.

In the speech he gave on this occasion, the minister discussed the efforts made by the government in all fields to assure dignity for all citizens in spite of the modest resources of the country. The minister mentioned particularly the manyfold encouragements given by the state to incite citizens to improve production. In this connection he gave tribute to the citizens of Meknassy for the work they are doing in land improvement by practicing irrigated cultivation. This is all the more gratifying, insisted the minister, as Tunisians have become conscious of their duties and responsibilities.

Mr Baly then emphasized the concern of the "Supreme Fighter" for the young regime of Sidi Bouzid, recalling that the head of state devoted his whole life to assure the dignity of the Tunisians by fighting for the country's independence in the first stage and for the amelioration of living standard and the promotion of the whole people in the second stage.

After reviewing the glorious past of the Sidi Bouzid government in the struggle for national liberation, Mr Baly underlined the importance of direct contact in Bourguiba politics which made it possible to lay the foundations of a modern society and to launch the country on the path of development on a solid basis.

The minister then explained that today the fight means efficiently contributing to the work of development, notably by the creation of jobs, increase of production. He mentioned that the army also shares in this work in the form of national service.

Moreover, discussing the importance of agriculture in the national economy, Mr Baly stressed the need to encourage young people to work on the land.

He also indicated that the government spares no effort to rehabilitate distressed areas and to encourage all those wishing to work for the good of the nation.

The minister concluded in exhorting the citizens to strengthen their loyalty to the Bourguiba regime which embodies the aspirations of all citizens, to remain watchful in the defense of national assets and to foil all attempts at hindering the march of the country towards progress and prosperity.

At the end of the meeting Mr Baly distributed several prizes as an encouragement to young people and granted in the context of the rural development program.

PLANNING, FINANCE MINISTER DISCUSSES TUNISIAN-STYLE SOCIALISM

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 28 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] On Tuesday Mr Mansour Moalla, Planning and Finance Minister chaired, at the Center for Training of young executives, a free platform organized by the regional student committee in the Sfax district.

Taking stock of the last two decades the minister stressed that the results of the last 20 years are on the whole positive despite some negative aspects. Among positive results Mr Mansour Moalla cited the liquidation of the aftermath of colonialism which required great and long-term efforts such as the establishment of State institutions which could be improved upon in order to fulfill properly their mission according to the aspirations of the nation. The last 20 years also have seen the elaboration of a basic infrastructure, the generalization of education and the launching of a diversified Tunisian industry. On that point the minister underlined that all these results are assets which have to be safeguarded and strengthened.

Mr. Moalla then discussed the efforts Tunisia still has to make to reach the standard of developed countries. This task, he stressed, requires the coordination of everybody's efforts and great determination to overcome the emerging difficulties.

Reinforcement of the Collective Sector

Answering further to questions raised by the students concerning economic development, the minister reaffirmed Tunisian adherence to the socialist line, indicating that Tunisian socialism is a socialism characterized by a policy of balance between all sectors and by the quest for economic payoff. The Tunisian economy, observed Mr Moalla, constantly develops and evolves for the good of the whole nation. He added: Tunisian socialism is not incompatible with the existence of a private sector provided the latter fulfills its duties, notably in connection with the distribution of income, taxes, job creation and social intercourse which must be built on foundations which do not consider labor as a simple means of production on the same level as equipment and machines. The state itself has other priorities to which it must bend its efforts, particularly since certain key sectors require the special interest of the state which must not neglect them in view of the role they play in the life of the citizens.

As to the collective sector, continued Mr Moalla, we shall come back to it progressively, particularly in the field of consumption. The state is determined to strengthen this sector by appropriate legislation guaranteeing it all possible success.

Regional Development Plans Integrated

Recalling furthermore the experiment of collectivist policy undertaken in Tunisia, Mr Moalla stated that its failure and the subsequent reactions are caused by the methods used in the experiment's implementation.

The collectivist regime, he pointed out, is above all mutualistic and therefore requires as an essential premise the conviction of the participants, their enthusiasm and their loyalty. Thus the cooperative is an economic institution, not a political one. To impose this regime by force can only lead to failure. The minister was then led to speak on the balance between regions in the development programs foreseen for the next Plan, underlining the care of the government to grant special treatment to the Western regions of the country, regions which in the past did not benefit from advantages similar to those granted to the coastal regions, due to lack of money and also other considerations related to efficiency. He also stated that the administration plans to create some projects of integrated development for these regions in collaboration with the districts.

These regional plans are going to comprise the implementation of agricultural, industrial, touristic projects with the purpose of giving to these regions their part in the work of development and at the same time to achieve regional balance. This action by the way is linked to the administrative decentralization decided upon by the government.

To Maintain the Balance between Salaries and Prices

On the subject of rural development policy whose programs started in 1973 the minister said that this policy aims first of all at improving living conditions in the rural districts and making possible for the young people of these regions to obtain an adequate professional training and stable employment.

Talking then of the balance between salaries and prices, Mr Moalla emphasized the will of the government to do its utmost to maintain and reinforce this balance, the more so as a serious action has begun to curb inflation.

In his answer to interruptions by students who pointed out the negative aspects of the law of April 1972, the minister denied the allegations that this law was promulgated to encourage foreign capital. This law he insisted profits foreigners as well as Tunisians. The advantages proposed by Tunisia to foreign investors concern the creation of an appropriate environment allowing their enterprises to take root in Tunisia in order to help us to solve the problem of unemployment.

Concerning tax policy Mr Moalla stressed that the Administration envisages measures capable of inducing the citizens to discharge their fiscal duties.

The minister devoted the last part of his speech to the cooperation of Tunisia with brother countries and friendly countries indicating on that score that the development of cooperative relations of Tunisia with the Arab countries is defined in the context of coordinated action aiming at strengthening Arab power.

Such a cooperation does not keep us from turning to industrialized countries, all the more as we endeavour to acquire a technology allowing us to achieve our own development with the least delay.

In conclusion Mr Moalla exhorted the students and young people in general to take part efficiently in the implementation of our development objectives, all the more as the government and the Party labor presently to surmount the obstacles which hindered the dialog at a given time.

PARTY CHIEF EMPHASIZES PARTY'S CONCERN FOR YOUTH

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 29 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] Mr Mongi Kooli, Party Director and Delegate Minister to the Prime Minister chaired on Wednesday the last session of the regional seminar of Destourien students in the Sfax governorship.

On that occasion he gave a speech in which he explained the objectives aimed at by the Party through the organization of such seminars. He also insisted that the Party always had as main concern the establishment of direct contacts with Tunisian students wherever they are.

Later, answering the students questions, Mr Mongi Kooli explained, concerning the responsibility within the party, that a responsible destourien must have as sole concern the common interest rather than his personal interest. The "Supreme Fighter" added Mr Kooli always taught us that responsibility is a burden and not a distinction.

The party director mentioned furthermore that the party's traditions command us to oppose anybody who would be tempted to deviate from this principle, just as they call on us to fight against deviations by legal and democratic means, since, in the Destourien ethic, there are no differences between Destouriens and only honesty and loyalty distinguish one from the other.

The Welcome to Young People is not a Slogan

Mr Mongi Kooli then explained that the constant concern of the party to remain open for young people expresses in fact the party's desire to be a people's assembly, where generations meet in a happy symbiosis. This open approach, added Mr Kooli, will not be at the cost of those not so young any more, especially as the party needs all the energies and as the enthusiasm of the young is complemented by the experience of their elders.

You must know, said Mr Kooli addressing his audience, that the opening to youth is not a propaganda slogan but expresses a sincere wish to establish an harmonious bond between the generations of our new society.

At the same time the party director exhorted the Destourien youth to draw its inspiration from the struggle of the "Supreme Fighter" and to conform to the instructions contained in his many speeches which remain the best means to orient the citizens and to inculcate in them the virtue of patriotism.

Mr Kooli also noted that the meetings of the different branches of the party are always occasions for taking stock of actions carried out and for self examination.

They are therefore manifestations of democracy. On that account the party director insisted that the Destourien must have the courage to express himself in all frankness within the party. This courage requires however the need to be disciplined and to yield to the majority's will.

The Law Is Above All

The party director then warned the participants against rumors and slanders, insisting that the party prohibits squarings of accounts and that Bourguibian ethics do not authorize the spirit of revenge. If some measures are taken against some old officials of the Party, this is only proof that in the Tunisian regime the law remains above all.

Mr Mongi Kooli concluded in emphasizing that the Party is the best shield for the regime and that our loyalty and our attachment to the Supreme Fighter order us to work for the strengthening of the Party so that it can continue its noble mission aiming at promoting the Tunisian citizen who is the means and the end of every act of development.

At the close of the meeting the participants addressed a message of support to the Supreme Fighter.

ITALIAN-TUNISIAN GAS LINE TALKS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 21 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Mr Mzali Receives the President of "SNAM": The Gas Pipeline Between Algeria and Italy at the Center of the Discussion"]

[Text] Yesterday morning, at the Government Palace in the Casbah, Mr Mohamed Mzali received Mr Lorenzio Roasio, president of the Italian company "SNAM" [National Gas Pipeline Company], in the presence of Messrs Abdelaziz Lasram, minister of the national economy, and Mezri Chekir, director of the prime minister's cabinet.

At the end of the interview, Mr Roasio declared that the discussion had dealt with the state of progress of the work for completion of the gas pipeline which was to carry Algerian gas to Italy by passing over Tunisian territory.

He also indicated that he had informed the prime minister of his impressions as to the progress of this work, the construction sites for which are now only 200 km from Tunis.

"The work is progressing in accordance with the estimates worked out," added Mr Roasio, who declared himself "satisfied with the competence of the Tunisian staff and with the harmony which reigns on these sites between Tunisians and Italians."

Mr Roasio also indicated that the construction sites on the Cap-Bon line include 1,000 workers of whom 80 percent are Tunisian.

Mr Roasio, who was accompanied by the director general of SNAM and by the president of the Pipeline Construction Company, concluded by expressing the hope that Tunisian-Italian cooperation would increase and would be extended to other areas.

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 20 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Mr Mzali Confers with the Secretary General of the Italian Socialist Party: Exchange of Views on Relations Between the Two Countries"]

[Text] Yesterday morning at the Government Palace in the Casbah, Mr Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and secretary general of the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party], received Mr Craxy, secretary general of the Italian Socialist Party, in the presence of Messrs Mongi Kooli, ministerial delegate to the prime minister and director of the party, and Mezri Chekir, director of the prime minister's cabinet.

At the end of the interview, Mr Craxy made the following statement:

"Relations between the Italian Socialist Party and the PSD are developing normally, in a spirit of mutual respect and fruitful cooperation. I had the pleasure of meeting Mr Mohamed Mzali, the prime minister, and we proceeded to an exchange of views on questions concerning the international problems of the moment and the relations between Tunisia and Italy.

"We are all interested in having, in the Mediterranean, a region of security and peace. And we are determined to work toward eliminating destabilizing factors and crisis points in the region.

"On the level of bilateral relations, it is in our mutual interest to accelerate all forms of cooperation. We are good neighbors, but we have not gone deeply into all the possibilities of cooperation, which are very broad.

"I hope," Mr Craxy concluded, "that the Tunisian and Italian governments will have the opportunity to meet at a very high level to lay more solid foundations for this cooperation."

Mr Mongi Kooli had previously had a discussion with Mr Craxy in the presence of Mr Sadok Fayala, responsible for foreign relations at the party headquarters.

[Article: "President Bourguiba Receives Ennaceur and Sfar. The Social and Union Situation Meeting's Focal Point. UGTT Congress: Those Condemned to Forced Labor Penalty Do Not Have According to the Law. The Right to Participate in Union Responsibilities"]

[Text] President Bourguiba, yesterday morning in the Essaada Palace in Marsa, received Mohamed Ennaceur, minister of social affairs, and Rachid Sfar, minister of public health, in the presence of Mezri Chekir, director of the prime minister's cabinet.

At the end of the interview, Ennaceur made the following statement:

"The attention of the President of the Republic was directed toward the social and union situation, as well as toward the preparations for the next UGTT (Tunisian General Federation of Labor) congress. In order to remove any ambiguity, the Chief of State recommended respect for the law regarding the requirements for candidacy to union responsibilities, emphasizing that those condemned to the penalties of forced labor and prison, having received a presidential pardon, do not have the right to hold such responsibilities."

DECENTRALIZATION IN AGRICULTURE, HEALTH

Regional Health Administration

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 25-26 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] A work session bringing together high officials of the cabinet and the Ministry of Public Health was held yesterday morning at the health ministry's headquarters. The session was presided over by Rachid Sfar, the minister of public health, and Moncef Belhaj Amor, deputy minister to the prime minister for Public Office and Administrative Reform.

This meeting is part of the project to effect administrative reform and a policy of decentralization, such as determined at the joint meeting of the Offices of Policy and Government, which was held on 28 July 1980.

The meeting, which also falls within the framework of a series of meetings that Belhaj Amor is holding with the ministers concerned, aims to examine the measures intended for making workable the decentralization decided by the government.

Thus it was decided to move toward creating a Regional Health Administration in each governorship in order to gradually increase the number of these administrations from 6 to 19.

These administrations will be headed by a director who will be the regional representative of the Ministry of Public Health.

In this regard, Sfar and Belhaj Amor advocated the need to allow the regional director a broad power of decision in matters of regional health.

As a result, they agreed that the regional directors will benefit from being assigned powers qualifying them to go ahead with recruitment and the administration of personnel, up to then done in Tunis.

"All these measures are designed to relieve congestion in the administration and will allow the latter to better fulfill its role of creating ideas for coordination and supervision, with the regional administration from now on retaining the power of decision in execution," stated Sfar.

Moreover, the ministers were particularly interested in methods of facilitating relations between citizens and the health administration. Thus they directed that there be presented as soon as possible a regulations draft allowing regional health services to deliver locally the equipment and certificates requested by users, a function until then in the central administration's jurisdiction.

For this purpose, Sfar and Belhaj Amor examined a draft for an assignment of powers that will qualify the regional health director to judge and to deliver the authorizations for opening or closing health establishments such as pharmacies, laboratories and private clinics located in his geographical jurisdiction.

This measure, the ministers emphasized, answers the incessant increase of establishments built at the initiative of private individuals.

Therefore, the reduction of procedures will encourage this initiative and will give private individuals the opportunity to contribute to improving our hospital organization.

Within this same framework, it has been decided to entrust the regional director with the decision to approve using private ambulances. In addition, to create careers and to allow the initial formation of regional administrative staff, Belhaj Amor informed the participants of projects for support to aid regional officials. This support deals with allowances for length of administrative service, as well as financial encouragements.

Decentralization of Agriculture Ministry

[Text] Lassaad Ben Osman, minister of agriculture, and Moncef Belhaj Amor, deputy minister to the prime minister for public office and administrative reform, presided over a meeting bringing together high officials of both departments, on Thursday at Ministry of Agriculture headquarters.

During this work session, held within the framework of the decentralization policy decided by the government and the policy office at their joint meeting last 28 July, Ben Osman and Belhaj Amor examined measures concerning the Ministry of Agriculture and tending to further strengthen the decentralization of its services in administrative, financial, technical and economic areas.

Ben Osman and Belhaj Amor agreed on the need to give the regions qualified administrative staff in order to guarantee the success of the decentralization and to allow citizens to manage on the spot and with maximum swiftness the problems that they face.

An organization and methods committee created in the Ministry of Agriculture determined, in agreement with all the administrations, the methods for reducing detours, the powers that there is room for decentralizing, as well as the redeployment of personnel and of methods of service to benefit the governorships.

Concerning regional structures, the 19 regional offices for agricultural development are managed by high level technicians and cover 130 districts.

The redeployment, gradually achieved, of technical personnel will contribute to strengthening these regional structures.

The division of the administrative staff--about 26 percent for the central administration and about 74 percent for regional services--will benefit the latter even more after the next selection of engineers comes forward.

Moreover, aware of the need to place technical services within immediate reach of agriculture in the most remote areas, especially in agricultural popularization and aid to the small and medium farms through supervised loans, Ben Osman and Belhaj Amor agreed to effect a second redeployment inside the governorships themselves up to the delegation and sector (Imadat) level. In this regard, 150 technicians have been assigned in a first stage at the level of delegations and regional popularization cells.

As for the powers to be entrusted to the regional services, their transfer will be effected gradually up to 1 January 1981 and will affect all the functions of the ministries.

These measures, joined to the new regional structure, will allow the local offices to better serve agriculture and will accordingly lead to taking up the challenge of nutrition.

Bringing Together Administration and Administered

This transfer more particularly concerns the Ministry of Agriculture's powers in matters of land-holding, plant production, forests with hydraulic resources, cattle breeding and fish.

Thus, the delivery of authorizations for licenses and certificates of possession (collective, state and enzel lands) (as published) from now on will be in the jurisdiction of the regional commissioners.

In the area of agricultural credits, decentralization will give freedom to regional services to decide the granting of loans within the framework of a program determined by the central administration.

Thus, farmers will have only to recur to the CRDA and to the agencies of the BNT (Tunisian National Bank) for the complete handling of their records until the final decision, made locally. These measures are designed to reduce delays and to grant a loan in the required time.

The measures will be followed by the adjustment of certain legislative and regulatory texts.

Regarding the administration of personnel, the determined decentralization will allow the CRDA to directly manage all personnel in categories B, C and D.

Moreover, with the aim of supplying the local offices with finances and even having them master their problems, it was decided to grant them allotments of loans for operations as well as for equipment. Thus expenditures for operation and maintenance will be the object of a broad decentralization starting from 1 January 1981. The same will be true for the equipment budget regarding loans for regional purposes (reafforestation, building of water stations, hydraulic power, etc....)

In this regard, Belhaj Amor specified that accompanying measures studied at the cabinet level will make this financial allotment easier. Thus, there will be created regional supervision of expenditures in each governorship, just as the ceiling of the regional market commission will be raised. The aim of these measures will be to allow regional services to initiate and to carry out projects appropriate for their regions and therefore to assure the speed of their execution and follow-up.

Ben Osman and Belhaj Amor finally examined the measures being prepared to reduce and simplify procedures establish the broad outlines to create a guide for the administered person with the object of informing the citizen about the routes and procedures allowing him to manage his business within the permitted legal time period.

BRIEFS

CLASH WITH MOROCCAN FORCES--The Saharan Information Ministry has issued a new military communique stating that fighters of the Saharan Popular Liberation Army carried out a sweeping attack on 17 September against Moroccan soldiers who were supported by the 10th division. During the attack, which took place in the area between (Bishat) and (Abatih) and lasted for 16 hours, the Saharan forces inflicted heavy losses on the invading forces. They killed or wounded hundreds of Moroccan soldiers and destroyed or seized a large quantity of military hardware, including armored vehicles, various types of trucks and light and heavy arms. Scores of the invading soldiers were also taken prisoner. The Saharan Information Ministry communique also reported that the Polisario fighters opened heavy fire the same day against the Moroccan garrison at (Bur al-Hashishah) on the border between Morocco and the Saharan Republic, inflicting heavy losses of life and materiel on the occupation forces. SAUDI-IRAQI RELATIONS SEEN STRESSING IMPORTANCE OF ARAB UNITY

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 16 Aug 80 pp 2-6

[Excerpt] Saudi Crown Prince Fahd Ben Abdel Aziz declared earlier this week that the Israeli Knesset decision to consider unified Jerusalem as the eternal capital of Israel was both a challenge and a threat to the Arab nations. He stressed that the Arabs must reconsider their strategy and rebuild their unity and solidarity to confront the new situation and, quite surprisingly, he said that "holy war" was the only possible retort to the Israeli move.

Coming from one of the top officials of one of the Arab states that are considered as most moderate, the declaration raised questions among observers as to its far-reaching meaning and consequences. The fact that it came a week after the oil-rich kingdom and Iraq issued a joint declaration announcing that measures would be taken against any country which recognized the Israeli decision gave even more momentum to the declaration and triggered speculations on the policy that Saudi Arabia was planning to draw up for the coming months.

The Iraqi-Saudi Statement. On August 6, Saudi Arabia and Iraq issued a declaration which said they would cut political and economic ties with any country which accepted Israel's annexation of East Jerusalem. The communique, which was issued after Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's visit to Saudi Arabia, said that "the two sides agreed to sever all political and economic relations with any country which responds to the decision of the Zionist entity and retains its embassy in Jerusalem."

The statement also condemned the Israeli move as "a new dangerous situation in a string of continuing Zionist aggressions which threaten the security, peace and stability of the region and the world." It also said that Saudi Arabia and Iraq valued those countries which had withdrawn their diplomatic missions from the disputed city following the Israeli action and urged other countries to do the same, and not to stand "had-tied in the face of such evil Zionist activities."

The Saudi-Iraqi communique was issued after Iraqi President Saddam Hussein returned home from a 24-hour surprise visit to Saudi Arabia; the first visit to the oil-rich kingdom by an Iraqi President ever since the Hashemite monarchy was overthrown in Iraq in 1958.

The visit came as a complete surprise even to Saudi officials who, according to Saudi press reports, were taken aback and until the last moment did not know how to make protocol arrangements. Saudi reports said that when the Iraqi President's plane landed in Taef, Saudi officials thought of making a declaration saying that the President Saddam Hussein was coming to perform the Umrah ritual in Mecca, on the occasion of the month of Ramadan. The same reports added that, however, the Iraqi delegation insisted that the visit be called and regarded as an official one.

Some sources said that the Iraqi President may have surrounded his visit with complete secrecy for security reasons but the major questions that were raised dealt with the reasons behind his trip. It is worth noting here that Mr Saddam Hussein visited Saudi Arabia in late 1978 when he was Vice President, but his visit at the time was described as a private one conducted for religious reasons; it had nevertheless drawn attention to the relations between the two countries. These relations have been consistently improving ever since 1978.

Speculations had it that the Iraqi President's surprise visit was prompted by the deteriorating internal situation in some of the Gulf states, or by the latest Israeli decision on Jerusalem, both issues which are of vital importance for the two oil-producing countries. Another view was that Iraq, which will be hosting the OPEC summit slated for November, was seeking to ensure the success of the forthcoming meeting and to settle a number of questions related to oil production and oil prices.

It was noted that Saudi King Khaled personally accompanied the Iraqi President from Taef's Howaya Airport to the Guests' palace.

Interpretation. The joint Saudi-Iraqi declaration was described by some observers as the first step towards the establishment of a Saudi-Iraqi axis which would play a decisive role in both the Gulf and Middle East regions. This view was prompted by the fact that since the fall of the Iranian monarchy, Iraq has emerged as the leading military power of the Gulf region and has repeatedly expressed its determination to play a major role on both the security and political levels in the Gulf region, especially to maintain this region outside the realm of international conflicts and domestic disturbances. This position is shared by the Saudi Kingdom and, since April 1978, security agreements have been concluded between the two countries, but the consequences of these agreements had not yet appeared; perhaps because of the two countries' disagreements over oil question, or because of the 20-year friendship and cooperation treaty concluded between Iraq and the Soviet Union.

Following the conclusion, in February 1979, of a security agreement with Saudi Arabia, Iraq cracked down on Communists inside Iraq in a move which raised questions as to its future relations with Moscow. The treaty was maintained and one of the leading interpretations of the Iraqi crackdown was that 1) it wanted to eliminate the possibility of domestic troubles, and 2) it was eager to reassure the West as well as the moderate Arab states as to its intentions.

Among the interpretations given to the Saudi-Iraqi decision, one, put forth by AL NAHAR's columnist Marwan Iskandar said that its importance derives from the fact that the two countries are major oil-producing nations. They jointly produce 48 percent of all OPEC's oil and that the industrialized world could not, at this stage, bear a reduction in oil production superior to 30 percent of the current level. He said that this will prompt the EEC nations, Japan and the United States to avoid recognizing Jerusalem as the capital of Israel because the Saudi-Iraqi declaration is tantamount to a warning that they would resort to the oil weapon to serve the Middle East cause.

However, western diplomatic sources in Beirut were reported in the press last week as saying that although selective economic measures, including the rupture of oil contracts, could be imposed against individual countries, it was unlikely that there would be any general use of the oil weapon. The sources said that both Saudi Arabia and Iraq have recently resisted pressures from Arab hardline states to cut their oil production.

In this context, the declaration made earlier this week by Saudi Crown Prince Fahd could be taken as yet another warning which represents the position of most of the Gulf states this time since the joint declaration was backed by at least 8 Arab states so far: Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Qatar, Algeria, Jordan, North Yemen and Mauritania.

An Iraqi-Saudi Axis. The major question now is whether one can speak of a Saudi-Iraqi axis or whether one of the two countries will emerge as a polarizing Arab power around which all the others would rally. For some observers, it is Saudi Arabia which will assume the leading part because of a number of conditions that were not available before.

The main condition is the decision which Israel took in regard to the status of Jerusalem. The matter has been deemed serious enough to prompt Arab states to forget about their marginal and secondary conflicts to pool their efforts in the face of the new challenge posed to them. As one observer put it, the road to Arab unity passes through Jerusalem.

The second condition which contributes to promote the role and leadership of Saudi Arabia is the fact that the oil-rich kingdom is the only Arab state which maintains sound and balanced relations with all Arab states, from the most moderate to the most radical, including Marxist-oriented

South Yemen. In recent weeks it has also improved its relations with Syria and the thaw in their relations was overtly proclaimed when the Syrian president's brother, Rifaat Al Assad, made a visit to Saudi Arabia last month requesting its assistance to fight the Moslem Brotherhood organization.

Saudi Arabia also maintains relations with Egypt, despite its opposition to the Camp David accords and the separate peace treaty signed between Egypt and Israel.

This promotes the idea that Saudi Arabia will lead the movement for Arab unity or at least Arab consensus on a joint strategy to face the coming stages of the Middle East peace process. In addition, the declaration made by Saudi Crown Prince Fahd Ben Abdel Aziz marked a clear hardening of the Saudi position and precluded the possibility of a Saudi participation in the Middle East peace process in the near future and the current conditions. The declaration, marking a clear-cut position, is bound to lead to a definite rapprochement between Saudi Arabia and the hardline states.

CREATION OF ARAB MONEY MARKET URGED

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 4-5 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

RIYADH, Sept. 3 (SPA) -- Saudi Arabia Wednesday called for greater Arab role in international finance and for a broad-ranging Arab money market to boost the Arab world's economic development. Finance Minister Sheikh Muhammed Aba Al-Khail said the Arabs should be more active in world financial institutions and also play a positive role in interntional currency reform. He was addressing a conference of governors of Arab central banks in Riyadh.

The governor of the Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency (SAMA), Sheikh Abdul Aziz Al-Quraishi urged an Arab strategy at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank in Washington next month.

This would help reduce the impact of world inflation and instability of major currencies in Arab economies, he said.

He said that although Arab governments with funds had been helping needy Arab states, there was still a pressing need for private Arab capital participation in economic development financing.

This could only be achieved through an unrestricted and sophisticated Arab money market, Sheikh Abdul Aziz said. He urged government support for existing Arab financial markets.

The Finance Minister said his government continued to support common Arab economic ventures without reservations.

"We hope the coming decade will be a decade of joint development to raise living standards in the Arab world," he added.

Earlier meeting of the governors of central banks and monetary authorities in Islamic states adopted here a number of resolutions including the seating of the Palestine Liberation Organization — PLO — at the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank as observers.

The World Bank had rejected, under American pressure, an application by the PLO to sit at its meetings as an observer. Now this application receives the support of the major bankers of the Arab and Islamic states which the bank may find even more difficult to ignore.

The final communique of the Muslim governors also decided to promote trade exchanges and the reduction of barriers put up against inter-Islamic imports. It called for increased trade by direct or indirect means and the transfer of capital from one state to the other without much difficulty.

ARAB STATES AGREE TO UNIFY PENAL CODE, SECURITY PLANS

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 31 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Jeddah, Aug. 30 (SPA)--Arab interior ministers have agreed on a wide-ranging $30 million master security plan for the Arab world, the Interior Ministry announced Friday evening.

The plan is aimed at reducing crime, improving inter-Arab law enforcement and organizing Arab penal codes into a common system based upon the Sharia, Islamic law. The ministers were holding their third conference in Taif.

The program, which runs between 1981 and 1983, will be financed by a joint Arab fund. The cost will be borne by member states and through voluntary donations from Arab countries.

Improvements will be made in the training of Arab security men, and funds will be made available for the purchase of better communications and laboratory facilities, weapons and cars.

A system will be devised under the plan to inform Arabs about the negative effects of certain types of entertainment, and touristic and cultural programs.

The special body set up to unify Arab penal codes will work out their administrative and technical structure along with other religious, cultural and social programs. Arab countries will be bound by the body's opinions and recommendations.

The ministers also decided to create a committee to monitor the media. The carefully selected committee members will define fixed criteria and will grade the materials reviewed as follows: good for all citizens, good for adults only, nefarious for security and public morals, and without any redeemable social value.

A joint command will regulate the operations of frontier guards to prevent smuggling, and cooperation will also be improved between Arab customs officials.

An Interior Minister's Council will be set up in the Arab League to prepare a final draft of the program which the Interior ministers will approve at their next meeting. Member states will then specify their financial commitments to the master security plan.

ORIGIN, STRUCTURE OF ORGANIZATION OF ISLAMIC CONFERENCE STUDIED

Mecca THE JOURNAL OF THE MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE in English Aug 80 pp 27-31

[Text]

The Organisation of the Islamic Conference is the premier international body representing nearly one billion Muslims all over the world. It represents the fulfilment of their desire to work towards the realisation of their common aspirations for unity and co-operation in political, economic, social and cultural fields.

The idea for setting up such a representative Islamic International Organisation was put forward at the Rabat Summit meeting of Muslim Heads of State and Government. The OIC now comprises 42 member states (two namely, Egypt and Afghanistan are currently suspended from membership) and several observer organizations, including the observer status of Nigeria and the Turkish Federated State of Kibris.

The Heads of State and Government of 24 Muslim States met for the first time in September 1969 at Rabat to express their grief and stock at the sacriligeous act of burning of Holy Al Aqsa Mosque of Jerusalem in August 1969.

The leaders participating in the Islamic Summit in Rabat also took the opportunity to express together their conviction that "their common creed constitutes a powerful factor bringing their peoples closer together and fostering understanding between them." They declared that "their Governments shall consult together with a view to promoting between themselves a close co-operation and mutual assistance in the economic, scientific, cultural and spiritual fields, inspired by the immortal teachings of Islam." The Summit also decided to set up the Islamic Conference Organisation with its Secretariat in Jeddah.

In accordance with the Declaration of the Rabat Conference, the Foreign Ministers of the Islamic Conference held their first meeting at Jeddah on 23-25 March, 1970.

The Third Conference of Islamic Foreign Ministers held in Jeddah in 1972 adopted the Charter of the Organisation of Islamic Conference which laid down the following objectives for the Islamic Conferece:

(a) to promote Islamic solidarity among member States;

(b) to consolidate co-operation among member States in the economic, social, cultural, scientific and other vital fields of activities, and to carry out consultations among member States in international organisations;

(c) to endeavour to eliminate racial segregation, discrimination and to eradicate colonialism in all its forms;

(d) take necessary measures to support international peace and security founded on justice;

(e) to co-ordinate efforts for the safeguard of the Holy Places and support of the struggle of the people of Palestine, and help them to regain their rights and liberate their land;

(f) to strengthen the struggle of all Muslim peoples with a view to safeguarding their dignity, independence and national rights;

(g) to create a suitable atmosphere for the promotion of co-operation and understanding among member States and other countries.

The Charter also laid down that in order to realise the objectives mentioned in the preceding paragraph the member States shall be inspired and guided by the following principles:

(a) Total equality between member States;

(b) Respect of the right of self-determination, and non-interference in the domestic affairs of member States;

(c) Respect of the sovereignty independence and territorial integirity of each member State;

(d) Settlement of any conflict that may arise by peaceful menas such as negotiation, mediation, reconciliation or arbitration;

(e) Abstention from the threat or use of force against the territorial integirity, national unity or political independence of any member State.

The Charter also provides that the Conference is composed of the following:

i. The Conference of Kings and Heads of State and Government;

ii. The Conference of Foreign Ministers; and

iii. The General Secretariat and the subsidiary organs.

Subsidiary Bodies

The work of the Organisation of the Islamic Conference extends to all aspects of co-operation among the nearly one billion Muslims all around the world. In nearly a decade of its existence the Islamic Conference has been able to establish close co-operation among member States in the political, economic and cultural fields and an institutional framework has been created for the achievement of these purposes. Following are the main organs and subsidiary bodies of the Conference.

ICEA&SA

The Islamic Commission for Economic, Cultural and Social Affairs is the principal organ of the Conference which supervises the implementation of the resolutions of the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers. After a thorough review of the progress of implementation of these resolutions, the Commission makes recommendations to the Annual Foreign Ministers Conference for their decisions. Thus, the Islamic Commission plays the dual role of supervision and of making recommendations of future course of action.

The idea of establishing the Islamic Commission was conceived at the Second Islamic Summit held in Lahore in 1974.

The Lahore Summit decided to establish a Committee of Representatives and Experts from Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Algeria, Egypt, Kuwait, Libya, and the UAE for devising ways and means for the attainment of the following objectives:

i. Eradication of poverty, disease and ignorance from the Islamic world;

ii. Regulating the terms of trade between developed, and developing countries and improving the supply of raw material and import of manufactured goods and know-how;

iv. Ensuring the sovereignty of Muslim states, and eradicating control of the developed countries over their natural resources;

v. Mitigating current economic difficulties of the developing countries due to recent increase in prices; and

vi. Mutual co-operation and solidarity among Muslim countries.

This committee later evolved into the Islamic Commision for Economic, Cultural and Social Affairs and was instituted by a resolution of the Seventh Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers held in Islamabad in May 1976. The Istanbul Resolution visualised for the Commission the role of supervision, co-ordination and review of the efforts to promote economic co-operation among Islamic countries. The first Session of the Islamic Commission was held at Karachi in December 1977. The Commission which meets bi-annually has so far held 5 Sessions. Its last session was held in Conakry (Guinea) in January 1980. The recommendations of this session came up for consideration at the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers, held in Islamabad.

Islamic Solidarity Fund

One of the major decisions of the Lahore Islamic Summit was to establish a fund to be called

Islamic Solidarity Fund to meet the needs and requirements of Islamic unity, Islamic causes, enhancement of Islamic culture, values and universities. The objective of Islamic Solidarity Fund is to do everything possible to promote the status of Muslims in the world, safeguard their faith, support the solidarity and struggle in all fields, especially in the following areas:

1. Alleviating the consequences and results of crises, natural calamities and social conditions that may befall the Islamic countries and communities and providing the necessary material aid.

2. Organising the granting of material aid and assistance to the Islamic countries, minorities and communities to raise their religious, cultural and social standard and contributing to the construction of mosques, hospitals and schools that may be needed.

3. Organising the dissemination of Islamic Da'wah, the message, precepts and ideals of Islam, and supporting the Islamic centres in Islamic countries and elsewhere for the good of Islamic communities and the dissemination of Islamic thought.

4. Promoting scientific and technological research, establishing and financing Islamic Universities wherever required in response to the needs of the modern world and supporting the existing universities.

5. Supporting and organising activities of the Muslim youth in the world in spiritual, social and sports fields.

6. Organising seminars of leading experts and specialists working in Islamic fields to consider the issues of ligislation, codification, administration, economics, culture and science that should be manifest in Islamic thought, as needed by the Islamic world.

7. The execution of all other projects adopted by the Islamic Conference and whose implementation falls within the jurisdiction of the Islamic Solidarity Fund. The planning and preparation of the programme of action of the Islamic Solidarity Fund is carried out by a permanent Council.

The present outlay on the activities of the Fund for the year 1980-81 is expecteed to be around US Dollars 20 million. The main heads of allocations of expenditure of the Fund are: disasters and catastrophes; Mosques; hospitals and schools; community and minorities; propagation of the Islamic Dawah and consolidation of Islamic centres and associations; promotion of scientific research and financing of Islamic universities; protection of Muslim youth; study seminars; fight against the Judaization of Jerusalem; activities related to the advent of the Fifteenth Hijra Century and running expenses.

Jerusalem Committee

During the Arab-Israeli war in June 1967, Israel had occupied the whole of the West Bank and Ghaza Strip including Jerusalem. For the Israelis, it was the fulfilment of an ancient Jewish dream resurrected by the Zionist movement. On the other hand, the loss of Jerusalem was a historic setback for the Muslims, particularly the Arabs, whose difficulties were aggravated due to dislocation of Arabs from their ancestral homes and properties.

Openly defying the international law and the insistence of the international community on the temporary nature of the occupation, the Israeli authorities embarked upon a policy of integrating the occupied Arab lands with the political and economic system of Israel. Israel's designs on Jerusalem became abundantly clear when it declared Jerusalem as its capital and insisted that it would never give up the Holy City. Since their occupation of Jerusalem in June, 1967, the Israeli authorities have pursued a premeditated plan of systematic obliteration of the physical, demographic and cultural heritage and features of the Holy City with a view to presenting the world with fait accompli.

The Palestine question has been of central concern to the Islamic Conference. Exhaustive and comprehensive resolutions have been passed by all the Islamic Conferences held so far, calling for immediate and unconditional vacation of occupied Arab territories, recognition of the inalienable national rights of Palestinians represented by their sole legitimate representative, the PLO, and the restoration of the Holy City of Jerusalem to Arab-Islamic soveriegnty. For this purpose a Permanent Committee was established in 1975 and entrusted with following tasks:

i. To study development of the situation in Jerusalem.

ii. To follow up the implementation of the resolutions of the Islamic Conference and those passed by other International Oraganisations on Jerusalem.

iii. To submit to member States and all concerned organisations proposals of appropriate measures to be taken to face new developments or implement resolutions.

The Tenth Islamic Confernece of Foreign Ministers held at Fez (Morocco) in May 1979 decided that Jerusalem Committee should meet at the Foreign Ministers level under the chairmanship of King Hassan II of Morocco. It was also decieded to dedicate the Tenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers to Palestine and Al-Quds and to declare the year 1400 A.H. corresponding to 1980 A.D. as the year of the Holy Jerusalem. The Fez Confernce considered the liberation of City of Al-Quds and the preservation of its Islamic reponsibility. The last session of the Jerusalem Committee was held at Marrakesh under the chairman ship of King Hassan II of Morocco in March 1980.

Jerusalem Fund

In order to counter the Judaization policy of the Israeli occupation authorities and to sustian the heroic resistance of the Palestinian Arab population in Jerusalem and other occupied territories, a Jerusalem Fund was set up in 1976. The Jerusalem Fund is administered by an autonomous goverining board of the members, including the PLO which is elected by the Jerusalem Committee for two years term.

Chamber of Commerce

In order to promote co-operation in the commercial and industrial fields, through the private sectros within Islamic world, the Islamic Cahmber of Commerce, Industry and Commodities Exchange has been established with headquarters at Karachi.

The Islamic Chamber has been charged with encouraging trade, industry and agriculture and promotion of investment and joint ventures in Islamic countries.

The Firts Assembly of the Islamic Chamber met at Dakar from 24-28 February 1980. The Headquaters of the Islamic Chamber at Karachi were for mally inaugurated by the President of Pakistan in April 1980. While inaugurating the Chamber, the President said:

"The Islamic Chamber of Commerce & Industry has the distinction that its member-countires possess almost all economic inputs for progress and prosperity. By the Grace of Allah, the oil revenues have generated a large amount of foreign exchange. Skilled manpower is available in abundance. There is no dearth of raw material. The deficiency in the technological field can be overcome in a short period through a judicious use of capable personnel and foreign exchange. What is needed is that we should utilize all our resources through mutual co-operation in the true spirit of Islam, so as to promote the progress and prosperity of all mankind. Therefore, I feel that the Islamic Chamber of Commerce and Industry should set for itself the important task of preparing ground for joint industrial ventures in the various member states with the co-operation of the private sector. The Islamic Chamber should prepare the blue prints of practicable industrial and agricultural plans for such ventures so as to enable the Islamic world to emerge into a new age of trade and industry."

Islamic News Agency

The Islamic world was in dire need of its own news collection and distribution services in order to raise the voice of Islam and bring communities spread all over the world, closer together. Therefore, the IINA has been set up at Jeddah to increase exchange of information.

When fully functional, the IINA will be maiking a vital contribution to the unity and co-operation among member states of the Islamic Conference. Currently the IINA transmissions in English and Arabic are being received by 19 countires.

In the present climate of misunderstanding and distortion of the news of the Muslim world, the IINA can be an effective instrument for a correct projection of the events and developments in the Muslim world.

Broadcasting Organization

With a view to creating greater consciousness of the identity and destiny of the Muslim Ummah, an Islamic States Broadcasting Organisation (ISBO) has been set up at Jeddah.

The ISBO has also been charged with dissemination of Dawah Al-Islamiah. The ISBO will thus be performing the vital functions of spreading the message of Islam and correcting the extraneous values and practices that have crept into Muslim communities in various parts of the world.

There is a great need to disseminate the message of Islam to all parts of the world. The ISBO programmes are explaining the simple and rational religion of Islam and are thus helping to remove prejudices spread by foreign sources.

Ankara Research Centre

In order to facilitate the overall economic development of the Ummah, the Islamic Conference felt the need for an indigenouseconomic and social research and training centre of its own. A Centre for Statistical, Economic and Social Research and Training was, therefore, established in Ankara in 1978. The basic functions of the Centre are:

(a) Collection, collation and dissemination of information on economic and social status of the member states with a view to developing data bank of the Islamic community;

(b) Study of evolution of economic and social development in the member states with a view to generating proposals that will initiate and enhance economic co-operation among the member states.

(c) Organisation of training programmes geared to the need of member states as well as to the overalll economic objectives of the Islamic Conference.

Dacca Centre

To meet the need of skilled manpower and instructors in technology and trades a Centre for Technical and Vocational Training and Research has been established in Dacca. The Centre became operational in May 1979. The Centre has the following objectives:

(a) To train instructors, technicians and tradesmen in technology and trades needed in member states;

(b) to conduct research on the requirements of technical and vocational education of the Islamic countries.

(c) to initiate, promote and guide technological and technical research having a bearing on problems connected with the development of manpower and technical and vocational education.

(d) to promote technical co-operation, exchange technical know-how and disseminate basic informations in the field of human resources in general and technical vocational education in particular.

History, Art and Culture

A research centre for Islamic History Art and Culture is being set up at Istanbul with the generous donation of the Islamic Solidarity Fund, Saudi Arabia and the Government of Turkey. The objectives laid down for the Research Centre are:

(a) to set up an instituion where scientists, historians, writers and artists from Islamic countries will carry out research on the common cultural heritage of Muslims in order to promote better understanding among Muslims all over the world.

(b) to create objective conditions for close co-operation among historians and writers of member states in order to eradicate the preiudices spread by some foreign writers regarding the history of art and culture of Islamic people.

(c) to publish books, monographs and to arrange seminars and symposia for a better under standing of the cultural and historical environment of Islam.

In addition to the above, projects for the establishment of several other specialised subsdiary agencies like the Islamic Science Foundation, Commission for Preservation of Islamic Cultural Heritage, International Committee of Red Crescent, Islamic University in Niger and Uganda and Islamic Centre in Guinea-Bissau have been taken up by the Islamic Conference.

Islamic Development Bank

There was a long-standing desire on the part of the Muslim countries to co-operate in the task of financing economic development and to establish an interest-free banking system. To this end concerted efforts had been made by Muslim scholars in several countries. The culmination of this process came with the setting up of the Islamic Deveopment Bank at Jeddah.

The purpose of the Bank is to foster economic development and social progress of member countries, and Muslim communities. Membership to the Bank is open to all members of the Islamic Conference.

The functions of the Islamic Development Bank are to invest in equity capital and in productive projects and enterprises in member countries. It also extends loans to the private and public sector for the financing of productive projects, enterprises and programmes in member countries.

Islamic Banks Association

In order to meet the growing demand for guidance and expertise in setting up Banks which would function strictly according to the Islamic Shariah, an International Association of Islamic Banks has been set up with headquarters at Mecca. The organisation aims at strengthening ties between Islamic Banks and has the following objectives:

(a) Giving technical assistance and expertise to Islamic communities wishing to establish Islamic Bank.

(b) Establishing procedure regarding setting up of Islamic Banks and encouragement of their activites and their evolution.

(c) Seeking promotion of free capital movement between the Islamic Banks; and

(d) Undertaking research on money, credit and banking and prepare guidelines for Islamic Banks.

DAYAN INTERVIEWED ON WEST BANK, PALESTINIAN ISSUES

TA271447 Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Interview with Moshe Dayan by Shim'on Ayalon "in Dayan's home" near Tel Aviv; date not given--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Dayan] I think that, basically speaking, Egypt and Israel do see eye to eye what the peace treaty means and are ready to honor it and implement it, to live up to it, but the major point which there are differences of opinion is the Palestinian issue and here are two elements. The first is that the Egyptians said, right from the beginning, that they cannot and will not have a separate peace, so, legally, we got the Israeli-Egyptian treaty standing on its own footing, but politically the Egyptians said, and it is the true political position, that they cannot just take care of their own interests, have Sinai, etc., but they must have at least another party joining this peace process and the only party--not just another one, the only one--are the Palestinians. Here you can't really expect the Syrians to come in and now Lebanon is under the Syrian control and when we talk about Jordan, or the Palestinians, practically it is the same.

We have no conflict with Jordan, with the Jordanian kingdom as such, east of the river Jordan. So, when some of the Israeli parties say that they want a Jordanian option, what would they discuss with Jordan? They will discuss the West Bank and Gaza and when others say that we have to negotiate, or to reach an agreement with the Palestinians, it's about the same people and the same territory and the same problems of Jerusalem, etc. So, the--not only the next--one, but practically the only one country, or issue, that should be dealt with after the peace treaty with Egypt is the Palestinian one and I think that here there are major differences of views.

[Question] Do you think that there is any way that Israel can come to some arrangement with the Palestinian Arabs, which will definitely not include any representatives of the PLO?

[Answer] That depends on what you mean by representatives of the PLO. I think that the answer is yes, I do think so, that we can reach not a written agreement, or signed agreement, but in reality situation, by which both parties would cooperate, like the open bridges or the working of the Arabs from Gaza Strip and the West Bank in Israel. There is no agreement about that, but it is a fact, it is reality, with no written agreement. Now, talking about representatives of the PLO, I am sure that many of the Palestinian mayors and others are devoted, theoretically or ideologically, PLO, just like others who sit in Lebanon. I don't think they are engaged in terrorism. I am talking about the mayors; but who is planting explosives every week or so in Israel? It's not coming from over the border, it's done by Palestinian Arabs here, so, what I am trying to say is that I think that we can reach an unwritten, unsigned agreement, a de facto agreement, about how to live together and it will not be an ideal one; probably the Arabs will take it only as a stage, a first stage, keeping their aspiration for a Palestinian state to be implemented one day, but cooperating in the meantime, during the transitional period. I do think that they will consult with the PLO, they will go to Beirut, they will meet Yasir 'Arafat, they will try to coordinate with them what they do, they would listen to the PLO, but I think that, one way or another, we can insist and achieve it, get it, that the people that we would be dealing with would be only those that live in here, in the territories here, in the West Bank and Gaza and those that we have no criminal charge against them, that they stayed free.

[Question] When we look at the events in the West Bank over the past year or so, there seems to be a growing trend toward extremism amongst the Arabs of these areas.

[Answer] How about Israel? Isn't it the same?

[Question] The extremism has also been growing in Israel....

[Answer] And in Poland and....

[Question] You have recently been meeting, over the past year or so, with a number of Arab leaders and, most recently, with, once more, with the mayor of Gaza, Mr Rashad al-Shawwa. Would you say that there is a growing extremism amongst the general Arab populace, or are we just seeing a fringe element here?

[Answer] I want to tell you that every time that I meet with an Arab leader or representative, I get out more encouraged and this is with the recent cases, too. Now, the way that I see it, there is a distinction between two issues. The first is their ideology. Ideology, and aspiration--you are right about that. What can you expect a Palestinian mayor to say, or think, when the European countries call for a Palestinian state? Do you want him to be less Palestinian than the head of state of the European community? Surely not. So, as far as their aspiration for self-determination, Palestinian state and that we should go back to the old line and dismantle the Israeli settlements and move the Israeli forces, they are absolutely extreme in their formulas and their aspiration and demands, etc. But, on the other hand, when you talk business, practical issues; for instance, I think they would hate more than anyone else to see another war here and they are scared about it, because, if there will be a war between us and any of the Arab neighboring countries, then the first victims would be the Arabs and they would become refugees and I am just quoting what they tell me, that if something like that would happen between Jordan and Israel, Nabulus would be destroyed and finished and they had enough of becoming refugees.

Or, the other point, over which all of them really, not only agree, but they, it's their desire, to keep the free access, free coming and going between their territories and, their places and Israel, between Gaza and Israel, between Nabulus and Israel; of man and goods. They want to keep it. None of them want to reestablish the barrier between the West Bank, or Gaza, and Israel. All of them want to go on the way it is now. As a matter of fact, it's an unbelievable picture. I think that this year more than 130,000 summer visitors--not Arabs who live in the West Bank and Gaza, but Arabs who come from other countries, Syria, Saudi Arabia, etc., they cross the Jordan bridges, come to visit their relatives, but they do go to Tel Aviv and Netanya and why wouldn't they, without any checkpost, without any restrictions. So this kind of way of life is not only acceptable, but I think that the Arabs, the Palestinians would not like to give it up. They don't have any alternative for their people looking for jobs or for their commodities that they want to sell, vegetables or fish that they catch in Gaza, etc.

So, what--trying to answer your question--there is more extremism now, in ideology, in aspirations and they really want it, it's not just for export when they say that. They really want it, but, on the other hand, they want to achieve it by political means and they don't want to be cut away from Israel, so when I think about what can be done and if I really avoid, say, let's say, cut out and forget about the war, on their initiative, count it out, and that they would like to keep the free contact with Israel.

[Question] You mentioned the fact that Europe, the position that Europe has taken; do you think that Israel has become more isolated amongst the countries of the world, not only because of the growing threat, the actual use of the Arab oil weapon, but because, really, when it boils down to it, all of the rest of the world, including the United States, would be a lot happier if Israel were to just cease to exist and to get rid of the headache?

[Answer] Almost, I would accept and agree with you, but with slight modification of the formula. I agree that they would be happier--I wouldn't generalize and say everybody, all the countries, and America, it's too much. There are distinctions. But, let's talk about most of the European countries. Leave alone America, for the moment. I think that they feel that they would be better off without Israel, but, when you talk about Israel ceasing to exist, that is to say, once that this, that the country is a fact and that the way that the conclusion from your formulation should be that Israel would be destroyed, or something like that, liquidated, then I don't think that they really think or that they would have liked to see that. So they are just ignoring hard facts and they are looking for some formula that would satisfy their interests, but they wouldn't say, and I think that in the bottom of their hearts they wouldn't support the destruction of Israel; but, had Israel had to be established now, they would rather not have Israel than establishing it or supporting it.

[Question] When it comes to the crunch, how much can Israel rely on these countries and what can Israel do to combat this...?

[Answer] To rely less on these countries, to insist on our most essential things and not to deal with, or to take such action which are not essential. Not to add to the anti-Israel feeling, the more by such action that we are taking which are not really essential for ourself, but, on the other hand, things that are essential for ourself, we have to go on doing them, like establishing, building settlements in the West Bank and Gaza and keeping the Israeli forces and keeping Jerusalem as our capital and enlarging the Israeli Jewish population in Jerusalem. I think these elements are very essential for ourself and we should go on doing it whether other people like it or they don't like it and if they tell us that we shouldn't have--I am talking about West Jerusalem--that we shouldn't have that as our capital, we should tell them, mind your own business. I can use even stronger words about that. Say, what do you mean by that? Are you really going to tell us where our capital is? Is anyone really questioning that West Jerusalem is a part, a legitimate part of Israel? Even those that want us to go back, even the Arabs that say that we have to go back to the 1967 lines, they do not really include West Jerusalem in the area that we have to evacuate. So, if we want to have our capital in West Jerusalem, how can they say that we can't do it, that we shouldn't do it, they won't recognize it? Of course they can, that's what they do, but I think that we shouldn't listen to them and so that's what they want, but we have to go on our way and this is the only answer to the conflict. But, on the other hand, we really have to avoid taking such actions that are not essential and really necessary for our security or for our national objectives.

'JERUSALEM POST' PUBLISHES DATA ON PROPOSED AMENDED BUDGET

TA241203 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 24 Sep 80 pp 1, 15

[Report by Meir Merhav and Shlomo Maoz: "Treasury To Print IS2.56 Billion; IS5 Billion Deficit in New IS90 Billion Budget Proposal"]

[Text] The Ministerial Economic Committee yesterday tabled an updated 1980/81 budget of 90.1 billion shekels in the cabinet, with a deficit of 5.22 billion shekels, based on an expected inflation rate of 123 percent. It was also announced the treasury now expects it will have to print 2.56 billion shekels, far more than the originally planned 2 billion shekels.

The government has not concluded its discussion of the updated budget, which includes a proposal for a further 7 percent cut in the purchases and investment outlays of the various ministries. The discussion will be resumed on Friday, when the cabinet will also have to decide what, if any, tax concessions to abolish and whether to raise taxes. Proposals to at least partially reduce the budget deficit by increasing taxes are still on the agenda.

If the cabinet approves the proposals of the Ministerial Economic Committee on Friday, the updated budget will be tabled in the Knesset immediately after the recess, in the second week of October. Delay in Knesset approval may create serious difficulties for the government ministries, who will be left without a legal allocation of funds.

The forecast deficit of 5.22 billion shekels is exactly twice as large as the 2.61 billion shekels deficit provided for the original budget proposal.

The government's domestic excess demand--the difference between the total demand generated by government outlays and the foreign currency expenditures--is estimated at 5.46 billion shekels. The original budget had foreseen a 350 million shekel surplus of receipts over outlays--for example, an absorption of demand by the government.

The increase in the deficit is the combined result of shortfalls in revenue and of government spending beyond the limits foreseen in the original budget. Wage payments were 1 billion shekels higher than expected, various subsidies paid by the government cost 880 million shekels more than foreseen--mainly because price increases were delayed--and 1.1 billion shekels more than predicted were transferred to the local authorities.

Revenues fell short of what was foreseen by 880 million shekels mainly because imports fell off and the purchase of durable consumer goods declined. In addition, the national insurance institute and the local authorities failed to collect all the money due them, because the necessary legislation which had been planned, was not passed.

While the government expects to generate an excess demand of 5.46 billion shekels in the entire fiscal year, data for the first five months already show an excess demand of 2.8 billion shekels. However, treasury economists believe that the inflationary pressures that boosted the government's excess demand in the first half of the year will be considerably weaker in the second half.

Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz is due to leave next Sunday for the annual meeting of the board of governors of the International Monetary Fund, and will be absent for three weeks.

The adjustment of the budget to the rate of inflation was foreseen by the treasury when it presented its first budget, based on an expected inflation rate of 65 percent. The original budget proposal stated that if inflation was higher than that the ministries would have to absorb the additional cost.

That, however, was not accomplished.

The present budget proposal says that in order to maintain the real level of expenditure foreseen in the original budget, it would have had to be 85 percent larger than the 1979 budget, whereas the nominal increase was originally held to only 54 percent.

In the first half of the fiscal year, the new budget proposal says, expenditure cuts of some 1.7 billion shekels have been effected: 880 million shekels in defence; 350 million shekels in housing: 280 million shekels by cuts in government employment; 110 million shekels by the eliminating of various government activities; and another 100 million shekels through efficiency measures.

The updated budget is 38 percent bigger than the original budget, and 112 percent bigger, nominally, than the 1979 budget.

On the revenue side, the budget is predicated on collection of 45 percent more in income taxes (as compared with a 38 percent increase in the total budget), but only 15.5 percent more from value added tax, and virtually no change--signifying a decrease in real terms--in other indirect taxes, such as customs duties, and purchase tax.

The treasury expects that revenue from the employers tax, which originally was expected to bring in 1.37 billion shekels, will yield 2.55 billion shekels--nearly twice as much as budgeted in the beginning of the year.

Informed sources doubt the realism of these revenue estimates, and consider them an attempt to reduce the visible size of the budget deficit. If these revenue estimates are not realized, these sources say, the actual budget deficit may well be 2 billion shekels larger than provided for in the budget, and total 7.5-8 billion shekels.

The same sources also point out that the updated budget includes 12.1 billion shekels in domestic loans--some 51 percent more than foreseen in the original budget. This amount includes 2.1 billion shekels from national insurance, which is 400 million shekels less than originally expected. The money to be raised from gover bonds and other domestic loans is therefore now estimated at nearly twice as much as in the original budget.

ISRAELI PRESS COMMENTS ON IRAQ-IRAN CONFLICT

TA270640 [Editorial Report] The Israeli press commentators on 26 September 1980 are in general agreement that the current Iran-Iraq conflict, while superficially weakening two of Israel's enemies, may well represent a serious threat in the future.

JERUSALEM POST in English on 26 September carries a commentary by David Richardson, pages two and three, entitled "Winds of Gulf War Blow Ill for Israel," in which he states that "the strategic implications for Israel of the fighting in the Persian Gulf are seen by local analysts as at best of short-term benefit, while an Iraqi victory would eventually pose a serious threat." The eastern front against Israel may well be weakened for the moment, but whether there is a clear Iraqi victory or a stalemate--local analysts appear to agree that Iraq has emerged strengthened and potentially dangerous. It is in this context they recall Baghdad's bid for a nuclear capability."

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew on 26 September 1980 carries a commentary by Amir Oren entitled "Al-Nasir of the 1980's" in which he compares Saddam Husayn with Al-Nasir in the former's aim to stand at the head of "three combined circles--the Arab, Muslim and the African." This is defined as the desire to replace Al-Sadat as the leader of the Third World movement toward "decolonialization" as well as eventual control of the Persian Gulf. After an analysis of the political situations in the neighboring Arab countries, the commentator discusses Saddam's policy of "maneuvering between Washington and Moscow. Both the superpowers have recently been courting Iraq, which treats them both with a mixture of benevolence and intransigence."

Further historical comparisons are made with Al-Nasir and precedents taken from the Pakistani-India conflict are quoted, stressing an "additional aspect: U.S. hesitation between the two hawks, when this time Brzezinski has been sentenced to play Kissinger's role of 9 years ago, perhaps once more as the person giving the presidential hint about 'inclination' to the benefit of one of the sides (then--Pakistan, now--perhaps--Iran) perhaps as the main witness of U.S. helplessness in its aim to influence the results." If navigation through the Straits of Hormuz is seriously disturbed, the commentator writes that "such a disturbance would provide Carter with justification to do what Lyndon Johnson did not do when Al-Nasir informed him of the blockade of the Straits of Tiran to Israeli navigation: use force." However, this would help Carter, but not Khomeyni, since Saddam Husayn would be the gainer from this.

Tel Aviv YEDI'OT AHARONOT in Hebrew on 26 September 1980 carries a commentary by Erol Guiney, entitled "The Israeli Angle in the Iraq/Iran Crisis,"in which he analyzes the implications for Israel of the current struggle, pointing out that the first conclusions to be drawn are that the "undisturbed flow of Middle East oil to the Western industrialized countries does not only depend on a solution to the Palestinian problem." Unfortunately world public opinion has not yet realized this; however, the current conflict may help Israel to make it plain that "the entire world--and especially the United Nations--is hypnotized by the Palestinian problem," out of all proportion to its genuine importance. This will be a difficult barrier to overcome and it will take time. In the meantime, if the fighting causes a further price increase in oil Israel will suffer greatly, along with the Western countries. There are other, no less important lessons to be learned from the conflict: while it may appear that Israel will benefit from Iraq and Iran, its enemies, weakening each other in the fighting, "this issue also has other aspects, such as, for example, the military experience these armies are acquiring as they fight." If it should occur that Iraq is the loser in the conflict "this should be regarded as a very positive development, since Saddam Husayn is Israel's most dangerous enemy" and if he emerges victorious and gains a nuclear potential sometime in the near future, "this is a thought that can make us shiver." However, the commentator thinks that Iraq will emerge victorious.

Aside from the military strength Iraq will then have gained, if Iran is vanquished the commentator predicts that the Soviet Union will increase its presence in the Persian Gulf. "It is hard to predict in advance what the Americans will do in such an event. If they do no more than they did after the invasion of Afghanistan, the situation will be bad; if they do more--taking advantage of the fact that they have some 30 warships and 2 aircraft carriers in the vicinity--there may be a danger of a clash between the superpowers." This is why both superpowers are now trying to end the conflict by use of the UN Security Council, "but the Soviet Union is in a more convenient position to use its influence since it has relations with both countries involved, while the United States has no relations with either of them."

For Israel the best solution would be for the UN Security Council to succeed in ending the conflict, since whoever emerges as victor in the conflict, Israel would eventually suffer and "if the victor is Iraq--somethat that appears to be a reasonable assumption--it may very well then turn its forces against Israel" Also using cooperation with Jordan and such a united front would be most dangerous for Israel. Israel's greatest fear is that the four Arab countries, Iraq, Jordan, Syria and Libya, should unite against it, but "for the moment this does not appear to be a realistic possibility." However, "anything can happen in the Middle East." "All the latest developments in the Persian Gulf emphasize the need to strengthen U.S.-Egyptian-Israeli cooperation." This does not necessarily mean U.S. bases on Israeli soil but should certainly include much broader cooperation in economic and military fields, which require further progress in the autonomy talks as a way of "paving the way for some sort of strategic cooperation between Israel and Egypt." This may be difficult, since the Iran-Iraq conflict may harden Al-Sadat's position so that he can present himself as a genuine rival of Iraq as the leader of the Arab world. If Egypt can only be made to understand that Iraq represents as great a threat to itself as to Israel and "if the Iranian people show enough commonsense to understand where Khomeynism is leading" then the current events in the Persian Gulf may actually have a positive result. The commentator concludes by saying that even if the Middle Eastern countries cannot be relied upon to use logic and commonsense, we may at least hope for the West to learn the most important moral: "their economy, and we may say that even their very existence, are in a most vulnerable situation as long as they continue to depend on oil from the Persian Gulf."

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew on 26 September 1980 carries a commentary by Shmu'el Segev, page nine, entitled "The Peace Agreement for Shatt al-'Arab Cancelled This Week by Iraq in the Course of the War Was Achieved Through Al-Sadat's Mediation in Order To Gain Baghdad's Support for a Settlement With Israel." After covering background history to the current conflict, Segev discusses the role played by Saddam Husayn in two sets of events: "The negotiations for the elimination of the Kurdish rebellion and the circumstances that led to this week's violent outbreak against Iran." The commentator details Saddam Husayn's past history, mentioning Al-Sadat's quarrel with Syria over additional settlements with Israel in the Golan Heights and Sinai, as a result of which Al-Sadat tried to "isolate Syria by guaranteeing Iraq's support for his moves." The author points out that "it would be a mistake to attribute the sudden conflagration on the Iraq/Iran border only to Saddam Husayn's desire for revenge." There are involved considerations of economics, oil and historic rivalry. These considerations are described in depth and the commentator concludes without any discussing any implications the war may have on Israel.

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew on 26 September 1980 carries a commentary on the Iran-Iraq war by Shmu'el Schnitzer, on page eleven, entitled "Flames in the Persian Gulf." Opening with the comment that "It is impossible to conquer a certain feeling of joy at hearing the reports of the severe blows Iran is taking in the opening stages of the war in the Persian Gulf," the commentator points out that, after all of Khomeyni's tirades against U.S.-Israeli imperialism, "the bitter truth is that the Iraqi attack was only made possible by the insane anti-U.S. policy of the Iranian revolutionary regime." It is true that the average Israeli inclines toward supporting Iraq in the conflict, because of the "pact signed between Khomeyni and Yasir 'Arafat." These two have nothing in common other than a hatred for Israel, but the pact could represent a serious threat. As for the U.S. role in the conflict, "the U.S. declaration of neutrality and the emphasis that it does not intend to intervene in the conflict between Iran and Iraq are the results of helplessness, not of a firm, well thought out policy." The United States "cannot be neutral in this conflict" since whoever wins, the results will affect oil supplies to the West and "if the Iraqis win, this will, to a great extent, also be a victory for the Soviet Union." The USSR has apparently given up hope of influence in Iran and now hopes to gain a strong foothold in Iraq "and nobody will believe that such a development is leaving Washington calm."

The commentator believes that the United States must intervene; "The Soviets have no need to intervene; the Iraqi army is doing its work even without the entry of Soviet units into action." If the superpowers do not actively intervene, it is clear that Khomeyni's regime will fall and Soviet influence in the area will increase.

The current conflict has also exposed another "lie" which is the theory that "it is necessary to supply semiprimitive societies with weapons so that they may defend themselves against Soviet expansionism." Iran was provided with enormous supplies of U.S. weapons and technology, but did not know how to use them and they have "disappeared from the face of the earth." A further lesson to be learned from the conflict is that "within the Muslim world there are contradictory interests no less severe than those existing in the Christian world." This situation may change, but in the meantime "no Muslim artillery is shooting at imperialist targets and much artillery is shooting at Muslim targets." The commentary concludes by saying: "Now the question arises of whether the belief that all the Muslims are capable of fighting together for a common cause is also not one of the fairy tales that do not stayd up to the test of reality. It was only a week ago that the conference of Muslim countries met in Fez and decided that a jihad against Israel must be prepared. Now the Persian Gulf is in the grip of flames; and if there is anything in this to cause concern, there is, paradoxically, also something that can cause us to relax."

BRIEFS

JERUSALEM LAW--Tel Aviv--Just over half the public supports the enactment of the basic law: Jerusalem, according to the latest JERUSALEM POST poll conducted by the Modi'in Ezrahi Applied Research Centre among a representative selection of 1,289 adults. In response to the question: "Do you think the basic law: Jerusalem should have been enacted by the Knesset?", 51.7 percent said yes, 41.7 percent said no, and 6.6 percent were undecided. According to centre director 'Amiram Yarqoni, a high level of support for the Jerusalem Law was found among the young (67.9 percent of the 18-22 age group), primary-school leavers (59.7 percent), orientals (62.5 percent), religious (71.1 percent), lowest income (60.3 percent), blue-collar workers (62.6 percent), Moshavniks (83.1 percent), supporters of the Likud (75.3 percent), the National Religious Party (70.1 percent) and Tehiya (94.4 percent). Opponents of the law were found among the better educated and the better-off, western communities, the secular, and labor supporters. W. BANK, GAZA CORRIDOR--Egypt is seeking the creation of a corridor between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank to establish a Palestinian territorial continuity between the two areas in which autonomy is to be implemented. Our political reporter says this is one of the demands contained in a document presented by Egypt to the U.S. administration in Washington. Political circles in Jerusalem have rejected the demand out of hand. Our reporter also says that in contacts with the U.S. administration the Egyptians expressed disappointment with the reports submitted by U.S. autonomy negotiator Sol Linowitz. Egypt said the document accepted Israeli position about substantive issues relating to the implementation of the autonomy plan. NEW PRIME MINISTER OUTLINES POLICY IN FIRST MAJOR INTERVIEW

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 19 Jul 80 pp 20-21

[Interview with Jordanian Prime Minister Qasim al-Rimawi by Hani Khayr, in Amman; date not given]

> [Text] In His First Press Interview, Prime Minister al-Rimawi Says: "Jordan Is Looking for New Sources of Energy and Weapons.
> "Palestinian Question Has Been in Existence Before Resolution 242 Was Passed. Jordan, Therefore, Has Called for an Alternative Resolution To Achieve a Just and Comprehensive Peace."

Three weeks filled with work and responsibilities have so far gone by since the government of Dr Qasim al-Rimawi was formed. He participated in the funeral of his brother-in-law, the late al-Sharif 'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf; he conducted the affairs of his cabinet which he was charged to form and which he reformed in less than 24 hours; he showed interest in the Conference of Arab Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Economy which was held in Amman; he showed interest in the Conference of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of Islamic Countries which was also held in Amman; and he made preparations to host the Arab Summit Conference which is supposed to be held next fall in the Jordanian capital.

Dr al-Rimawi has been as busy as the mother of a bridegroom and the mother of a bride. He has not slowed down, and he has not rested. Even though Dr Rimawi's policy will be a continuation of the Jordanian policy established by his predecessor, the late Sharaf, and although al-Rimawi has kept the same team that worked in Sharaf's government, al-Rimawi remains the second officer in command of the Jordanian ship that is piloted by King Husayn. AL-MUSTAQBAL asked Prime Minister al-Rimawi to respond to a number of questions about Jordan's political and economic course. We conducted this interview, which was the first given to an Arabic publication by the new Jordanian prime minister.

[Question] Several conferences were held in Jordan recently under your administration. They took place under critical circumstances that our Arab nation is experiencing. Please give us a brief view of the outcome of these conferences and the results that you expect will be implemented on the Arab and international scenes.

[Answer] The conferences that were held in Amman recently--the conference of Arab ministers of foreign affairs and economy, the conference of ministers of foreign affairs of the Islamic countries, and the conference of Arab ministers of health--took place in the context of joint Arab action and considered Arab planning to confront the challenges and the dangers that are facing the pan-Arab cause whose essence lies in the question of the Palestinian people and their rights. The Social and Economic Council studied the problem of strengthening economic integration and the integration of development planning on a pan-Arab scale. The council recommended adoption of a national economic plan for the Arab world to meet the needs of Arab development in the next decade. This method of Arab planning is considered to be a far-reaching change in Arab action whose objective is to weave one integrated Arab fabric; to remedy the existing discrepancy between the economic structure of one Arab country and another; and to utilize Arab resources in building a strong base for a joint Arab economy that would bolster the structure of the Arabs' own power and the Arabs' steadfastness.

What is new in this conference is the shift to build institutions for joint Arab action on well-considered, scientific principles in the context of strong, long-range planning that constitutes an Arab economic strategy to strengthen the integration of various Arab energies and capabilities and bolster the prestige of the Arab nation in the face of the Zionist danger. This requires the mobilization of all the means of the Arabs' own power in all political, military and economic areas on an equal basis. In addition, the conference focused on another significant economic dimension: putting international Arab economic relations to work to serve pan-Arab interests and causes and to complete this important dimension in confronting the growing Zionist threat to the Arab nation.

The conference of the ministers of foreign affairs of Islamic countries was held in the context of joint Arab-Islamic action to champion the cause of Palestine and the sacrosanct objects of Islam, and to give the Palestinian question its Islamic dimension insofar as it is the most serious challenge facing the Islamic world, considering the fact that Palestine and Jerusalem are part of our spiritual Islamic heritage. The conference was characterized by its inclination to take practical steps to support our people in occupied Palestine, to give Jerusalem special attention and to take deterrent measures against the agencies that are assisting the process of making Jerusalem a Jewish city or supporting the Israeli colonizing occupation of the holy city and the occupied Arab lands. All these are positive indicators and pressures that are being channeled into the joint Arab effort to put an international noose around the Israeli measures, to reveal the truth about Israel's objectives and to strengthen Arab-Islamic solidarity.

[Question] Jordan was a pivotal factor in bringing about rapprochment between Jordan and the other Arab countries on the basis of establishing coordination among the Arab countries and including the PLO as a party with direct responsibility in solving the Palestinian question. How does your excellency evaluate this effort?

[Answer] Jordan's action on the Arab scene is predicated on its firm belief in its role and in its pan-Arab responsibility towards the Arab nation. Under the leadership of Husayn, Jordan played a prominent role in preventing the collapse of the Arab front after Egypt's departure from the Arab scene and its isolation. Jordan played a prominent role in strengthening the spirit of confidence in the Arab front by adopting a new Arab position at the Baghdad Conference, which is based on rejecting the deviation embodied in the Camp David Accords and on [establishing] Arab solidarity in the face of the penetration of the Arab front and the isolation of Egypt from the Arab scene. Jordan played a prominent role is bolstering positive Arab action and in striving to strengthen pan-Arabism and the integration of the Arabs' own power. Jordan also played a prominent role in maintaining with the world a dialog based on principles that assure a just and comprehensive peace as well as the legitimate rights of the people of Palestine to achieve sovereignty over their land and freedom to determine their own destiny. These principles call for total Israeli withdrawal from occupied territory. It is natural for the PLO, in its capacity as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinians, to be a party to joint Arab action and to be a basic party in the process of searching for a just and a comprehensive peace.

[Question] Is Jordan taking new action regarding the subject of proposing an alternative to Resolution 242 or to the Camp David Accords? King Husayn had previously made such a statement to several foreign newspapers. He had explained Jordan's position during his visit to the United States, and he had called for the necessity of coming up with a program to replace the floundering in Arab policy. Would you comment on this?

[Answer] His Majesty King Husayn had explained that Resolution 242 was no longer adequate in itself as a remedy for the question of the Palestinian people. The resolution was issued in 1967 to remedy the effects of the 1967 aggression on the territories of three Arab countries. The Palestinian question was in existence before this resolution; its tenets pertained to the legitimate rights of the people of Palestine that were recognized in other UN resolutions. During his recent visit to the United States, His Majesty King Husayn explained Jordan's position which is based on advocating a just and comprehensive peace that would deal with all the aspects of the question, as well as with its essence--the question of the people of Palestine--so as to achieve a permanent peace which future generations can accept. King Husayn affirmed that the present action within the Camp David framework had failed to achieve a comprehensive peace, and that there was an urgent need for broad international action based on going beyond the impotent policies of Camp David and on adopting fundamental principles upon which a just and permanent peace can be based.

Jordan's actions on the international scene are based on basic principles that constitute a framework for joint Arab position and an Arab consensus. These are principles which guarantee Palestinian rights; call for the evacuation of the occupation forces; and seek to guarantee the Palestinian people's freedom to determine their own destiny on their occupied land.

[Question] Will His Majesty King Husayn visit the Soviet Union as had been previously decided? What is the purpose of this visit?

[Answer] Jordan has been intent on establishing relations of cooperation and friendship with all the nations and countries of the world. The Soviet Union is among them. Jordan wants to establish such relations on a foundation of mutual respect and cooperation so as to serve the Arab cause. Jordan has good ties with the Soviet Union, and there is a standing invitation for His Majesty King Husayn to visit the Soviet Union. His Majesty will accept the invitation at an appropriate time.

[Question] Mr Khalid al-Hasan, member of the PLO, told one of the Arab newspapers that Carter's success would be to some extent in the Arabs' interests, because the Jewish lobby was working for Carter's defeat and for fragmenting electoral vote by nominating Anderson as a third candidate. Thus, Vice President Mondale would be brought in, because the U.S. constitution provides that Congress would elect the president in case neither the democratic candidate nor the republican candidate gets the votes required by the constitution for winning the election. What does your excellency think about this?

[Answer] What is happening in the U.S. elections is not the primary factor in [our] situation. What is important is what is happening on the Arab scene. A though the U.S. scene is very important in relation to the Middle East question, the evolution of the U.S. policy into a balanced position is contingent upon the evolution of the situation on the Arab scene. The Arabs' success in building a unified Arab position and [establishing] clear principles for action on the international scene, as well as their success in building their own power and investing all their energies and tremendous economic and strategic prestige in the world to bolster the Arab position are the catalytic agents in [the process of] altering international positions and influencing countries to champion Arab rights. If we were to realize this, what happens on the U.S. electoral scene will inevitably be affected by the magnitude of U.S. interests in our countries. This is the yardstick we have to use.

[Question] Reactions among the Arab masses to the statement made by the secretary general of the Arab League after the conclusion of the Conference of Arab Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Economy were not what they were expected to be. What is your excellency's comment on this situation?

[Answer] The special session of the Social and Economic Conference [was convened] to establish a strategy for economic and developmental integration in the Arab world and [to find] means for confronting the Zionist enemy in the coming phase. This step is being taken in the context of long-range, well-considered, scientific planning. This step must be viewed and its results must be evaluated in this context.

[Question] People in Jordan are talking about the investigations being carried out by duly authorized agencies in Jordan. These investigations deal with the existence of petroleum and with Jordan's determination to utilize oil shale for the extraction of petroleum since the economic feasibility of this process has been proven following the rise in oil prices. How far have these investigations and studies gone?

[Answer] Looking for oil and also leaning towards diversifying the sources of energy and providing guidance for energy use constitute the established national policy of Jordan. This is because Jordan imports all the oil it needs from abroad. There were and there still are continuous attempts to search for oil in Jordan. At present, Jordan is cooperating with several international corporations in an effort to search for oil in its territories. Jordan is allocating the necessary amounts of money for this effort every year. Studies are now being made about the possibility of utilizing shale oil, a large reserve of which has been discovered in south Jordan. We are still studying the economic feasibility of this process and the possibilities of utilizing shale oil in some heavy industries. We are also looking into the modern technology which this use of shale oil would require. Jordan is looking into this because of the tremendous burden placed on its shoulder as a confrontation state, in view of the continuing escalation of oil prices in a manner that is draining a large portion of the national revenues we need for building up and developing our national capabilities and the structure of our nation.

[Question] Does your government intent to submit a cabinet statement to the Advisory National Council in keeping with the traditions that have been followed in recent years?

[Answer] The government is committed to the statement that was submitted to the Advisory National Council by the cabinet of the late al-Sharif 'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf. It is committed to the principles that were included in the royal message that commissioned his cabinet. The new cabinet considers itself an extension of the previous cabinet in following its principles. It will abide by national and pan-Arab principles and by the government policy proposed by the late al-Sharif 'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf. It will especially abide by the pan-Arab policy that was planned for Jordan by His Majesty King Husayn. It will bolster the national structure and national solidarity. It will strive to build a new society based on unity, the sharing of responsibility, social awareness, integrity in government and mobilization of national capabilities in the context of a long-range national plan whose objective is to strengthen national foundations of independence, social security and continued progress and development.

FOREIGN MINISTER REJECTS LEBANON'S CRITICISM OF LACK OF SUPPORT

Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 8-14 Sep 80 pp 46-48

[Interview with Sabah al-Ahmad, Kuwait foreign minister, by Mona es-Said; date and place not given]

[Excerpts]

Kuwait's deputy premier and foreign minister, Sheikh Sabah al-Ahmad al-Jaber al-Sabah, last week rejected Lebanese officialdom's bitter criticism of all Arab countries for their failure to do anything about the continuing and escalating Israeli attacks on South Lebanon.

The questions and answers in full:

Kuwait has supported Crown Prince Fahd's call for a Holy War to liberate Jerusalem, but there seems to be some confusion about this call:

a) Is it a call for military confrontation? Does this mean that Kuwait is ready to enter such a confrontation with Israel directly, or that Kuwait is ready to support the Arab confrontation states in a war against Israel? Or does it mean that Kuwait is ready to issue a call for volunteers to engage in such a war and establish military training camps for them, as the PLO proposed at the Casablanca meeting of the Jerusalem Committee two weeks ago?

b) Is it a call for economic and political confrontation with the states which are supporting Israel? Is Kuwait ready to use the oil weapon in such a confrontation – either by resorting to a boycott of the U.S. and possibly Western Europe, or by reducing production, or by raising prices?

c) Does Kuwait make its call for a Holy War conditional on the acceptance and participation of all Arab countries? If so, doesn't the present Arab situation preclude any Arab action against Israel, be it Holy War or anything else, in view of the many inter-Arab disputes?

We have noticed that the United States has dismissed the Holy War call as unimportant. The U.S. State Department has said that the call does not signify any change in the Arab position. Why do you think Washington is so certain that the Arabs will do nothing of significance about the annexation of Jerusalem or the continued occupation of Arab land, and what do you think the Arabs can do to change the American view of them — short of waging economic or military war?

There is no confusion about the call for a Holy War. A Holy War is not restricted to any one aspect at the expense of the other. It involves humans and riches, i.e., human lives and finances.

If solutions with the enemy through peaceful means prove beyond reach, we would have no choice but to resort to a Holy War. In this context, Kuwait is but part of a whole. And, as I just said, a Holy War has an all-inclusive character which includes all ways and means that are conducive to the recovery of (one's) rights.

This being the case, it is immaterial to us whether the United States takes the Holy War call seriously or dismisses it as unimportant. It is free to formulate its own opinion. But it must realize that the patience of peoples and nations has a limit which, if exceeded, could lead to a catastrophe. And a catastrophe is bound to affect all parties.

Much has been said about growing instability in the Gulf, including Kuwait.

a) Judging by the arrests that have been made so far and the statements made by the suspects, who do you think is behind this attempt to promote unrest in Kuwait?

b) The Kuwaiti ambassador to the United Nations has told Monday Morning that in his view, Kuwait should rid itself of the foreign majority in the country and restrict the entry of foreigners to Kuwait in the future. Are you thinking in those terms?

c) Do you think that the return to parliamentary democracy in Kuwait will help block the destabilization attempts in the country? Are those attempts behind the decision to resurrect parliament?

True, a lot has been said and continues to be said about growing instability. But those who are saying this stop short of naming those who stand behind it. Why? Who are those who are instigating confusion, anarchy, instability and troubles in the Gulf?

I don't think there is anyone who doesn't know their identity. They are the deceitful foreign hands, Israel being one of them. They will not hesitate to do anything to achieve their mischievous designs and ambitions.

As for the return to parliamentary democracy in Kuwait, it has nothing to do with the security of the Gulf, those trying to destabilize it, or those who think they could take advantage from fomenting troubles.

The return to parliamentary democracy is in line with a pledge made by His Highness the Emir of Kuwait. He is now fulfilling the pledge made to the people after a pause for reflection and deep thinking aimed at correcting Kuwait's democratic course.

And thus it was.

How does Kuwait view the establishment of an American swift intervention force for the protection of Western interests in the Gulf? What do you think the Gulf countries can do to avert a superpower struggle in their area?

We view such intervention with indignation and revulsion — whether it is called swift intervention or creeping intervention. We are not sure whether such interveners have a right to meddle in our affairs under the pretext of protecting Western interests.

The proposed Security Council resolution of sanctions against Israel has been pushed aside. Does Kuwait believe that it should be put to the council again, despite the certainty of an American veto? If so, what would the Kuwaiti reaction to the American veto be?

I don't understand why the United States alone opposes a resolution by the Security Council members. It is about time to look into this so-called veto power.

Would you give us your response to the threat made by Palestinian leaders recently to the effect that the Palestinians would attack the Arab oil wells or oil routes if the Arabs continue to refuse to use their oil as a weapon?

I told you earlier that if the time for Holy War comes, it will involve the use of all means.

The Lebanese authorities have been very bitter in their criticism of all Arab countries for their failure to do anything about the continuing and escalating Israeli attacks on Lebanon. Other than statements of support, what do you think the Arab states should do to help Lebanon? And what is Kuwait ready to do, regardless of the attitude of other Arab governments? For instance:

a) Lebanon's U.N. Ambassador Ghassan Tueni has called on the Arab countries to help Lebanon turn its southern region into a "peace zone." This means that the Arabs should help Lebanon persuade the Palestinians to end their armed presence and activities in the South and to allow the Lebanese Army and UNIFIL to take over the entire area.

Do you agree? If so, what can Kuwait do to help in that direction? If not, could you explain why?

b) Mr. Tueni and other Lebanese officials have said that if the Arabs do not want to help create a "peace zone" in the South, they should help in the war that is being waged in the South. Do you agree? How is Kuwait ready to help?

Had the Lebanese authorities been serious about solving the Lebanese crisis, the situation would not have reached this stage of anarchy and insecurity which has led to fratricides, the destruction of the country and its economy, and the neglect of all the resolutions and agreements which were put forward by the Arab brethren. This being the case, what do you want the Arabs to do?

Before and after the latest Israeli attacks on the South and the latest Syrian-Israeli air clash over the South, there have been many predictions of an imminent Israeli invasion of South Lebanon which, it is said, is bound to lead to another Middle Eastern war. Do you think the predictions are justified?

As long as the situation remains unchanged and since our Lebanese brethren do not want to listen to reason, the chances of Israeli attacks remain justified and may be borne out — whether on Lebanon's South or its North.

Would you give us your impression of the proposed EEC peace initiative after your talks with Mr. Gaston Thorn?

When will it start? What line will it take? What importance do you attach to it?

We support any peace initiative provided it is based on right and justice. We are proponents of peace. We seek the peace that we and the world believe in, not the kind of peace based on usurpation, the defiance of world community resolutions and the disregard of the Security Council, which represents the will of the world at large. ●

MINISTER DISCUSSES DEFENSE ISSUES, ARMS PURCHASE

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 28-29 Aug 80 p 2

[Text]

TAIF, Aug 27 (SPA) — Defense Minister Prince Sultan indicated that the United States agreed to provide additional equipment for the 60 F-15 fighters sold to Saudi Arabia. He told reporters here that "this is a foregone conclusion, and as I said before we do not make requests that are denied to us."

Referring to objections by Israel and its supporters in Washington to the Saudi Arabian request, Prince Sultan said "we shall not allow our enemies to obstruct our requests." He made his statement during a brief encounter with reporters covering an Arab interior ministers conference in the city.

U.S. officials said last June that Saudi Arabia sought fuel pods and multiple ejection racks that would permit much larger bomb loads on the F-15. The pods would extend the two-way range of the plane from 450 miles to more than 1,000 miles.

Prince Sultan said the government was carefully studying a plan to introduce the draft. "It is being studied with care so that we may be sure of the benefits of the decision," he said. The draft proposal was revealed two years ago.

Asked about Crown Prince Fahd's call for jihad to liberate Jerusalem and other occupied Arab territories, Prince Sultan said Jihad was the aim of peace and stability "if the Muslims cannot regain their lost rights by peaceful means." Jihad, as it is well known, involves sacrifice and struggle in defense of our religion, our people and our holy places," he said.

"If the Muslims cannot achieve their objectives by peaceful means which we seek, then jihad will be resorted to," he added.

MINISTER EMPHASIZES DIVERSE NATURE OF ARMS SOURCES

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 3 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

TABUK, Sept. 2 (SPA) — The Kingdom's armament policy is based on diversifying the source of arms, Defense Minister Prince Sultan said here Monday. This has led to separate arms agreements between Saudi Arabia and the United States, Britain, France and Sweden and others.

Producing its own weaponry also is an aim of the Kingdom, and its industries in Kharj serve as both a training ground as well as a production center. About 600 youths are trained each year, and already, 3,600 men are working at the industries.

Speaking at a press conference here at the end of King Khaled's visit to the northern province, Prince Sultan said his government looks only for those arms it needs, from whatever source. "There is no commitment of any kind between us and any other government regarding armaments supplies," he said. "We seek anything new and useful... we can get from our friends."

Included in the group of Saudi Arabian arms suppliers are Japan, Belgium, Switzerland, and Austria. The government studies the systems available from these and other countries, he said, then makes its purchases.

Prince Sultan said that during his recent visit to Austria he signed agreements for the purchase of light weapons including machineguns, transport vehicles and ammunition. A Saudi Arabian military mission visited Austria later for the same reason.

Collective Arab efforts to produce arms make sense, the prince said, but has to be viewed without forgetting the Arab Industries Organization (AIO) which was based in Egypt. After Egypt signed its peace treaty with Israel, the deal collapsed.

The AIO was financed by Saudi Arabia, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait. When the four countries withdrew, Egypt continued operations alone.

The vastness of the Kingdom demands military installations throughout the country, Prince Sultan pointed out. Part of the King Khaled Military Complex will be ready in two years, with the remainder expected to be finished in four years. Since the defense plan covers the entire country, defense installations won't be confined to just one corner, the prince said.

Other projects in the works include King Abdul Aziz Military College — which was begun a few months ago — military schools in Qasim and Al-Dawasser, and the completed paratroop and special forces training center in Tabuk.

Also in Tabuk is the new military hospital in the eastern region, which includes training and teaching facilities for local medical and nursing students, as well as various specialty facilities.

Included in the current five year development plan are major military projects like the King Faisal Air Academy and the new air base in Kharj. A tender for its construction has been accepted and the main runway already is constructed, Prince Sultan said.

"This will become one of the finest air academies in the Middle East," the prince said adding that "it should be operational at the end of the (five-year) plan."

USSR RODINA SOCIETY ESTABLISHES CONTACT WITH SAUDI ARABIAN UZBEKS

Tashkent OZBEKISTAN MADANIYATI in Uzbek 1 Jun 80 p 4

[Article by Ahmadjan Luqmanov, Department Director of the Rodina Society: "Love of Fatherland"]

[Text] Among the spiritual riches of mankind, there cannot be a gem greater or more precious than the love which exists in the treasury of an honest man's heart for the Fatherland. Wherever a man with love for the land where he was born and his forefathers were buried may be, in whatever conditions he may live, an inextinguishable fire burns in his heart. In particular, it is natural for a man to suffer forever from longing for the Fatherland when, as fate will have it, he renounces a life's dearest and most inexhaustible treasure as the result of a wrong step taken without hesitation and without understanding it well. Are there only a few who speak of the Fatherland, who look homesick for its enchanting greetings and salutations, who listen to its voice and echo, who have retired from the mortal to the immortal? They are very numerous. Love for the mother earth is, to say it briefly, love for the Fatherland when the nightingale's speech and the turtledove's cry are drawn into a man's heart. This moaning of the heart pours out as lines on white paper; it breaks the heart of a man into a hundred pieces.

Our countryman (originally from Andijan) Yaqubkhoja Mahjurii who is residing in Saudi Arabia has sent a few poems on the Fatherland to the address of the Uzbekistan Society for Cultural Relations with Countrymen in Foreign Nations (the Rodina Society), and has requested that we place them in the press to be presented to the judgment of poetry readers in Soviet Uzbekistan.

Below, we offer you two muvashshah poems by the poet.

"Andijan"

Hey, zephyr, find the cure of cures for us, too.
O, bring news from the forlorn regions to us, too.
When you pass the days of early spring on that field of flowers,
Pick a handful of melancholy lilies for us, too.

Turn the pages of my book of love and flaunt them to the nightingale.
Take as a memento some thin leaves for us, too.
If you get a chance, tell about my solitary state, too.
If you are one who understands, bring some good news to us, too.

Meet the poets and singers in the early dawn.
Carry by hand some works written in that dawn to us, too.
Mähjuriy does not omit his name in every peom.
Take books in his name from that city for us, too.

Lament with the tambura, so that the nightingale will not sing
About the rose garden of hearts, which is the sign of the nightingale.

Rose face, nightingale voice, play a simple song
In the makam style, and let me present a gift of rose bouquets of poetry.

From time to time, travel through the corners of the heart with a saz,
So that pain and suffering will not find a permanent place in the heart.

Would you not make my color more rosey than the sculptor of my statue?
It has turned yellow through sorrow and separation.

When Zebunisa describes his Indian quality,
I call the esteemed doctor as smooth-tongued as tutty.

Hey, singer, quick, compose a makam on "Shahnaz" and "Gulyar."
Let heaven and earth sing of what they know.

See off Mänjuriy with music and a melody.
For a night, have him go through the motions of a dervish dance.

RIYADH GOVERNOR DISCUSSES DEVELOPMENT, OIL PRODUCTION

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 7 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

RIYADH, Sept. 6 (SPA) — The Governor of Riyadh has disputed reports that the Kingdom has only 25 years of proven oil reserves, saying instead that the oil here would last for hundreds of years.

Prince Salman, speaking to Saudi Arabian students in Denver, Colo., said experts realize the great volume of oil that lies still untapped in Saudi Arabia. Now, the country produces about 9.5 million barrels of oil daily, with its reserves said to be in the billions of barrels.

Prince Salman is touring the United States to meet with students from the Kingdom, talking to them about their country and answering their questions.

He said that the present rate of oil production, highest in the country's history, is necessary because of the current development plans here. " We may push ahead with the many projects covered by them (the plans)," he told students.

The government was taking care to develop the entire country, the prince explained, so that it may reduce the rate of population shift from the rural areas to big cities.

" We are developing fast," he said, " while at the same time controlling inflation which it on time reached 40 per cent before dropping to seven or eight per cent."

The economic welfare of the world is considered as the government plans its oil policies, the prince said. Especially important are considerations for the developing nations, who rely heavily on oil imports to fuel their industrial growth.

" We can reduce oil production," Prince Salman said," but this would adversely affect our development plans." Therefore, he explained the government raises production to a certain level so that it would serve its own interests better and boost the rate of development here. Once the government decides it would be in its political and economic interest to lower the oil production, it would do so, he said.

Speaking on other matters, Prince Salman pointed out that the basic system of law announced by King Khaled last year would not be a constitution as such, for the Kingdom's basic law is the Quran. King Khaled has promised a basic system of government, a consultative council and a provincial system as well.

The consultative council will be formed of various educated men, nominated by the King, to advise him on matters of state. A committee under Prince Naif, the interior minister, was formed to draw up details for the three systems.

" These systems require a great deal of study and preparation," said Prince Salman, noting that no time limit has been set for the review. All existing laws and regulations will be incorporated in the basic system of government, he said.

The Kingdom may embark on a plan for compulsory military training, the Prince also said. The council of ministers now is studying that issue. However, few details are available now.

Prince Salman said the call for jihad, or a holy struggle to regain the city of Jerusalem from Israeli control, is not a new one, and similar calls have been made before by Saudi Arabian rulers. Crown Prince Fahd called for jihad last month following the formal annexation of Jerusalem and the declaration by Israel that the holy city was the eternal and undivided capital of the Jewish state.

King Abdul Aziz made the call in 1947 and 1948, and it was reiterated in 1969 by King Faisal after the fire in the holy mosque of Aqsa.

Both war, and political and economic restraint should be prepared, Prince Salman said, " because what was taken by force must be regained by force. "

If the Arabs can reconcile their differences, the prince noted, they would become a serious force throughout the world. He made it clear that the problem with Israel is not only the occupied Golan Heights of Syria or the Sinai in Egypt, but also Palestine — the central issue in the whole question.

Saudi Arabia believed the Camp David accords will not achieve the Arab objectives, he said. Since the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, sponsored by the United States, did not deal with the Palestinian problem, the Arab states rejected the agreement.

" Although President Sadat of Egypt had promised to uphold Arab rights during his visit to Jerusalem, he did not, and in fact (ignored) them especially regarding Palestine and Jerusalem, " the prince said.

CONSTRUCTION OF POLICE INSTITUTE NEARS COMPLETION

Jiddah ARAB NEWS in English 27 Aug 80 p 2

[Text]

JEDDAH, Aug.26 (SPA) — Construction of a SR400 million Arab Institute for Police Studies in Saudi Arabia has begun and will be completed soon, Interior Minister Prince Naif said Monday on the eve of the third Arab interior ministers conference opening in Taif Tuesday.

Establishment of both the institute and an Arab Studies Center had been decided by second Arab interior ministers conference held in Baghdad, and Prince Naif said the conference in Taif will consider merging the institute and the center in the Kingdom.

He also said the board of the center has already been formed under the Saudi interior minister.

In addition, the conference will discuss the security of Arab society in the present and future, and the establishment of a Permanent Council of Arab Interior Ministers. He denied reports to the effect that a Gulf Interior Ministers Conference would be held soon. There is only an Arab Interior Ministers Conference at present, he said, and during the session, bilateral meetings would take place between Gulf ministers as is customary in such conferences. He said we are at the stage of global Arab efforts.

Meanwhile, Sheikh Muhammad ibn Khalifa Al-Khalifa, the Bahraini minister of interior who arrived in Taif Monday evening with Sheikh Sorour ibn Muhammad Al-Nahayan, the head of the office of the UAE president, said that the conference has particular importance since it will deal with the security of the Arab world at a time of intense superpower conflict.

The Kuwaiti Interior Miniser, Sheikh Nawaf Al-Ahmad Al-Sabbah, and Ahmad Ould Baba, secretary general of the Mauritanian Interior Ministry, also arrived Monday evening and were met at the airport by Prince Naif and other officials.

DETAILS OF GAS, OIL DISCOVERY REVIEWED

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 23 Aug 80 pp 11, 12

[Text] A new offshore gas field now being developed in Abu Dhabi could more than double the reserves of the UAE to 44.5 trillion cubic feet; oil industry sources in the Emirates said last week.

The sources said the Umm Al Shaif field, midway between Abu Dhabi and Qatar is estimated to contain 24 trillion cubic feet of gas. The UAE government has not yet announced figures on the field's reserves.

The UAE's total gas reserves were 20.5 trillion cubic feet at the end of 1979, OAPEC figures show. The UAE sources told Reuters that an exploratory well was drilled at Umm Al Shaif to between 15,000 and 16,000 feet at the end of 1979 and development drilling was now underway.

The field is being operated by the Abu Dhabi Marine Operating Company (ADMA-OPCO). The Abu Dhabi National Oil Company (ADNOC) has a 60 percent share in the company, the rest is being held by the British Petroleum Company (BP) with 14.67 percent and Compagnie Francaise de Petroles (CFP) 13.33 percent and Japan Oil Development Corporation 12 percent.

The sources said ADMA OPCO has started test-drilling in the Zakum offshore field and hopes to reach the target depth in autumn.

In another oil development in the UAE, the Qatar News Agency reported that one exploratory well in the offshore Butinah well indicated reserves of 1,000 million barrels of oil.

The UAE at present produces about 1.7 million barrels of oil a day, mostly in Abu Dhabi. UAE Oil Minister Dr. Maneh Said Al Otaiba said earlier this year that his country's oil and gas reserves were far bigger than commonly reported, adding that the country was continuing to find new deposits of oil and gas in new sites and at different levels in fields already being exploited.

Meanwhile the UAE newspaper Al Bayan reported that ADNOC has discovered new oil reserves which are eight times Abu Dhabi's total 1979 output.

Since Abu Dhabi's oil production last year totalled 500 million barrels the new reserves are estimated in the region of about 4,000 million barrels, Al Bayan quoted Chief of ADNOC's production and exploration department Rashid Nuwar as saying.

Nuwar said a vast quantity of natural gas was discovered in Umm Al Shaif field at a depth of 15,000 feet. There were signs indicating that the existence of one of the biggest gas fields in the world.

Nuwar added a new offshore field was discovered near Butihan. Oil reserves in this field were estimated at 1,000 million barrels, according to experiments on only one well, he said.

Nuwar said that the implementation by ADNOC of a new policy on exploration resulted in the discovery of Umm Al Shaif Gas field. According to the new policy ADNOC has begun to explore deeper areas. It will also launch a comprehensive survey of all the Abu Dhabi fields at the end of 1980, he added.

RESTRICTED LICENSED BANKS TO INCREASE OPERATIONS

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 30 Aug 80 pp 18, 19

[Excerpt] Restricted Licensed Banks (RLBs) in the UAE are reported to be in a state of flux. While the majority of them view the setting up of the Central Bank as an opportunity to play a greater part in the economic life of the country, one RLB has decided to close down its office by the end of the month: the Bank of Nova Scotia in Dubai. An announcement by the Bank said the decision to suspend its operations was part of its new strategy for the Gulf. The Bank's interests in the UAE will be looked after by its Offshore Banking Unit in Bahrain.

Other RLBs, however, believe that under the new monetary set-up, now emerging in the country, they may be allowed to extend the scope of their operations and a few do not even rule out the possibility of being able to convert their restricted licence into a full licence soon.

Two of them have ventured into new fields: Amro Bank, an Amsterdam-based international bank, is venturing into the diamond trade and has also opened an investment banking department at its office in Dubai. The bank also hopes to develop a primary and secondary market in bonds as well as an active Guilder market.

The American Express International Banking Corporation, which runs an RLB in Dubai, is also offering new services to its customers. It has started direct foreign exchange dealings, including such facilities as swap arrangements, forward deals and investment banking. The idea in starting these new operations is to see that local businessmen no longer have to go to London, Tokyo or New York for every bit of work connected with investments.

According to the UAE currency Board document which first mooted the setting up of RLBs, "they are expected to impart greater dynamism to the UAE financial system; they may also become a useful link in the evolution of the UAE as an important financial centre."

As an innovation in Gulf banking, RLBs have taken some time to find their feet, according to the KHALEEJ TIMES, but the success of their operations at the national level is reflected in recent Currency Board statistics. These show a steady increase in their assets, despite restrictions, from Dh.1,665.5 million at the end of 1978, to Dh.2,229.4 million at the end of March this year.

NEW PROJECTS IN FUJAYRAH--Projects with outlays of about two billion dirhams are to be implemented in the Emirate of Fujeirah this year. They include the seaport where two quays are to be built at a cost of 175 million dirhams, in Fujeirah and another seaport at Diba at a cost of 100 million dirhams. This port will also provide berths for fishing boats. (the latest data reveal that 5,118 tonnes of fish are hauled in the emirate). Another harbour at an outlay of 18 million dirhams is being built at Marbah to shelter small fishing boats. The other projects are a 200-bed hospital to be built at a cost of Dh.200 million and a cement factory with an annual production capacity of 120,000 tonnes. Two thousand low-cost houses are being built in different parts of the emirate at a cost of 280 million dirhams. A 50-bed hospital costing 50 million dirhams will be constructed in Diba. Road projects costing Dh.206 million and other buildings costing 145 millions are also envisioned. Also slated for implementation are a number of federal projects including schools, mosques, low-cost houses and roads costing Dh.400 million. [Text] [Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 30 Aug 80 p 17]

PORT CONTAINERIZATION EXPANSION--A sum of about Dh.5,200,000 is to be spent on more container carriers for Port Rashid as its container traffic touches new highs. Three Valet straddle carriers, which lift containers around the port after they have been unloaded, will arrive towards the end of the year, according to a Dubai Port Services spokesman. The number of containers handled by the port has been rocketing. In 1977, 46,000 units were handled and this figure has grown to 133,537 in 1979. So far this year, around 102,000 units have been processed and a total of about 200,000 units is expected to be handled by the end of the year. The port has five straddle carriers now. The three new carriers due to arrive are being built in Finland and will be able to lift up to 30.5 tonnes. [Text] [Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 30 Aug 80 p 17]

ARAB LEAGUE SECRETARY GENERAL ON JIHAD CALL, OTHER ARAB OPTIONS

LD191157 Paris LE MONDE in French 5 Sep 80 p 7

[Article by Michel Deure: "Chadli Klibi Explains Bases of New Arab Strategy"]

[Text] Tunis--At the opening session of the Franco-Tunisian Joint Grand Commission meeting in Tunis on 3 September Jean Francois-Poncet delighted his interlocutors by confirming that France will continue to defend Tunisia's interests in community bodies with even greater care now that the question of expanding the EEC to include Spain and Portugual has been raised.

The foreign minister was more cautious, however, in his reply to the wish for "joint investment" expressed by his Tunisian colleague Hassan Belkhodja. He merely said: "These proposals are being carefully examined by the French administration in conjunction with French business circles. I can assure you that this detailed examination is being carried out in the most constructive spirit."

Mr Francois-Poncet, whose visit ends this Thursday evening, was also due to meet President Bourguiba, Prime Minister Mzali and Arab League Secretary General Chadli Klibi, who has visited several European capitals to explain the meaning of the call for holy war recently launched by Prince Fahd of Saudi Arabia, which will be first on the agenda for discussion at the Arab summit scheduled to take place in Amman in November.

"This appeal is both a resolution and a method of struggle," Mr Klibi told us before meeting the Frency minister. "The resolution expresses, above all, the determination of all Arab states to face the Israeli challenge, not to bow before Zionism's blows and to struggle tirelessly. The method of struggle consists of gathering all the means at our disposal: political, diplomatic, economic, and, of course, as a very last resort, military, which must neither be feared nor [apparent line drop] means have been used judiciously and in a convergent way by all Arab countries at the same time."

The league secretary general considers that the Arab states now have "many trump cards" and that their main strength lies in the fact that they defend "a just cause and essential values such as peoples' freedom to determine their own future, peace and the abolition of racism."

The Arab political strategy which will be defined at the summit will, according to Mr Klibi, comprise two main aspects: "An internal aspect aimed at giving Arab solidarity very broad economic bases--this is the aim of the Arab development plans from now until the year 2000--and an external aspect which will implement all the Arab countries' means of struggle in order to obtain the international community's support, including support from these countries which at present continue to help Israel--some because they do not understand the real major problems and others because of an erroneous analysis of the overall political situation which prevails in the region."

DFLP SECRETARY GENERAL HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 5-6 Sep 80 p 5

[Report on press conference of Nayef Hawatmeh, secretary general of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, in Algiers; date not given]

[Text] (APS) In a press conference held late in the afternoon at the Hotel Aurassi in Algiers, Nayef Hawatmeh, secretary general of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, rejected "the recent moves" of West Europe relating to a search for a solution to the conflict in the Middle East, moves he labeled as "maneuvers aimed at gaining time and enabling the current American administration to devote itself solely to the coming presidential elections."

The Palestinian leader, who was accompanied by representatives of national liberation movements accredited in Algiers, used his press conference to denounce the maneuvers of certain West European countries which, following behind American diplomacy, are trying to save the content of the tripartite Camp David Accords, "particularly their second current phase, which consists of instituting that which is called internal autonomy."

According to Hawatmeh, the Europeans' move is expressed in an attempt to "update" Resolution 242 of the Security Council. Those European countries are drafting a proposed resolution that would be submitted to the UN session in the fall and which, like Resolution 242, would deny the Palestinian people's national rights to a homeland and would deny the Palestine Liberation Organization its status as the legitimate representative of the fighting Palestinian people.

"The imperialist-Zionist plot against the progressive forces of the Arab world, with the Palestinian resistance in the vanguard, therefore turns out to be in two parts," declared the secretary general of the DFLP, "one political and the other military. The political part is carried by the move of the European countries belonging to the EEC, in "coordination with American diplomacy, in order to bring the Camp David Accords out of their current impasse and prepare a neocolonial, capitulationist way in which certain reactionary Arab regimes would be partners. The so-called 'military' part is left to Israel, which every day commits acts of aggression marked by incredible savagery against Southern Lebanon in order to destroy the camps and bases of the Palestinian resistance."

Hawatmeh hinted that this aggression would be expanded in the days to come in order, it is hoped, to physically annihilate the Palestinian resistance and prevent it from thwarting the new political plot hatched by the Europeans.

After stating that the Palestinian resistance was still strong thanks to the active solidarity of the countries belonging to the Front and the firmness of progressive and nationalist forces throughout the world, Hawatmeh asked West European countries to "take their own position" on the American policy concerning the problem and to vote "positively" in favor of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to a homeland by the next session of the United Nations.

COOPERATION IN SECURITY MATTERS TO BE ESTABLISHED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 4 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] Minister of Interior Driss Guiga returned to Tunis yesterday afternoon after participating at the head of a Tunisian delegation in the work of the Conference of Arab Ministers of Interior, held recently in Talef, Saudi Arabia.

Driss Guiga said in a statement that the conference's work resulted in the setting up of a Council of Arab Ministers of Interior under the League of Arab States.

Driss Guiga added that the meeting also made it possible to draw up a working document in which the Arab ministers of interior put on record recommendations calling for the establishment of inter-Arab cooperation and complementarity in security matters (training, the exchange of experiences, technical cooperation, material aid to the security apparatus of the Arab states, and so on).

The minister of interior also noted that apart from the work of the conference, he had spoken with a number of his colleagues concerning bilateral relations and security matters affecting the Arab world and the Palestinian cause in particular.

He said, "During those talks, I noted the consideration and respect shown by the Arab brothers for the Supreme Fighter because of the stands he has taken on Arab causes, including in particular the Palestinian cause."

Concerning his private visit to the FRG, Driss Guiga emphasized that he had talked with several West German officials about bilateral cooperation in all areas and about current problems.

Driss Guiga was welcomed on his arrival here by several high officials of the Ministry of Interior and by Hans Kahle, West German ambassador to Tunis.

ARAB BRAIN DRAIN TO U.S. DISCUSSED

Amman AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 10 Jul 80 p 17

[Article: "Arab Brain Drain to the U.S.; Six Thousand Specialists and Engineers Have Migrated and the Numbers Are Increasing; Congress Encourages Asian and African Immigration After Previous Reversal"]

[Text] Now and then a voice rises in the Arab world to say: "Stop the brain drain." However, this problem, which greatly affects our future, still remains (manageable?). The reasons are many--some financial, others ethical, political, and cultural. The United States is the main importer of Arab brainpower, and the following investigation of this development by "Orient Press" is based on Arab and American statistics and sources.

The "Grey Hemorrhage" is the term used by experts to describe this emigration, but Claude Chaissons, European Common Market development representative, considers it a "double edged weapon in the underdevelopment game." John Zeigler describes it as "chic imperialism."

The Arabs, who possess one of history's great fortunes (and favorable geography) are leading contenders for victimization. Zeigler says that if he lives until the year 2000 he expects to write a book entitled "DEATH OF A FORTUNE." If the Arabs continue as they are, Zeigler says, they will find themselves some day "crying like children over a lost fortune which they failed to guard as men should."

Statistics published by the French magazine INTERNATIONAL REPORT (issued by Orient Press) maintain that between 1966 and 1977 six thousand Arab engineers and specialists in different disciplines emigrated to the United States. This number represents 5 percent of the total specialists coming to the United States during that period from all over the world. Two-thirds were engineers, one-fourth scientists, and the remainder social scientists.

Egyptian Brainpower

Two-thirds of the Arab brain drain is Egyptian. Iraq and Lebanon are also at the top of the list, each contributing 10 percent to the total Arab brain drain. Syria and Jordan follow with each contributing 5 percent to the total drain. Palestinians compose 4.5 percent.

The average annual rate of the drain is 480 persons. This rate grew from 162 in 1966 to 1,215 in 1970, fell to 271 in 1974, and rose to 400 in 1977. Each concerned Arab country treats emigration as annual dues paid to U.S.

U.S. Public Law No 414, passed in 1965, gives each part of the world an immigration quota and has contributed to an increase in the Arab brain drain. This legislation gives preference to Asian and African immigrants over northern hemisphere ones.

The decrease in immigration between 1971 and 1974 is due to American decisions, and not to Arab attempts to retain Arab brainpower. Washington officials noticed that immigration during the 1969-71 recession led to increased unemployment among American specialists. Congress responded by amending Law No 414 in 1971 and required that immigrants possess certain skills. However, expansion of the American economy between 1974 and 1977 led once again to an increased Arab brain drain.

The Egyptian population increase has made that country the leading exporter of Arab brainpower. After 1974, the civil war put Lebanon in second place. Lebanon remained in first place on a per capita basis--210 persons per million choosing to emigrate. The rate in each of the north African countries does not exceed 15 persons per million.

Saudi Arabia: One in a Million Emigrates

War is not the only factor determining emigration; standards of development and culture also play prominent parts. The great development of wealth in the petroleum producing countries makes them the lowest contributors to the brain drain. Saudi Arabia exports only one person per million population.

Many of those receiving American student visas do not take advantage of immigration opportunities; engineers and specialists, however, receive special consideration by immigration authorities. Between 1966 and 1977, 100,000 foreign students registered for study in American universities, and 40 to 50 percent of these students studied engineering and science. Most of these changed their student visas to permanent ones.

Arab studies of this problem are quite limited in comparison to its great importance. The Western Asian Economic Congress organized probably the most important meeting on the brain drain in Beirut, on 4 to 8 February 1980, under the title of "Arab Skilled Emigration."

Dr Rida Bukra', professor at the Center for Social and Economic Studies of the University of Tunis, linked the Arab brain drain to cultural imperialism. He noted that the latter is characterized by a concentration of scientific and technical knowledge in those areas of the world possessing sophisticated technological structures. Patterns of organization, production, and consumption are forced upon the remainder of the world. Therefore, similarities with the West encompassing all aspects of daily life emerge.

The dominant culture becomes a yardstick for other "marginal cultures." Cultural imperialism dominates technology and knowledge and controls the spread of these systems with its power over educational systems. It thus creates polarization in the world characterized by a dominant centralization, which in turn leads to an explosion of popular cultures and the creation of cultural-economic entities reflecting cultural estrangement.

Dr Bukara' emphasized the role of cultural estrangement in creating confusion and increasing emigration. Dr Fatma Zahra Afriha (Algerian) studied the causes of the Algerian brain drain. She brought forth hypotheses which may be applied to other Arab countries though there may be some limited differences.

Dr Afriha classified the various reasons behind the brain drain under two headings--push and pull.

Women't Role

Pull factors:

Advanced countries attract Arab skills. A polorization controls relations between advanced and developing countries and may be interpreted through its cultural dimensions. It is a pull of skills from south to north in the general direction of the former colonial powers. (The United States currently represents all former colonial powers.)

The spread of education in the dominant culture's language forms a first stage for "destruction of the local culture." After education in this language is deeply rooted in a country, a second stage arises leading to the isolation of intellectuals who are bearers of a culture more advanced than the one to which they belong. These intellectuals' separation from their native cultures depends on the extent of their grounding in their culture and its backwardness, such backwardness being defined according to the social traits attached to a culture. Instead of these intellectuals becoming catalysts for change and advancement, they become prisoners of a foreign language and culture--they become foreign in every sense of the word. This situation springs from a lack of thought and from historical rigidities, which in turn have devolved from a lack of imaginiation and innovation. The attraction of Arab intellectuals to western women falls within these cultural dimensions. These women pull Arab youth towards attempts at becoming submerged in foreign social milieus.

One basic pull element is economic, which particularly influences those possessing practical skills. Those most influenced in this fashion possess superior preparation and skills enabling them to operate the mechanisms of production, education, and training in their native countries. There are many reasons for this pull, including:

1. the high level of nominal and real income in the advanced countries, and the availability of various consumer goods to which students become accustomed during their stay abroad.

2. the availability of better employment opportunities, particularly in well managed, large corporations possessing a clear picture of highly skilled employee needs.

Marriage Traditions

Push

Push elements form the other facet of the problem and may be analyzed within any Arab country on three different levels: third world status, Arab world status, and national peculiarities.

There are a number of social and political elements, which do not yield readily to analysis, but which seem consistently to lie behind the third world's brain drain. Marriage traditions, the respective status of the two partners, and relationships between the sexes in Arab culture constitute push elements. An Arab nation characterized (for example) by development efforts emphasizing industrialization needs to train large numbers of people abroad within a framework of international technological achievements.

Of course a number of these skilled persons decide to settle in the western countries where they have been trained, particularly in the U.S. where the elements of pull are most effective.

We cannot overlook the political element. Military setbacks (increasing Israeli strength is accompanied by consistant failure in the Arab unity movement) and continuous retreat in democratic practice cause many scientists and engineers, who of course belong to the intellectual class, to settle in countries with a minimum level of "freedom." One way or another, this represents self-inflicted loss on the part of the Arabs.

SYRIAN-LIBYAN UNITY PART OF SOVIET PLAN

LD220727 Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 18 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Soviet Moves in the Middle East"]

[Excerpts] The Soviet military plan to invade Afghanistan has failed. The Soviet plan was aimed at capturing Afghanistan within a month or two with a lightning strike similar to what Hitler used to do. For this reason they concentrated in Afghanistan 90,000 troops with arms and equipment the like of which they did not possess in World War II. The Soviets calculated that after this lightning strike they would proceed to implement their plan in Iran and spread their influence and domination to the Middle East through the Gulf, the Arabian Sea, Iraq and Syria and thus get into a position to bring direct pressure to bear on the oil resources.

When the Soviets began invading Afghanistan their agents began to move. But the hopes which the Soviets pinned on their plans and calculations were frustrated because they found in Afghanistan a strong, Muslim and tenacious fighting people as well as a rugged terrain of mountains and valleys.

The Soviets have been unable to defeat the strong resistance of the Afghan people, have been compelled to exchange their forces several times for better combat trained forces and have resorted to their well-known propaganda about Islam and the freedom of exercising Islamic religious rites.

But the Soviets have been unable to achieve their objectives and plans in Afghanistan and have therefore realized that if this situation remains for too long they will face defeat and their objectives and ambitions in Afghanistan will fail.

The Soviets have therefore begun moving through their agents in the Middle East and have used these agents as tools and means to create difficulties in the area. The merger unity between al-Asad and al-Qadhdhafi is only one of their moves whose aim is to create disturbances in the Middle East. It is not a matter of unity through merger or non-merger but of an al-Asad/al-Qadhdhafi axis to activate the agent basis against the other countries and to threaten the oil areas and resources. It was strange that the statement they issued about unity should claim that it is unity for all Arabs and for the sake of all Arabs and yet say at the same time that the task of this unity is to work against the reationary, imperialist and colonialist countries. The reactionary countries, as al-Qadhdhafi and al-Asad call them, are none other than the Arab oil countries.

Recently the 'ALAWITE BA'TH newspaper attacked Saudi Arabia because it finances resistance against al-Asad and described it as a reactionary state.

The alleged unity between Syria and Libya or between al-Asad and al-Qadhdhafi is only the beginning of Soviet moves in the Middle East and in the Arab area by which the Soviets want to cover up their position in Afghanistan.

TUNISIAN-ALGERIAN RELATIONS REFLECT COMMON GOALS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 4 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali's upcoming official visit to Algeria will breathe new life into the fraternal relations that have studded the common history of the two brother countries. If we look back at the development of Algerian-Tunisian relations, it seems obvious that they are based on a shared past and development. During their struggle to liberate their respective countries, Algerian and Tunisian officials gave proof of that desire for rapprochement, solidarity, and fraternity: Sakiet has remained the example and symbol of this.

Today, as sovereign and independent states, Algeria and Tunisia--whose common history and struggle foreshadowed the shape of the Greater Maghreb--have given concrete expression to that desire for cooperation based on good-neighbor relations, mutual respect and, above all, constantly expanding relations in all areas, whether political, economic, cultural, or social.

And that desire has been given concrete expression at all levels and in all proceedings between the two countries. During his visit to Tunisia early last April, the Algerian chief of state, President Chadli Benjedid, emphasized once again the fraternal relations that link Algeria and Tunisia. In a telegram addressed to President Bourguiba following that visit, Tunisia's illustrious guest noted "the good relations which unite our two countries and which we are striving to develop and expand to serve the interests of our two brother peoples." And he expressed satisfaction "at the similarity of our views as regards all international problems as well as the need to coordinate our action and to work together to achieve the noble objectives of our two peoples and serve the causes of our Arab nation."

The periodic visits that are regularly made by Tunisian or Algerian officials to the other country demonstrate a constant concern and a continuing determination to revitalize bilateral relations and give constantly renewed impetus. Not a month passes without one country or the other recording a visit by a delegation from the brother country. Those consultations are as frank as they are continuous. They take place from the standpoint of building the Greater Maghreb, since they are concerned not only with the development of bilateral cooperation in all areas and its expansion but also with consultations on international problems, notably those of the Arab world. Throughout those consultations, there has been apparent not only a sincere desire to continue and intensify them but especially a similarity of views and an identical approach to the problems and questions discussed. That is an undeniable sign of the continuity and strengthening of the close ties which a common history has forged through the years and which a common development will continue to affirm even further.

COMMITTEE FOR SOLIDARITY WITH PALESTINIAN PEOPLE TERMINATES ACTIVITIES

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 28 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] (APS)--The strengthening of the resistance of the Palestinian peasants and people in the occupied territories and the materialization of the solidarity of peasants all over the world with the Palestinian people are among the main themes contained in the resolutions and recommendations of the follow-up committee which emerged from the Standing Committee for Solidarity with the Palestinian Peasants and People.

Made public in Algiers on Tuesday following a meeting that began on 24 August, attended by federations of peasants belonging to the Standing Committee for Solidarity with the Palestinian People, these resolutions note in their preamble that the work done in Algiers first of all reviewed the decisions and recommendations of the Second International Congress for Solidarity with the Palestinian Peasants and People held in Baghdad from 30 March to 2 April 1980.

The documents approved by the delegates recommend publication of a quarterly bulletin drafted by the General Union of Peasants and put out in several languages. Its distribution should cover all parties, federations and agricultural cooperatives throughout the world.

The committee also recommends proclamation of Earth Day (30 March) as a day of Arab solidarity with the Palestinian fellahs and people. It further recommends validation of the representation of this institution and that of Arab peasant organizations in the countries of East Europe, Greece, India, Nigeria, France, Mexico and Cuba. It asks for a guarantee of necessary contact in view of the participation of all committee members in the Warsaw meeting to be held on 30 March 1981, which will prepare for the Third International Congress of Solidarity with the Palestinian Peasants and People scheduled for 30 March 1982.

In the documents, delegates emphasize the reinforcement and materialization of solidarity throughout the world with the Palestinian people, particularly among farmers in Western countries.

UAE GRANTS YAR $10 MILLION--An agreement was signed this morning by the Abu Dhabi fund for Arab economic development granting the YAR $10 million to finance the second stage of the Southern Heights project in the YAR. The agreement was signed by Surur ibn Muhammad, the chief of the president's office and the chairman of the fund's board of directors, and by Muhammad Husayn Jamman, under secretary of the YAR Ministry of Agriculture. The ceremony was witnessed by Nasir Nuways, the fund's managing director. Muhammad Husayn told the Emirates news agency that the UAE plays an important role in the YAR's agricultural development projects. The Abu Dhabi fund had previously granted the YAR $10 million to finance the first stage of the project. He expressed the gratitude of the YAR Government and people to UAE president Shaykh Zayid ibn Sultan al-Nuhayyan for his attention and assistance in developing the YAR's agricultural projects within the framework of the fraternal relations linking the two brotherly nations. MEETING WITH BAHRAINI MINISTER--Yesterday, Chedi Klibi, secretary general of the League of Arab States, met with Dr Hussein Mohamed B'harna, Bahraini minister of legal affairs, who was accompanied by Bahrain's permanent representative to the League. In a statement, the Bahraini minister indicated that he and Klibi had exchanged views on current Arab problems and the activities of the League of Arab States. The meeting also concerned the idea of summoning an Arab conference on Palestine, attended by Arab thinkers who would debate the question outside the framework of government and in a scientific manner in order to find elements that might serve as a basis for solving the Palestinian problem. The Bahraini minister emphasized that the idea of organizing such a conference is being studied by the League of Arab States and said that the secretary general of the League believes that such a conference should be organized by the cultural and scientific institutions and organizations of the Arab countries. He concluded with the hope that a proper formula will be found for calling such a conference with the greatest possibilities of success. TALKS WITH PLO REPRESENTATIVE--Yesterday morning at the Government Palace in the Kasbah, Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali received Hakam Balaoui, the PLO representative in Tunis. Following the interview, Hakam Balaoui said he had discussed with the prime minister questions having to do with the situation that currently prevails in the Arab world, the Palestinian cause in particular, and the plans aimed at damaging the Palestinian revolution and the struggle by the Palestinian people. Balaoui added, "The prime minister expressed to us his complete understanding and reaffirmed Tunisia's continuing support and backing, under the leadership of President Bourguiba, for the Palestinian revolution in all areas until the objectives chosen by the Palestinian people--and aimed at the establishment of an independent Palestinian state on its own territory and under the leadership of the PLO--are achieved." U.S., EGYPT ACCUSED OF PLOTTING AGAINST AFGHANISTAN

Kabul ANIS in Dari 25 Aug 80 p 4

[Editorial]

[Text] The splendid Saur Revolution that resounded with happy news of freedom and well-being for the working masses all over our country and the region has encountered a hidden and open hostility of imperialistic and reactionary circles. They have armed bands of murderers and mercenaries with various weapons to create terror and fear and disturb peaceful and ordinary life of our hard-working people. They have sent these bands from the other side of the border to the towns and villages of our homeland. These terrorists have been armed with all kinds of murderous and destructive weapons supplied to them by imperialist, reactionary and chauvinist circles for the performance of sabotage.

According to reports in the press of various countries, recently a secret treaty has been concluded between the United States and Egypt, in accordance with which the government of Egypt is supplying arms made in the Soviet Union to saboteurs and plunderers to perpetrate all kinds of wicked acts against our revolution and our people. The government of Egypt, which from 1972 on has transformed Egypt into an anti-Islamic, anti-Arab and anti-Palestinian base, is serving at present the interests of the United States of America and has cut off its relations and solidarity with the Arab world and is completely obedient and subservient to orders and instructions of its American master. To be sure, in exchange for its shameful actions Egypt receives from the United States the most modern weapons.

Despite this, it is obvious that the foreign forces and agents will never be able to affect in the smallest way the determination and will of our people, and that in spite of all cunning intrigues and conspiracies of imperialism and its shady deals with antirevolutionary elements that were headed by the infamous Amin, the agent of the CIA, our revolution has now entered a new stage of its development and thus the dirty and ill-starred designs of the enemies of our country and revolution had failed; quite on the contrary, our people continue on the road of the progress and development they have chosen, with steadfastness and strong belief in annihilation of saboteurs and antirevolutionaries.

If the imperialism and reaction intensify their instigations or conclude secret or open treaties against our revolution and our country, they cannot achieve the slightest effect on the firm determination of our working masses, and the process of the development of the victorious Saur Revolution will continue, for millions of the common people of our country are ready to sacrifice themselves and defend in the trenches the great achievements of the revolution and of its new stage of development. There is no doubt whatever that the murderers, brigands and mercenary servants of imperialism and reaction will not be able to withstand the stormy waves of our revolution.

The secret treaty of the United States and Egypt against Afghanistan is another shameful stigma that they have left on their brow. It will likewise generate severe aversion of the peace-loving people all over the world toward signers of this treaty. For the people of Afghanistan after incessant centuries wish now to proceed rapidly on the road of progress and development and to shake the dust of backwardness from the sacred attire of their beloved homeland, imposed on it by colonialist circles.

Imperialism headed by the imperialism of America, that world-devouring monster, which derives its profits from the poverty and deprivation of nations and masses of toiling people of the world, now intends, in collaboration of its accomplices in crime, through the use of bands of saboteurs and robbers to put spokes in the swift advances of our revolution. Such actions, however, will achieve no other benefit than to make more obvious their antiprogressive and antihumanitarian nature, and create ever greater aversion of the free people of the world.

Our revolution traverses its stages of day-by-day increasing development. The unity of the people and the government of Democratic Republic of Afghanistan under the leadership of the Khalq Democratic Party of Afghanistan becomes stronger each day, for our cause and aspirations conform to the wishes of the people and to our times.

AFGHAN LEADER CONFIRMS EGYPTIAN MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO MUJAHIDIN

Cairo ROSE AL-YUSUF in Arabic 21 Jul 80 pp 40, 41

[Interview with Afghan leader Sayyid Muhammad Musa Tawana in Cairo; date not given]

[Text] Somewhere in Cairo, I met with 2 leaders of the Afghan revolution. They had come on a secret mission that took 48 hours, after which they left for Saudi Arabia and some Arabian Gulf emirates before they returned to Peshawar in Pakistan. One of these leaders is Dr Sayyid Muhammad Musa Tawana who studied at al-Azhar University. He lived in Cairo for 7 years during which he received his doctorate degree from al-Azhar. His dissertation was entitled: "Diligence in interpretation of the Koran."

The other leader is Muhammadjan Ahmadzay. He belongs to the Zay tribe, known for its fierce battles with the Soviets. This tribe had declared the holy war against the Soviet invasion of its country. All its members joined the rebels in their fights. This Afghan leader graduated from the School of Islamic Law at the University of Kabul in Afghanistan. He was taught by Afghan teachers who studied at al-Azhar.

Both Afghan leaders are members of the Afghan Revolution Council which includes 35 members. This council was established after all Islamic parties and organizations engaged in the Afghan revolution agreed to unite their efforts in the battle to liberate their country from Soviet imperialism.

My meeting with the Afghan leaders was arranged on one condition: That I will not publish this interview until after they had left Cairo and were safely back in Peshawar in Pakistan, as they wanted to ensure the success of their secret mission to Cairo.

I went to see them at the appointed time. Dr Tawana smiled and said: "When I came to Cairo for the first time, I stayed at the Family Hotel in the Sayyid al-Husayn Quarter. I later moved to the city of Islamic studies where I stayed for 7-1/2 years."

[Question] I am interested in knowing how long can the Afghan revolution hold out against the Soviet invasion of its country?

[Answer] We will fight to the last man, even if the war between us and the Russians lasts 10 or 20 years. What is important to us is that the Russian forces leave our country.

[Question] The Russians claim that they have pulled out part of their forces from Afghanistan.

[Answer] The forces that the Russians pulled out consisted of some administrative units and some tank units that were no longer useful in the mountain fights against us. Our information sources confirm that they brought new forces into Afghanistan.

[Question] According to American intelligence reports, the Russians have around 85,000 soldiers in Afghanistan.

[Answer] This may be correct. But we also have to take into consideration that more than 40,000 other Soviet soldiers are using Soviet bases within the Soviet Union to shell the rebel bases in the northern areas adjacent to the USSR borders.

[Question] What is the true current military situation in Afghanistan?

[Answer] It is enough to assure you that the Afghan Mujahidin were able to administer several blows to Soviet forces even within Soviet territory. It is anticipated that, in the next stage, we will move the war into the major cities which they control. I can confirm that the Mujahidin have inflicted heavy losses on the Soviet forces. I do not think the Kremlin had anticipated such losses.

[Question] What about weapons?

[Answer] We are fighting with whatever weapons we take from the Russians themselves and with what the Afghan soldiers who join our forces bring.

[Question] Do you receive weapons from Islamic and Arab nations?

[Answer] This is no longer a secret. The Afghan revolution receives weapons and ammunition from Egypt. I do not wish to say that Egypt is the only Islamic and Arab nation that offers us all the weapons and ammunition we need.

[Question] How about other Islamic and Arab nations?

[Answer] Unfortunately, all that we receive from those nations is some financial aid, and sometimes kind words.

The Afghan Mujahidin feel sorry and bitter about the stand of some PLO leaders who sold themselves to the Soviet Union through their strange declarations of their support of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The Afghan people took well-known positions at the UN and in international circles in support of the Palestine cause. Until now, they have not recognized Israel. Therefore, the Afghan people expected the PLO leaders to support them, and not stab the Afghan people's struggle in the back while they are fighting to free their country?

[Question] Is it true that the Afghan Revolution Council issued a religious ruling allowing the Mujahidin to break their fast during Ramadan because they were in a state of war against the Soviets?

[Answer] During their fights against the Russians, the Mujahidin were able to fast for 2 or 3 days until they found some food in the mountains. The Afghan Revolution Council did not issue such a ruling. However, it is customary among the Mujahidin that, during the month of Ramadan, each will go to fight fasting, and will continue to fast as long as he can. I do not think that fasting during the blessed month could weaken the Mujahidin's zeal to fight.

[Question] What news of the Mujahidin have you brought from Peshawar?

[Answer] A massacre inside the communists' prisions where many educated Afghans were killed.

[Question] How many do you estimate were killed during this massacre?

[Answer] At least 1,000 educated [Afghans,] most of them lawyers, doctors and engineers. [End of answer]

This is what I heard from the Afghan leader who came to Cairo on a secret mission that only took 2 days.

The most important thing the Mujahidin need these days is anti-aircraft and anti-tank rockets to face the increasing raids on their locations by the Soviet invasion forces.

It is true, as the Afghan leader told me, that the Mujahidin were recently able to shoot down a number of Soviet helicopters and also succeeded in destroying a large number of Soviet tanks. However, the Mujahidin need more rockets to be able to deal a decisive blow to the Soviet forces.

The Mujahidin attack Soviet tanks with hand grenades and with whatever Soviet weapons they acquire, while they shout: "Allah Akbar. Allah Akbar." Increased losses of Soviet tanks prompted the following joke among the Afghan Mujahidin in the mountains: The Soviet commander in Kabul sent a message to Moscow requesting a new weapon to fight what he described as a secret weapon used by the Afghans, called "Allah Akbar."

Four Leaders Are al-Azhar Graduates

According to the latest reports from Peshawar at the Pakistan-Afghan borders, the leaders of the 6 national movements that lead the Afghan revolution took Cairo's advice. An agreement took place among 5 of them to work in a united front that functions as an Afghan Revolution Council, under the name of the "Islamic Union for the Liberation of Afghanistan". This front was formed under the leadership of one of the Mujahidin leaders, 'Abd al-Rasul Sayyaf. The leader of the 6th national movement agreed, during a meeting held this week in Geneva, to join this front. It was decided that each movement have 7 representatives in the union [council].

It is not common knowledge that 4 of the leaders of these national movements who joined this front have studied in and graduated from al-Azhar. Among them is Mr Burhan al-Din Rabbani, the chairman of the Islamic Afghan Organization, who received his masters degree from al-Azhar. He was the dean of the school of arts at the University of Kabul before the communist revolution against the late Afghan president Muhammad Dawud took place.

They also include al-Shaykh Sibghat Allah al-Mujaddidi, the chief of the National Front to Save Afghanistan. He is the cousin of Shaykh Sadiq al-Mujaddidi who was the Afghan ambassador to Cairo. He is one of the most prominent Afghan tribal leaders. He is also a graduate of al-Azhar. He used to teach at the Islamic Law School at the University of Kabul. He was arrested during the late president Dawud's regime on the charge of plotting to assassinate Khrushchev during his visit to Afghanistan. He was sentenced to 5 years in jail. After his release, he went to Saudi Arabia where he was chosen by King Faysal to become the chairman of the Islamic Center in Copenhagen, Denmark. When the Soviets attacked his country, he resigned to lead his movement against Soviet imperialism.

Very few people also know that one of the Mujahidin is a blood relative of the late Iraqi leader Rashid 'Ali al-Gailani. His name is Mr Ahmad Gailani. He is the head of a national movement called the National Islamic Party of Afghanistan. His father was the head of descendants of the Prophet in Afghanistan. He is a member of the al-Gailani sect in Iraq, and his followers are spread out in Paktia province in southeast Afghanistan.

NEW FIVE-YEAR PLAN TO REFLECT DECENTRALIZATION

Better Choice of Investments

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 4 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by A. Bllaha]

[Excerpts] Oran--Within the framework of preparations for the new 5-year plan, the interministerial commission now making a working visit to the western region of the country arrived here Monday afternoon from Tlemcen. The delegation spent 3 days on committee work drafting projects for the region.

The perspective of the new plan reflects the policy of decentralization. It has become necessary and wise to define actions to be taken within the framework of future plans on the basis of methodological orientations of work, specifically, a strategy of action for the next 5 years. It is both a provisional and sectoral strategy. In addition, practical guidelines relating to short-term actions will be followed this year in order to try to eliminate or at least attenuate existing limitations.

Interministerial Region Visiting Regions

[Excerpt] Following the adoption of the main guidelines by the Special Congress of the FLN, the five-year plan is once again being studied by regional bodies so as to determine precisely what projects will be included for the period (1980-1984).

The interministerial commission, made up of representatives of the ministries of Interior and Planning who have been in Tlemcen for 3 days, finished its examination of the governorate's proposals for the 1980-1984 Five-Year Plan yesterday.

Choice of Plan Projects

[Excerpts] Oran--An interministerial delegation will meet in Mascara on 8, 9 and 10 September to study proposals for the 5-year plan. The three days of work will enable the delegation to meet with local officials and elected representatives of the APW [Governorate Popular Assembly] and draw up the final list of projects to submit for government approval.

The governorate of Mascara does not have sufficient technical and financial means, a handicap to economic development, particularly agriculture, which requires urgent rehabilitation in order to make Mascara a real national "breadbox." Agricultural recovery is especially urgent in the Halra Plain, where the situation is truly alarming.

For over 10 years, a swamp has been forming on the plain (addition of Sig and Mohammadia), extending over thousands of hectares and threatening the entire agricultural area. The other two plains also have problems. The rich Ghriss Plain is experiencing a decrease in the phreatic layer because of intensive garden crop growing (three crops a year), which also depletes the soil. In the other part of the region at Beni Chograne as well, erosion is taking its toll and year after year, the amount of arable land decreases.

The water situation also needs particular attention because the situation is very precarious. Because of the rapid deterioration of facilities, irrigation capacities are declining. There is also the problem of silting which has existed for several years. The Chorfa (Sig) Dam is outdated.

All the communes have major problems: housing crisis, inadequate means of communication, a lack of drinking water, and so on. The communes believe that property reserves and individual construction will be the only answer to this problem.

In rural communes, unemployment is acute. Only the establishment of small industries will be of general help.

Tlemcen: Development of Agriculture

Tlemcen (APS)--The 1980-1984 Plan has been under study for several days in order to draft a program of projects for Tlemcen.

In this governorate, where agriculture is the basis of the economy, the program of proposals emanating from local collectives and department heads include many actions whose completion seems to determine the future of this vital sector.

A series of actions has therefore been proposed relating to the development of land. Development will mainly be aimed at stepping up grain production with the main effort directed toward improving yields. According to agriculture departments, winter grains would go from 7.2 to 12 quintals [sentence incomplete]

The same departments emphasize that at the conclusion of this effort, grain production will reach 1.83 million quintals, or a 600,000-quintal increase compared with the 1979-1980 season.

In the course of the 1980-1984 period, emphasis will also be placed on the development of other grains such as corn and sorghum. Production estimates between now and the end of the plan are 7,500 quintals.

More land will be set aside for dry vegetables. Some 6,800 hectares will permit the production of chickpeas and beans to triple.

The governorate estimates that current arboriculture production easily meets the region's needs, but emphasis will be placed on the development of crops best adapted to the region, mainly almonds and olive trees.

Regarding olive trees, some 1,200 more hectares will be planted and by the end of the plan, production should total 43,000 quintals, compared with 24,000 at present.

Concerning citrus fruits, 450 hectares will be reconverted in order to reach a production of 191,000 quintals, compared with 139,000 in 1979.

As a result of these actions, the governorate will have 18,400 hectares in trees instead of the 13,000 at present. Plants will be supplied locally by nurseries in the governorate.

Industrial crops now cover some 758 hectares. This area will be extended to 1,300 hectares during the plan.

Concerning vineyards, there are plans to rehabilitate 1,500 hectares in order to improve yields of wine grapes and to develop table grapes on a area of 580 hectares. Some 100 hectares will be reserved for raisins. Over the next 5 years, there will be an increase in table grape production amounting to 50,000 quintals.

Also within the framework of agriculture, there is great interest in expanding two crops: potatoes and tomatoes.

It is estimated that 2,400 more hectares will be planted in potatoes, reaching a production of 360,000 quintals by 1984. Tomato production estimates for the end of the plan total 132,000 quintals.

Proposals for forage crops have been studied, governorate officials say, based on new needs created by the development of cattle and sheep raising.

The majority of these needs will be covered by an increase in rotation cropping. It has been proposed to develop vetch oats and introduce new forage crops such as bersim and sorghum-corn.

Milk production, which exceeded 19 million liters in 1979, will reach 26 million liters in 1985, according to estimates.

In order to achieve that goal, it is proposed to import 1,050 high-yield heifers.

Regarding sheep production, emphasis has been placed on the purchase of 13,300 head in order to create conditions favorable to an increase in lamb meat amounting to 130 tons by the end of 1984.

With other proposals concerning the establishment of semi-industrial hatcheries, the program should ensure 100-percent coverage of the governorate's meat and egg needs.

Other actions have also been proposed by the governorate for the development of agriculture and rabbit raising in the region.

Forestry projects submitted to the interministerial commission grant priority to soil conservation in the Ghazaouet, Sidi Abdelli and Ain Youcef basins.

It has been proposed to allocate 140,000 hectares for agricultural waterworks, soil reclamation techniques, torrential correction, and finally, adapted agricultural techniques.

The reforestation of 4,000 hectares has been proposed, along with new soil reclamation projects and major rehabilitation projects covering 9,000 hectares. Maintenance and planting supervision over an area of 8,000 hectares will help fight parasites and disaster prevention is planned for 38,000 hectares.

New Projects for Tlemcen

[Excerpts] Tlemcen (APS)--An interministerial delegation made up of 40 members including representatives from the Ministry of Interior and the Office of Secretary of State for Planning arrived in Tlemcen on Saturday. Within the framework of committee work, projects included in the 5-year plan will be studied for the region.

The governorate of Tlemcen intends to give priority during this plan to completion of projects already underway. By 31 December 1979, projects remaining to be completed amounted to 2,300 billion dinars, representing 35 percent of all investment objectives set for the 1970-1979 decade.

In addition, the monthly situation as of the first half of 1980 showed that the following percentages of credits had been used: Special Program, 61.67 percent; First Five-Year Plan, 39.20 percent; Second Four-Year Plan, 56.70 percent; PDC [expansion unknown] and PMU, 67.29 percent, or an overall average of 59.45 percent.

With the new projects in the 1980-1984 Plan, the governorate of Tlemcen aims to achieve three main objectives which, the committee chairman explained, include the institution of a regional economic balance throughout the region, intensive mobilization of water resources, modernization and development of agriculture and finally, reinforcement of local industries and development of profitable cottage industries.

Within this framework, the foundations must be laid for a solid local industrial sector, while strengthening existing activity and developing rural space by wide-ranging actions. Soil conservation efforts and certain crop-raising and grazing practices are aimed at intensifying agricultural production, restoring balance between the richer and poorer areas and finally, stabilizing the population.

These broad actions will be completed by the production of tourist activity and the infrastructure needed to satisfy social needs in all areas: water, energy, education and professional training, health, housing, marketing, and so on.

AGRICULTURAL OFFICIALS RELEASE HARVEST FIGURES

Grain Harvest in Setif

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 3 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Setif (APS)--Agricultural officials in the governorate of Setif have announced that 1,534,145 quintals is the total figure for the winter grain harvest begun throughout the governorate on 20 June.

The initial objective of 1.8 million quintals was not attained. Agriculture departments believe that this year the harvest was only average because of the 2-month drought (January and February) which affected the plowing and planting operations.

The area planted in grain this year (all varieties: hard and soft wheat, barley and oats) was about 270,842 hectares, or 78,093 for the socialist sector, 20,001 hectares for the Agrarian Revolution sector and 172,748 for the private sector. Some 5,000 hectares of this total were damaged by hail or fire.

The harvest by sector of activity is as follows: 451,118 quintals for the socialist sector in hard and soft wheat, barley and oats; 93,183 quintals for the Agrarian Revolution sector in all varieties; and 989,844 quintals harvested by the private sector, which totals 1,534,145 quintals.

By variety and for the three sectors combined, the hard wheat harvest is estimated at 750,721 quintals, soft wheat 250,495 quintals, barley 492,791 quintals and finally, oats 40,138 quintals.

Regarding equipment, the governorate received 165 threshers and other machines this year. It should also be noted that ONAMA [National Agricultural Equipment Office] organized mobile crews that traveled throughout the governorate repairing agricultural machinery as long as the harvest lasted.

The governorate's storage capacity is generally adequate. The two cooperatives in Setif and Bordj-Bou-Arreridj can by themselves store nearly 1 million quintals, without counting the CAPCS [Communal Multi-Service Agriculture Cooperative] storage units and other agricultural production facilities set up throughout the governorate.

While on the whole, this harvest which came to a close last week enjoyed good conditions throughout the governorate, agriculture departments nevertheless complain about the lack of workers, which is felt more heavily every year at the time of the grain harvest.

Production Nearly Doubles

[Article by A. Belkhodja]

[Text] Oran--The 430,946 hectares planted in grain in the governorate of Tiaret were completely harvested during the threshing season, yielding 2.7 million quintals.

Although it was judged an average harvest, an increase of a million quintals was recorded compared with last year.

As they customarily do, the CCLS [expansion unknown] are temporarily using the premises of the production units to store the grain. In addition to these new facilities, it was necessary to use open-air storage areas for 450,000 quintals.

The hard work required needs no further commentary, but the harvest this year coincided with Ramadan. Depending directly on machinery, the harvest calls on the governorates of Oran and Mostaganem, which loaned Tiaret 20 threshing machines in order to keep up the pace and complete the work.

Actually, out of 882 threshing machines which the governorate has, only 552 were operable because repairs demand a large number of spare parts. Whether it be a question of plowing, cultivation or the harvest, it is always spare parts that are needed.

One must consider that every season, the number of breakdowns never seems to diminish. Consequently, the shortage of agricultural machinery is due, on the one hand, to the lack of spare parts and second, to the inadequate maintenance characterizing several production units.

The other phenomenon that emerged during the harvest was the lack of seasonal labor. The CAPRA [Agricultural Production Cooperative of the Agrarian Revolution] assigned to each self-managed unit had to lend workers in the socialist sector a hand.

It was thanks to this touiza that the harvest had no serious disturbances.

Agriculture in the governorate of Tiaret would be seriously compromised if such a situation were to persist. Solutions will have to be provided within the framework of the restructuration of self-managed domains now planned.

Labor is also scarce in areas reserved for dry vegetables, which this year covered nearly 24,000 hectares.

Market garden crops occupy only a small area of 255 hectares. The development of large areas is planned within the framework of projects in Ain-Sekhouna, Nahr-Oussel and Oued Touil.

Another expansion involving 400 hectares is planned for the Takchemaret perimeter. These operations will develop production capacities for market garden crops and will attenuate the deficit already accentuated by private sectors' watermelon crops, which do not require much effort. Watermelons attract a whole host of unscrupulous businessmen who speculate on booking expecting to make huge profits. The water that should be used to increase the production of market garden crops frequently goes to watermelons, which are not a basic commodity.

Grape Harvest in Oran

[Text] Oran (APS)--Beginning on 7 August, the grape harvest spread to 11 communes in the governorate of Oran this week. According to the representative of the Vineyard and Wine Institute at the level of the governorate's agricultural directorate, estimates drawn up for this harvest were set at some 300,000 quintals for an area of 16,200 hectares, including 15,800 hectares for wine grapes.

Preparations for this grape harvest were begun in July. Contacts between the different offices involved in the operation made it possible to review all the problems that had arisen during the preceding harvest, when production was 130,000 quintals.

According to the Institute official, production this year will double thanks to favorable climatic conditions. In order to ensure smooth operations, daily bonuses of 3 to 4 dinars were granted to cutters and carriers by the ONCV [National Office for Marketing Wine and Wine Products] this year. If all conditions are met, especially at the ten vineyards in the governorate of Oran, the grape harvest will be completed on 15 September.

Objectives Exceeded in Guelma

[Text] Guelma (APS)--The harvest, which began somewhat late this year in the governorate of Guelma because of bad weather, has by and large exceeded its objectives.

Begun on 14 June in the earliest zones (districts of Bouchegouf and Guelma), the harvest spread to the rest of the governorate on 30 June and was completed on 11 August 1980 with a harvest of 1.67 million quintals.

Preparations began in the beginning of April and were marked by a series of meetings presided over by Governor Abderrahmane Baazizi and attended by all technical and administrative personnel.

All problems linked to the harvest were debated and officials took certain measures to smooth out difficulties, including the pooling of machinery.

This method, in limited use in previous harvests, yielded good results and made it possible to make up for lost time.

Concerning the governorate's machinery, the system of two crews was adopted so as to make maximum use of the means at hand.

Given the size of the governorate and the diversity of the climate, work was planned by technical departments taking early zones into account.

In an effort to limit the risk of fire, safety measures were taken, to wit, the establishment of a station on the farms and a fire brigade with every machinery pool.

These crews were equipped with a tank, a tractor sprayer and a plow.

Priority was given to fields exposed to fires (roads and urban centers in particular).

Regarding the reception of the harvest and in order to encourage the private sector to deliver its production, the Algerian Interoccupational Grains Office was asked to increase the number of collection points and to set up stations.

With an objective of 214,000 hectares, the governorate of Guelma and those of Batna, Oum El Bouaghi and Setif are mainly grain growers. However, unlike the latter, Guelma has a better climate.

This year, the water shortage was mainly felt in December and January, which explains why the harvest objectives were generally exceeded.

Actually, harvesting amounted to nearly 214,200 hectares for the three sectors combined (Agrarian Revolution, self-managed and private sectors) and production on 18 August 1980 was 1.67 million quintals, exceeding estimates by 400,000 quintals.

The private sector provides 60 percent of all production, given the amount of land it uses (122,100 hectares). Generally speaking, this harvest, which was relatively better than those of preceding seasons, improved because of the means used and the efforts made during the plowing-planting, fertilization and weeding by different agriculture departments.

Regarding equipment, it should be pointed out that there has been a clear improvement in machinery with the purchase of 120 new harvesters.

In addition, the availability and continuing supply of spare parts from ONAMA made it possible to act effectively in repairing broken down machinery.

The governorate's needs for various products (fuel, bags, and so on) were covered throughout the season.

From the technical standpoint, coverage of the operation was ensured by a team from the Agricultural Directorate and the departments of the Algerian Agricultural Equipment Office.

The machinery used included 488 threshing machines. As for storage, the difficulties encountered during preceding seasons were smoothed out to the great satisfaction of producers.

Naturally, there are still some difficulties, but they are temporary, the Agriculture and Agrarian Revolution Directorate states.

This situation will be solved gradually with the reception at the end of August of an 80,000-quintal silo in the commune of Belkheir, the construction of two more in Oued-Zenati and Tamlouka and a 25,000-quintal storage facility in M'Daourouche.

By 18 August, 833 quintals of grain had been delivered to the Guelma and Souk-Ahras cooperatives, which continue to make substantial efforts to deliver the maximum production.

IDF INTELLIGENCE CHIEF ON IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT, U.S. POLICY

TA281554 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 28 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Report on Ze'ev Schiff interview with the chief of the IDF Intelligence Branch, Maj Gen Yehoshu'a Sagi, at the Intelligence Branch headquarters: "The Soviet Union Will Stand to Gain at any Rate; Washington Moves Show U.S. Weakness"; date not given]

[Excerpts] In the office of the chief of the IDF Intelligence Branch at the general headquarters, Maj Gen Yehushu'a Sagi, there is no optimism regarding the effects of the Iran-Iraq war on the stability of the region and on Israel. The major general estimates that in any event, the Soviet Union will stand to gain from this war.

The Washington moves are interpreted in this region as a U.S. weakness. Saudi Arabia is seized with fear and the question of the United States credibility will again be raised. If 12 Iraqi divisions are stationed on the Saudi border, Egypt will be unable to provide a solution or a counterbalance for this threat, this is the gist of the chief of intelligence's assessment in a special interview with HA'ARETZ.

In my opinion, he says, Baghdad has not coordinated in advance the war with the Soviet Union. It is noteworthy, however, that the Iraqis have a good infrastructure of ammunitions and spare parts. Regarding the Iranian army, it is not clear whether their ammunition will be sufficient for a long war.

"An Iraqi victory," Major General Sagi says, "will mean Iraqi hegemony in the Persian Gulf, a fact that will effect the entire region. It is a big question whether or not Khomeyni's regime could absorb such a blow. Three major developments are possible: 1) a weak Iranian regime that will accept dictates from Iraq; 2) Iran's disintegration due to the separatist tendencies of the Kurds, the Baluchis, and the Azerbaijanis who have always been demanding independence--in addition there is the Iraqi claim to Khuzistan; and 3) the possibility of the rise of the Iranian left. The Soviet Union stands to gain from all of these possible developments. According to Major General Sagi there are no signs now that the Iranian generals want to take over control in Iran.

An Iraqi victory will strengthen the Jordanian-Iraqi axis. According to Major General Sagi this constitutes a direct danger to Israel. This is a future threat. The situation may even worsen in 6 months. In this war Jordan has taken a decisive step. It has allowed Iraqi aircraft on its airfields, notwithstanding the Syrian hostility toward such a move.

[Question] Will not the stationing of Iraqi units in Jordan be detrimental to the early warning level of Israeli intelligence?

[Answer] The stationing of an Iraqi army in Jordan will be bad from the military as well as from the intelligence aspect.

[Question] Then why did Israel tacitly consent to the stationing of Iraqi transport planes in Jordan? Tomorrow it may be fighter aircraft or other equipment.

[Answer] We can oppose it of course, but we must take into account that, as a result of Israeli opposition hostilities between Israel and Jordan and other Arab states could flare up.

The U.S. penetration into Egypt and military aid for that country are not directly related to the war in the Persian Gulf, but Major General Sagi's answer to this raises the question of the overall U.S. policy toward the region. "Israel has been requested not to interrupt the process of the U.S. involvement and it has also been requested to pay the price for those U.S. achievements. If the United States had changed its approach, Israel could have served as a powerful lever for the United States in the region. However, Israel is now neutralized," Major General Sagi concluded.

'HA'ARETZ' COMMENTS ON IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT

TA261946 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 26 Sep 80 p 11

[Commentary by Ze'ev Schiff: "The Dangers of the Neighboring War"]

[Excerpt] Israel has nothing to regret over the fact that two countries that are its enemies are spilling each other's blood and causing damage and casualties to each other; but the problem does not end there. Even a war between enemies can produce negative results from Israel's viewpoint. It is true that Israel can today claim more vigorously that the danger to the oil flow to the West does not spring from the nonestablishment of a Palestinian state and that there are greater dangers, but these claims do not even solve our public relations problems.

If we have any interest in this war it is that the Iraqi side should be beaten and defeated and that the flow of oil to the West should not be harmed. With all the horror Khomeyni's regime in Iran evokes, it would be better from our viewpoint if the Iranians were to beat Iraq. However, this is not how matters appear today and we will discuss this later.

Iraq is the greatest danger to Israel. It is the main military power on the eastern front in spite of its distance from our border. This is the most extremist country in terms of aims and plans. It is building a military nuclear option for the future that may jeopardize Israel's existence. In spite of its links with France and some other European countries the United States has no moderating influence on it. Although Iraq's basic targets are in the Persian Gulf, it is clear that it is developing another option in the direction of Israel. The Iraqi-Jordanian axis developed over the past year is an example of this. There is a real danger in this axis and Israel must keep a careful watch to make sure that Iraqi planes landing in Jordan because of the current war in the Gulf will not set a precedent and become a permanent system. Tomorrow these will be fighter planes and the day after that Iraqi emergency reserve units may be established in Jordan, with all that implies as far as Israel is concerned.

An Iraqi victory in the war with Iran would be a threat in the future to other countries in the Persian Gulf. Iraq may renew the old dispute with Kuwait. Such a victory would certainly cause panic in Saudi Arabia, which has a long common border with Iraq, but its reaction could be greater consideration for the "rejectionist countries" and greater caution about a link with Egypt. Warning voices are already heard in Cairo on this matter. A long time ago President as-Sadat predicted the possibility that Iraq would take advantage of the vacuum left in the Persian Gulf after the Shah's downfall. Israeli experts also saw what was being born.

It is true that Iraq has recently been developing links with France, but Iraq still keeps a Russian orientation. To this moment there is a question about the amount of coordination between Iraq and Moscow on the issue of the war. The evaluation is that the Iraqis surprised even the Russians. But matters will only become clearer in the future.

ISRAEL AMONG WORLD LEADERS IN MILITARY RESEARCH

TA231825 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 23 Sep 80 p 4

[Report by Avraham Peleg, scientific affairs correspondent: "Survey by the Development and Research Council: The Military Research in Israel is Proportionately as Big as in the United States"]

[Text] In relative terms, military research and development in Israel is similar to that of the United States. In terms of the overall size of the entire system of military, civilian and scientific research, relative to the Gross National Product, Israel is one of the leaders in the developed Western world.

This finding was reported in a survey on the issue of "research and development systems in small countries--reference to Israel" by Dr Menahem Karmi. The survey was conducted on behalf of the National Council for Research and Development attached to the energy and infrastructure ministry.

The survey reported that "Israel is an outstanding exception among the small developed countries in the field of research." From the point of view of the relative size of the scientific research, Israel is in the same category with the superpowers and three small countries: Switzerland, Sweden and Holland.

Proportionate to the size of the population, Israel is in first place in the publication of research works. According to the survey, in 1976 the number of publishing scientists per 1 million population was: 1,102 in Israel, 741 in the United States, 146 in Japan, 582 in England, 516 in Sweden and 450 in Denmark. The average number of publications (per million) of the small and large countries is about 500, while it is double this figure in Israel.

In contrast with this achievement a more negative situation is noted in the number of patents issued (in the United States). While small countries, such as Austria with 137 patents, Holland with 67, Sweden with 128 and Switzerland with 146 (in 1976) had a relatively large number of patents, Israel that year registered only 24 patents (for $100 million worth of exports.) In other words, the industrial research effort in Israel does not match the achievements in university research.

Dr Gershon Metzger, assistant director of National Council for Research and Development, noted that until recently industrial research and development in Israel had largely lagged behind the decisive majority of the developed countries. The university sector occupies the central place in the civilian research system in Israel, and Israel leads the developed Western world in expenditures for university research.

The author of the survey, Dr Karmi, noted in conclusion that the tendency of decentralization in the government research and development mechanism due to the Katchalski Committee recommendations has gone too far and the opposite tendency is now needed: more centralization in research.

GAZA'S MAYOR CITED ON HYPOTHESIS OF ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM GAZA

LD221249 Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Sep 80 p 5

[Article by Francis Cornu: "Mayor of Gaza 'Fears' a 'False Withdrawal' by Israelis from His Territory"]

[Text] Gaza--Could the inhabitants of Gaza territory discover one day soon that after 13 years of occupation, the Israelis have suddenly "partially" withdrawn? Mayor of Gaza Rashad al-Shawwa does not hide the fact that he "fears" such an eventuality and would like to know whether his anxiety is really founded. This attitude is not as paradoxical as it might seem. Like the vast majority of the 400,000 Palestinians in the territory of which he is the main political figure, he was wanted the Israeli Army to go for a long time but he is afraid that the Jerusalem leaders may be planning a "false withdrawal" and even a trap.

A recent meeting with [former Israeli Foreign Minister] Moshe Dayan and current rumors within the Israeli military administration in Gaza are behind his fears. These fears are so acute that Mr al-Shawwa told us on 14 September that he had just sent a message to [PLO leader] Yasir 'Arafat to inform him of the situation.

The former Israeli foreign minister visited Mr al-Shawwa on 6 September and explained to him the plan he has constantly upheld since he left the government almost 1 year ago: Israel should not await a hypothetical agreement on the autonomy plan to alter the situation in the occupied territories by withdrawing some of its troops and its administration. Mr Dayan thinks that, since negotiations have reached deadlock, the Israeli government should make a "unilateral" gesture as soon as possible to try and create a "new atmosphere."

Mr Dayan asked the Mayor of Gaza: "What attitude would you take if Israel were to carry out a partial withdrawal and if you, therefore, had to take over control of some of the territory's administration?" Mr al-Shawwa is well aware that Mr Dayan's ideas are far from being shared by Mr Begin's government. He also knows that Mr Dayan's approach was a private one and that Mr Dayan assured him he was only speaking on his own behalf. However Mr al-Shawwa also knows how much influence Mr Dayan can have and he is now wondering whether the former minister was not after all indirectly given the job of sounding him out before a decision was taken.

Mr al-Shawwa added that his suspicions were increased when he learned in the past few days that the Gaza military governor's headquarters was making plans for considerably reducing Israeli administrative staff in Gaza territory. "It may just be a coincidence," Mr al-Shawwa said, "but I prefer to consider all possibilities because this is a very serious matter."

The mayor of Gaza answered Mr Dayan's question in a completely negative way: "We must categorically reject this plan whose one aim is to divide the Palestinians by dissociating Gaza's fate from that of the West Bank.... Gaza is already isolated and the aim is to complete that isolation once and for all. In addition how can we accept that the Israelis should abandon some of their responsibilities overnight after 13 years of occupation. They really have not prepared us for taking over--that is the least I can say. Who will police the territory, for instance? I fear that trouble might start as soon as the troops leave. That is probably another aspect of what the Israeli leaders aim to achieve; if disorder broke out they would have a pretext for returning and continuing the occupation after showing international opinion that we are not capable of governing ourselves."

Finally Mr al-Shawwa stressed that any Israeli withdrawal would be completely hypocritical since it is much easier, he stressed, to control Gaza than the West Bank. "Gaza is not only an island," he added, "it is an island of sand, there is not one stone to throw. The border is only 4 km from here and the army could return as quickly as it had left."

The plan mentioned by Mr Dayan, which might be adopted by the Begin Government this time, is not really an innovation. For almost 1 year the preliminary talks between Israel, Egypt and the United States have often discussed the question of applying autonomy to the Gaza territories "first," if, as seems probable, it proves impossible on the West Bank. President al-Sadat is not hostile to that solution but he has stated that he wants an all-embracing agreement on the principles governing this autonomy before an experiment is tried in Gaza. What the mayor of Gaza now fears is that this "Gaza first" solution be replaced by a prelude, in that a general agreement on autonomy seems a long way from being achieved at present.

DENIAL OF PLAN FOR PARTIAL GAZA WITHDRAWAL CITED

LD221309 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Francis Cornu: "The Authorities Deny the Existence of a Plan for Partial Withdrawal from Gaza"]

[Text] Jerusalem--Rashad al-Shawwa, mayor of Gaza, has not had to wait long for clarification about a possible Israeli initiative on the future of the Gaza territory. Military government headquarters in the territory has just categorically denied that there are any preparations for a withdrawal or a redeployment of the army for the slightest change in the administration. Numbers of the prime minister's entourage in Jerusalem also deny that Israel is engaged in unilateral implementation of the autonomy plan; it has been stated that this idea has never been discussed in the cabinet.

In addition it has been pointed out that Israelis and Egyptians have on several occasions envisaged applying the autonomy plan in the Gaza territory first but on conditions that an all-embracing agreement concerning the West Bank too has first been reached. A government source indicates that President al-Sadat referred to this possibility in a recent letter to Prime Minister Menahem Begin.

These explanations imply that an Israeli initiative in Gaza could not be one of the "gestures" which Cairo and Washington expect from the Jerusalem leaders to facilitate the resumption of negotiations and discussions during the next tripartite summit which is to take place in the United States at the end of the year. In addition these denials prove that the Israeli government is not prepared to follow adivce from former Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan who maintains that Israel should take a unilateral decision and hence partially withdraw from the occupied territories without waiting for a general agreement on autonomy.

EGYPTIAN DEFENSE MINISTRY TO HANDLE AL-'ARISH TERMINAL

TA231422 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 23 Sep 80 p 2

[Report by 'Ezra Yanuv: "The Sinai Egyptian Terminal to be Transferred to the Egyptian Defense Ministry's Responsibility"]

[Text] The Egyptian authorities have recently decided to turn over responsibility for the Egyptian passenger terminal in al-'Arish to the defense ministry and station army officers there instead of citizens to cope with the problems developing because of the increase in the number of people crossing between Israel and Egypt.

Hundreds of tourists have complained to the Egyptian authorities that processing at the Egyptian terminal is very difficult as compared with the convenience at the Israeli side. Up to 1,000 passengers can move in both directions per day. Most of the passengers are Israelis, tourists and inhabitants of the Gaza Strip and northern Sinai.

The number of infiltrators from the Egyptian to the Israeli side has grown recently. The reason for the infiltration is to find employment in Israel. Since there is no fear that the infiltration has a hostile intent, the tendency is to allow every Egyptian citizen who is caught to return to his home within 8 hours of his capture. Nevertheless, several people suspected of being designated to head Gaza terrorist squads were caught not long ago.

PERES PUBLISHES 'OPEN LETTER' TO BEGIN

TA191523 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 19 Sep 80 p 44

[Labor Party Chairman Shim'on Peres' "Open Letter to Prime Minister Begin"]

[Text] Honorable Mr Begin,

The 10 days of repentence were given to the people of Israel to allow them to take stock of their deeds. I have no doubt that you, like the rest of us, will do this now.

Since you already chose to do so both personally and politically as prime minister in the Moqued television program, I feel it is my personal and national duty to answer you. At this fateful hour the future of the state and the people calls for a sober, well-considered view of the remarks you made, especially since they were made with an unfounded tone of satisfaction.

With a smile you attempted to dismiss the harsh criticism leveled at the faulty functioning of the government; with a slip of the tongue--as explained by your deputy--you "rehabilitated" poor neighborhoods; with empty talk and Latin you tried to cover up the breach with our best friends in the United States and in the Jewish diaspora. You know full well that your government and its policy have remained friendless and without support. Have your eyes grown blind to the sights observed by the majority of the people?!

Mr Prime Minister, do not fall prey to untruth. A happy mask is short-lived and mere whitewash will not cover abysses and chasms. [Here Peres is referring to biblical Prophet Ezekiel, 13, verses 10-12, who is critical of the prophets who delude Israel, telling them that they daub the wall of peace illusions built by the Israeli people with a whitewash of lies that will be broken by God].

Scenes of disintegration--in the political, social and economic fields--stare at us from every corner, and you do not see, or rather, see and ignore, whitewash and beautify.

At this holy and awesome time, I am addressing you the honorable prime minister, transcend the everyday, trivial settling of accounts, and when you pray [here Peres quotes a verse from a Jewish source read on Yom Kippur asking for forgiveness for spoken sins] ask yourself whether you have not gone wrong and misled others. Ask yourself if you are telling all the truth, if the time has not come for you to draw the following conclusion: to restore to the people the faith that had stirred their hearts.

Pardon and forgiveness for the past and a road of truth and faith for the future.

May God sign all in his good books,

Signed: Shim'on Peres

Chairman of the Labor Party.

RABIN RECOUNTS TALKS WITH AL-SADAT, IMPRESSIONS, CONCLUSIONS

TA191119 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 19 Sep 80 p 14

[Report on interview with Israeli MK Yitzhaq Rabin by Mark Segal: "Dialogue in Alexandria"]

[Excerpts] Former Prime Minister Yitzhaq Rabin returned from a meeting with President Anwar al-Sadat this week convinced that the Egyptian leader still cleaves to the peace process within the guidelines of the Camp David agreements, as he interprets them.

Rabin prefaced his report of the visit by emphasizing that what he had to say to the JERUSALEM POST was based on his impressions of the president's underlying intentions. "Al-Sadat considers the peace process based on the Camp David agreements as a revolutionary change, not only within the Arab-Israeli context but within the broader scale of the Middle East's position in world affairs," Rabin said. Al-Sadat intends to forge ahead with the peace process in accordance with his concept of it; he wishes to end the Arab-Israeli conflict on the basis of what he has been saying repeatedly since his address to the Knesset in November 1977: Full peace and normalization in exchange for withdrawal to the 1967 lines and the establishment of an independent Palestinian entity in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem.

Rabin contends that al-Sadat is pursuing a three-stage policy: First, peace with Israel; second, the implementation of the autonomy scheme in keeping with his interpretation of Camp David; and third, a permanent settlement.

Although al-Sadat says officially that he would like the autonomy scheme to proceed according to the timetable set down at Camp David, Rabin believes he is in fact prepared to be flexible about this. The Egyptian leader had told him: "If we don't reach our target in November 1980, then I'll wait until November 1981."

When I asked whether al-Sadat was hinting at a likely change of government in Israel, Rabin replied: "He was not only making a hint on that level but also stating his flexibility regarding the negotiating timetable. He is more concerned about the overall peace process than with the timetable details."

But al-Sadat feels it is essential to achieve a tripartite agreement between Egypt, Israel and the United States on the implementation of the autonomy scheme, which is the main issue on the agenda.

Rabin confirmed that al-Sadat expressed firm opposition to co-opting Jordan at this stage of the negotiations. He explicitly told his Israeli visitor that the inclusion of Amman would "blow it up."

I interjected by quoting Prof Shim'on Shamir, who said on Sunday, during a Labor Party meeting on the Jordanian option, "I know what al-Sadat said against Jordan to Rabin, but I heard otherwise." Rabin rejoined by noting that the conversation had been taped, and added: "One's answers often depend on the kind of questions one asks."

He stressed that although al-Sadat was very firm in seeking to exclude King Husayn from the talks at this juncture, he certainly contemplated Amman's participation, along with self-governing Palestinian representatives, in the final phase of the negotiations--as laid down at Camp David.

Al-Sadat has adopted a strong position on the Jerusalem question, far beyond the terms of reference of the Camp David accords, even as the Americans interpret them. "Only recently I was given some insight into the American position by U.S. special envoy Sol Linowitz--the United States regards Jerusalem at this stage of the autonomy talks through one prism: the awarding to East Jerusalem residents of voting rights for the autonomouc council. However, it was my impression that al-Sadat wants to go much further than that target, which will undoubtedly make the negotiations that much more difficult," the former premier held.

During their exchange of views, Rabin proposed two alternative approaches to the "Gaza first" suggestion. First, that the implementation of the autonomy scheme in Gaza should follow an agreement in principle that the autonomy scheme would be applied to the entire West Bank, East Jerusalem and the Strip. The second approach involved "Gaza first" being regarded as a "subphrase" before the autonomy scheme is worked out in its entirety.

Rabin spoke of "Gaza first" as a kind of pilot plan that should be set going irrespective of developments in the rest of the territories.

"From his reaction," said Rabin, "I gathered that al-Sadat disliked the second alternative, which to my mind offered the most practical formula. He insisted on an overall agreement on the autonomy scheme for the entire area, with Jerusalem at the top of the list, and Gaza rather way down."

It was Rabin's considered opinion, in appraising al-Sadat's response, that the Egyptian president was placing difficulties in the path of the peace process by emphasizing Jerusalem and opposing the "Gaza first" approach, which, ironically, was originally put forward by al-Sadat himself.

Rabin had not pressed the question whether Egypt regarded Gaza as an integral part of its territory, for he had perceived that by putting Jerusalem ahead of Gaza, al-Sadat was proffering an insight into his approach to the Palestinian issue--meaning the autonomy scheme as outlined at Camp David. However, the only conclusion Rabin could draw was that al-Sadat did not regard Gaza as a special interest of Egypt (as claimed by Prof Shamir, for example) but rather as an integral part of the Palestinian issue: "Otherwise he would have agreed to the pilot-plan proposal," Rabin observed.

There were strong religious overtones in al-Sadat's references to Jerusalem. Rabin quoted him as saying: "If Jerusalem is holy to 13 million Jews, it is just as sacred to 80 million Moslems, not forgetting many millions of Christians, and thus a compromise must be found."

In reply, said Rabin, "I asked him why Jerusalem's holiness to Muslems and Christians had to have a political solution and not a religious one. I proposed the separation of the religious from the political aspect. I told him, 'let us distinguish between Jerusalem the living city and Jerusalem the holy city of the three great religions.' At first he did not quite grasp my meaning, but soon enough he responded by emphasizing his preference for a political solution to the religious problem."

Discussing the concrete application of the conclusions he had drawn from the al-Sadat visit, Rabin said he wanted the Labor Party "to see the facts as they are." His party should stick to both the Palestinian and the Jordian options for the autonomy scheme's transition period of five years. He felt that labor should go much further than the Likud was willing to in offering full autonomy to the Palestinians, except in security zones, which he envisaged as enlarged versions of the Camp David concept of security locations. In this category he would include the Jordan rift, greater Jerusalem and the southern end of the Gaza Strip. The rest of the West Bank and Gaza, in other words the bulk of the territory and populated areas, should enjoy home rule, but with three conditions: acceptable internal security arrangements are made; Jewish settlements stay put; and there is mutual agreement over customs, the free flow of traffic and utilization of water resources.

According to Rabin's plan, Palestinians would have greater self-rule; but, he said, "without any prejudice to one's position on a permanent solution" as phrased at Camp David with an eye to five years ahead.

The above refers to what he called the Palestinian option, and Rabin would already now have the Labor Party take the initiative by talking over matters with the moderate leaders in the territories.

As for the Jordanian option ("I am quite unsure whether the Labor Party has adopted a formal resolution on this issue"), he envisaged an Israel-Jordan trusteeship over the West Bank and Gaza for five years (specifically excluding East Jerusalem). He felt that there could be an amicable division of responsibility under such a trusteeship. Jordan would be administratively responsible for the Palestinian inhabitants and be committed to help them develop self-rule. The Israel defense forces would be suitably deployed so as to protect Israeli security interests from the river westwards. There would be joint Israel-Jordan responsibility for internal security he said, adding, "I think we can depend on the Jordanians to deal with any terror threat."

This plan could work if Israel reiterated that UN Resolution 242 was the basis for a permanent solution. In relation to this, Rabin pointed out that the appropriate phrase in 242 referred to "withdrawal from territories" but did not say "from all" and not "from the." He conceded that there were different interpretations of the resolution; but Israel can stipulate that there will be "a significant withdrawal." At any rate, the withdrawal issue has to be settled only at the end of the five years mentioned at Camp David, he noted.

Unlike the Likud leadership, which resolved that "no foreign rule or sovereighty be permitted to the west of the river," Rabin would offer a much broader framework for negotiations. "I am not demanding of Jordan or the Palestinian leadership that they agree at this point to territorial compromise. Because I am aware that any such demand would blow the whole process sky high; so I leave it open until the end." The fundamental difference between the Likud and Labor, he stressed, was that the former said there could never be any withdrawal, while the latter said there could.

Here he added a caustic note: "I am not one of those who claim that if we get back to power the entire world will applaud, and that Jordan and the Palestinians will immediately join the negotiations. But if we offer the Palestinian and the Jordanian options, as I envisage them, as alternative policies to the Likud, I believe we can reconstruct the national consensus around our right to security. I also believe that they offer a basis for limiting the deepening division between Israel and the diasora communities."

As someone acquainted with the American scene from his years at the Washington Embassy, Rabin was convinced that his proposals would have a positive effect on American public opinion because of their emphasis on the Jordan River as Israel's security border, on Jerusalem remaining united, and on access for Jordan to the Mediterranean through Gaza. Moreover, there is no aspiration to rule more than one million Palestinians or hold on to most of the territories.

Support throughout the U.S. would find its political expression in Congress, said Rabin, "and it is doubtful whether any president would act against any policy that enjoys broad support across the nation and in congress. Thus I believe that armed with such an approach Israel could win official American support," he maintained.

POLL PREDICTS 19 KNESSET SEATS FOR WEIZMAN-DAYAN-TAMIR PARTY

TA222050 Tel Aviv YEDI'OT AHARONOT in Hebrew 22 Sep 80 p 19

[Report by Errol Guiney: "Opinion Poll by Israeli Institute for Research of Contemporary Society: 19 Seats for Party Headed by Weizman, Dayan and Tamir"]

[Excerpts] If a new center party is formed on the eve of the next elections headed by 'Ezer Weizman, Moshe Dayan and Shmu'el Tamir, it may receive 16 percent of the Jewish vote, namely, 18 to 19 Knesset seats. Eight to nine of these seats will be at the Likud's expense and four to five seats at the alignment's expense. However, even if such a party led by the above-mentioned men is established, it will not be able to undermine the predicted victory of the alignment in the elections to the 10th Knesset. The alignment is supposed to receive 40.1 percent of the total Jewish vote (46 to 48 seats) and the Likud will receive 17.1 percent (19 to 20 seats).

These are the conclusions of a comprehensive survey conducted by the heads of the Israeli Institute for Research on Contemporary Society, Prof Eliyahu Zamzob and Ben-or Gurpal. The survey included over 500 people representing various levels of the Jewish population in Israel.

The people polled were given two alternatives to the question "who will you vote for in the next elections": A) Should the current partisan structure remain unchanged and B) Should a party formed by Weizman, Dayan and Tamir be established.

The pollsters concluded that the Likud would suffer a considerable loss of strength. However, they did not confirm earlier polls, which predicted a majority to the alignment. Nevertheless, in spite of the general trend to return to the alignment, there is a large section of voters that, in spite of their disappointment with the DMC, still believes in a new political party adorned with glittering names like those of Weizman, Dayan and Tamir. Such a party could muster about 20 seats in the next election.

Another conclusion is that the strength of the Revival Party is superior to what had been assessed thus far, and it can gain 5 seats in the next elections. It should be assumed that the majority of those voting for the Revival Party will be people disappointed with the Likud, who regard the Revival Party as the legal successor of the Herut movement in Israel's political right wing. The pollsters predict that the Hadash movement (formerly Rakah) will gain about 45 percent of the Arab vote, which constitutes about 7 percent of the total Israeli vote. The few votes it will receive from the Jewish sector together with the Arab votes will give Hadash 7 to 8 seats in the next Knesset. The remaining 55 percent of the Arab vote--which constitutes 9.5 percent of the general vote--will apparently be divided among the alignment, Shay, Sheli and independent Arab lists.

	If the Political Structure Remains Unchanged	If a New Center is Established

POLL SHOWS ALIGNMENT'S LEAD NARROWS

TA261359 Tel Aviv YEDI'OT AHARONOT in Hebrew 26 Sep 80 p 1

[YEDI'OT AHARONOT public opinion poll: "The Alignment is in the Lead--But the Gap is Narrowing"]

[Text] The Alignment is still in the lead, but from July to September there has been a slight trend toward weakening its lead compared with a relative strengthening of the Likud.

There is still a high percentage of abstainers--more than one-third of the public--and Rabin continues to head the candidates for the premiership. These are the main results emerging from the routine poll conducted by the Institute for Applied Social Research and the Institute of Communication of the Hebrew University at the beginning of September. The issues discussed were those suggested by the YEDI'OT AHARONOT editorial board.

Question: Would you prefer the Likud or the Alignment to form the next government?

Month	Likud	Alignment	No Preference
July	15	45	40
August	16	41	43
September	19	41	40

Question: Who would you like to see as the next prime minister?

The Preferred Candidate	July	August	September
Begin	10	13	15
Weizman	7	6	6
Peres	16	16	14
Rabin	25	26	27
Others	19	16	16
No Opinion	23	23	22

The poll also showed that the balance between the Likud and the Alignment shifts toward the latter as the education level of those interviewed increases.

POLL SHOWS SOME OBJECTION TO NEW SETTLEMENTS

TA231658 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 23 Sep 80 p 3

[Pori public opinion poll: "Of All Polled 30 Percent Believe: Refraining From Establishment of New Settlements is a Way to Resume the Autonomy Negotiations"]

[Text] Refraining from the establishment of new settlements in the West Bank is viewed by the public as the most important way to resume the autonomy negotiations. Halting the transfer of the prime minister's office to East Jerusalem, the postponement of discussions on Jerusalem's future status and agreement to an Israeli-Egyptian-U.S. summit are viewed as additional important factors in the resumption of the autonomy talks. These are the findings of the nation-wide public opinion poll conducted by the Pori Institute at the request of HA'ARETZ.

Of those polled, 30 percent said that refraining from setting up new settlements in Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip is a step that Israel must take to lead to the resumption of the autonomy negotiations.

Additional means for achieving the resumption of the negotiations as viewed by the public are: refraining from transferring the prime minister's office to East Jerusalem (25 percent), putting off deliberations on the future of Jerusalem to a later date (23 percent), agreement to an autonomy summit among Israel, Egypt and the United States (23 percent) and consent to include deliberations over Jerusalem's future status in the autonomy negotiations (10 percent).

Of those questioned, 19 percent said they do not know what measures Israel should adopt to achieve a resumption of the autonomy negotiations.

The poll encompassed a representative sample of 1,200 men and women personally interviewed in their homes throughout the country.

POLLSTER ANALYZES RECENT PUBLIC OPINION TRENDS

TA241902 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 24 Sep 80 p 22

[Third of a series by Pollster Hanokh Smith called "Election Forecast"; "Begin Fifth as Prime Minister; Peres Third in the Opposition"]

[Text] The Israeli political system tends to emphasize ideologies and ministerial teams because it presents parties to the election for the Knesset and not individual representatives. When an individual leader rose and gained prominence without the backing of a strong partisan mechanism or an ideology with a wide public acceptance, his success was short-lived, albeit attainable.

The first big test of this basic premise was David Ben-Gurion's attempt to establish Rafi in 1965. This list attracted only 7.9 percent of the votes and ultimately returned to the Labor Party. The greatest success scored by a list led by an individual was Yiga'el Yadin's "Democratic Party for Change" (DMC), which recieved 11.6 percent of the votes in the last elections. This party has lost almost all of its public support. Polls have shown that the Israeli public is currently reserved about small new parties.

Therefore, in this type of election, the focus is on the party and not the individual leader. But this is true not only for Israel. In the last election in Britain, polls showed that the "conservative" candidates enjoyed an absolute advantage of 5 percent in the constituencies and could gain a paliamentary majority. But asked whom they would prefer as prime minister, 60 percent of the voters replied that they would chose "labor's" Callaghan over "conservative" Margaret Thatcher. As is well known, the conservatives scored a great victory and Margaret Thatcher became prime minister. The results of the polls on the question of who is preferable as prime minister were interesting but not to the point; sometimes they were even misleading. Such errors should be avoided in Israel.

However, this does not mean that the personalities are not important, especially when they are party leaders commanding the political arena. Often they wield great weight on the voter's ultimate choice.

Menahem Begin no doubt controls the cabinet. All the more so since Moshe Dayan and 'Ezer Weizman resigned. His public standing has a crucial significance and consequently would have a certain bearing on the voting, were elections held today.

In each of the four polls I conducted, the public was asked whether Menahem Begin fulfilled the prime minister's duties well or not. The percentage of people who thought that he was functioning well or very well is shown in the following table and is set against the percentage of people who said they would vote for one of the parties constituting the government coalition on the same date:

How does Begin fulfill his job as prime minister and how will the respondents vote [figures in percentages]

	Begin as Prime Minister is Good	Will Vote For a Coalition Party	Will Vote For the Likud
May 1979	59	40	26
Sep 1979	53	35	23
Feb-Mar 1980	40	31	20
Aug-Sep 1980	41	30	18

The findings indicate, first of all, that the decline in the number of people who would have voted for the Likud or the coalition parties in general between May 1979 and February-March 1980 was accompanied by an even steeper slump in the number of people who thought that Prime Minister Begin was handling his job well. However, in all the cases the number of those who maintained that Begin was functioning well substantially exceeded the willingness to vote for a coalition party. This means that many voters prefer either parties that are not in the cabinet or opposition parties and that those voters who have not yet made up their minds believe that Menahem Begin functions well as prime minister.

The current poll shows that, compared to February-March 1980, Begin's popularity has remained intact, or even somewhat increased, whereas the support for the Likud has continued to decrease. This cannot be completely explained by the statistical results of the survey, but other data sheds some light on the subject.

The primary explanation for the latest grading of the prime minister in his post most likely results from his positions on a territorial compromise in East Jerusalem and some parts of the occupied territories--positions that have become more inflexible--as well as the increasing support for the Sharon-Gush Emunim position regarding the settlements in the territories.

This trend can perhaps be partially explained as constituting a sharp Israeli public reaction to the UN resolutions and to other positions held by countries considered friendly to Israel. Some of the political advantages of this intransigency were probably attached to the prime minister's personal stand.

At the same time, these developments also have a negative aspect. As we saw in the previous article, the percentage of people who thought that the cabinet is successful--either completely or partially--in its foreign policy went down by 11 percent in 6 months so that only 20 percent of the public believe that the government is successful in this area. Begin's vulnerability in this sphere is also illuminated by the replies given to the following question, presented in the last poll: "From among the following political leaders who have expressed their views on foreign policy, with whom would you personally identify?"

With which leader who has expressed his views on foreign affairs issue would you personally identify?

[Figures in percentages]

In the Government	Previously in the Government	In the Opposition	Others	Undecided
Begin--16	Dayan--18	Eban--15	4	15
	Weizman--14	Rabin--13
		Peres--5

According to the above table, only 16 percent identified with the prime minister's pronounced position, and he is considered the government's sole spokesman. Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir was not included in the list because he is relatively new in his post and very few of the people polled chose to insert his name instead of those who appeared on the list.

The greatest support was given to Moshe Dayan--18 percent, and former Defense Minister 'Ezer Weizman also attracted many people's support. Together, the two ex-ministers received almost one-third of all the votes.

A similar degree of support was given to the opposition spokesmen, the most popular of whom, with 15 percent of the votes, is former Foreign Minister Abba Eban, followed by Yitzhaq Rabin with 13 percent. Of all the opposition's spokesmen, Shim'on Peres received the least support (5 percent).

Among the chief spokesmen on foreign affairs there are at least five persons who attract votes, but there is no outstanding personality among them. Yet the person who should be most concerned is Prime Minister Menahem Begin. This emerges even more clearly from the replies to the question intended to discover how the Israeli Jewish populace regards its prime minister in a historical perspective. The question was: "Of the following prime ministers, who, in your opinion, was the best; who was second best?"

1. Ben-Gurion
2. Levi Eshkol
3. Golda Me'ir
4. Yitzhaq Rabin
5. Menahem Begin
6. Others, no opinion.

At the obvious top was David Ben-Gurion: 60 percent thought he was the best and an additional 11 percent thought he was second best. A strong second position is taken by Golda Me'ir: 14 percent thought she was the best and 29 percent chose her as next to the best. The other prime ministers were much less favored. In third place is Levi Eshkol with 6 percent in first place and 16 in the second. After him comes Yitzhaq Rabin with 21 percent: 6 percent favoring him in first place and 15 percent placing him second and finally Menahem Begin with 5 percent placing him at the top and 1 percent placing him second [percentage as published]. (Moshe Sharet, who served as prime minister for a relatively short period 20 years ago, was not included in the list.)

One should note that Menahem Begin is still an acting prime minister and that history's judgement is a matter of time and perspective. Both David Ben-Gurion and Golda Me'ir knew times of sharp public criticism. At the same time it is interesting to observe the current public perspective, even though perspectives are liable to change.

It appears as if the prime minister's status has stabilized in the last 6 months on a higher level than the support for his party or the coalition parties together. This shows him to be a powerful political force in the cabinet and a person with a great potential. However, is the rate of 40 percent support encouraging to the prime minister of Israel? Before the Yom-Kippur war, Golda Me'ir received the support of 93 percent of the Israeli public for good performance at her job. Yitzhaq Rabin enjoyed only 45 percent support in the period of his personal problems on the eve of the 1977 elections.

Menahem Begin undoubtedly faces a great challenge.

'HA'ARETZ' ON JORDANIAN ROLE IN TERRITORIES

TA282120 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 28 Sep 80 pp 9, 10

[Commentary by Yehuda Litani: "Between Two Committees"]

[Excerpts] "Clearly and continually Jordan is adopting a new line in handling the territories. Not only were offices for issuing passports opened throughout the West Bank and in East Jerusalem, but the Jordanians have recently increased their involvement in the developments in the territories. In recent weeks a symposium on labor was held in Amman to which residents of the territories were personally invited by Crown Prince Hasan. Another symposium is to take place on economic planning, with the participation of persons from the territories, and now there is the establishing of a special ministry for the affairs of "the occupied homelands." "In my opinion, the Jordanians decided to take matters into their own hands." This is the statement of a leading member of the National Guidance Committee, the central organization of PLO supporters in the territories, whose relations with Jordan so far have been ones of mutual hostility.

That person's statement may be somewhat exaggerated but his feeling is well founded. Reports published by a Kuwaiti newspaper and by Monte Carlo Radio (which is at present the most reliable foreign radio station of the Palestinians and has replaced the BBC) said that Abu Jihad, who is now No 2 man in the hierarchy of the Fatah Organization after Yasir 'Arafat went to Amman with a delegation of his organization not only to participate in the talks of the joint PLO-Jordanian committee but, mainly, to protest the establishment of the new ministry for "the occupied homeland" affairs to be headed by Hasan Ibrahim , whose brother is the mayor of Ya'bad in the West Bank.

The joint committee for handling the affairs of the territories was founded as a result of a decision at the Baghdad Conference in late 1978, thus constituting a climax in Jordan-PLO cooperation. The rejectionist organizations in the PLO could not consent to that. Since the beginning of the conciliatory campaign between Yasir 'Arafat and King Husayn the PLO rejectionist organizations have been attacking both parties and they have been expressing vociferous opposition to a move that seemed surprising a few years ago.

It is hard to guess where the present tension between Jordan and the PLO about the establishment of the new ministry lead. This decision is justified by the Jordanian authorities by technical reasons (concentration of efforts, etcetera). It indicates, nevertheless, their increased involvement in the territories. That member of the National Guidance Committee with whom I talked believes that at this stage no rift between the two parties is expected, and that Jordan will take care to improve relations with the PLO because now the two parties do not deem it worthwhile to reach a total rift. He thinks that Jordan does not wish at present to break from the Arab consensus and this may happen rapidly if a rift with the PLO is created. The PLO--Fatah to be more exact--does not want to remove itself from its new base in Jordan for that would mean that it would no longer be able to keep its hand on the pulse in the territories.

What about the activity of the National Guidance Committee in the territories? An impression is created that the strict restrictions imposed by the military government: the bar on the mayors making statements to the press, limitations on the movements of the leading members of the National Guidance Committee, including three newspaper editors, the deportation of the mayors of Hebron and Halhul, and most recently, the arrest of Qalqilyah Mayor Amin An-Nasir (who is a member of the National Guidance Committee) because of publication of a pamphlet without the permission of the censorship and the military government, and the wounding of Ramallah Mayor Karim Khalaf and Nabulus Mayor Bassam Ash-Shak'ah have considerably lowered the profile of the Guidance Committee and its activity was reduced to almost naught.

The member of the National Guidance Committee with whom I have talked thinks that this is a mere "temporary calm." He hinted that protest demonstrations are planned against a number of the military government imposed limitations, particularly the restrictions recently imposed on higher education. The military government, in its oppressive measures adopted so often, heightens our protests, the man says; they are not soley on our own initiative. You will hear from us and if Israel decides to deport us we may well remember that since the beginning of the occupation in June 1967 1,600 people have been deported from the territories. The protest activity against the occupation and the occupants is always continuing. If we are deported others will replace us, the man said.

WEST BANK GNP STATISTICS ISSUED

TA262003 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 26 Sep 80 p 4

[Report by economic correspondent: "Gross National Product in Judaea and Samaria Rose by 7 Percent in 1978/79"]

[Text] The Gross National Product [GNP] in permanent prices in Judaea and Samaria rose during 1978 and 1979 by 7 percent a year, as it did during the years 1977 and 1978. In Gaza and Northern Sinai the GNP, at constant prices, in 1978 and 1979 rose by 8 to 9 percent a year in comparison with an annual rise of 5 to 6 percent in 1977 and 1978.

These details were reported by the spokesman of the Central Bureau of Statistics based on figures for Judaea, Samaria, Gaza and Northern Sinai. It will be noted that the annual changes in the GNP are affected by variations in the olive harvest and by problems in measuring foreign trade with Israel. The biannual averages are, therefore, more significant than the data for a single year.

The GNP in Judaea and Samaria is figured from the local output from the various branches of the economy (75 percent) and net income from work in Israel and other countries (25 percent). In 1977 and 1978 the product resulting from income from work outside Judaea and Samaria, in constant prices, rose by 10 percent a year.

During this period the number of work days in Israel of people from Judaea and Samaria rose by 7 percent a year: there was a relatively steep rise in the number of people going to work in Arab countries and their income reached 30 percent of the total income of workers employed outside Judaea and Samaria.

The local product of the various branches of the economy in 1978 and 1979 rose by 6 percent a year, similar to the rise for 1977 and 1978. The estimates for the single years (not a biannual average) indicate a drop of 4 to 5 percent in 1979 compared with a rise of 18 percent in 1978 and a drop of 3 percent in 1977. This development was affected by the fluctuations in the agriculture branch, particularly in the olive yield.

In the other local branches of the economy in 1978 and 1979, a rise of 9 to 10 percent a year should be noted in the product of the construction branch compared with a rise of 7 percent a year in 1977 and 1978. The product of the industrial branch rose by 6 to 7 percent compared with a rise of 2 percent a year for 1977 and 1978.

The Central Bureau of Statistics says that private consumption, at fixed prices, in Judaea and Samaria rose during 1978 and 1979 by 6 percent a year (4 to 5 percent per capita) compared with a rise of 2 percent in 1977 and 1978.

GOLAN OIL PIPELINE PARALYZED

TA261158 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 26 Sep 80 p 2

[Report by Mikha'el (Gerti): "The Pipeline in the Golan Heights is Still Paralyzed"]

[Text] Despite the increasing difficulties encountered in transporting the oil exported from Saudi Arabia--as the fighting between Iraq and Iran increases--the oil pipeline stretching from Saudi Arabia to Sidon Port in Lebanon remains virtually paralyzed. No steps have been taken to renew the flow of oil through it.

The oil pipeline leaves the Ra's Tannurah Terminal in Saudi Arabia and crosses the Arabian Peninsula, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. A 50 km section of this pipeline (called the (Tapline) Pipe) passes through the Golan Heights and is within the territory held by Israel since the 6-day war. The pipeline was in use and had transported oil until the beginning of the Lebanese civil war. Since 1975 the quantities of oil transported by the pipeline began to decrease until it was virtually shut down.

The main reason for the disuse of the pipeline is that one of its ends is in an area under the control of the Palestinian terrorist organizations, near Sidon in southern Lebanon. Because of its location, oil tankers have been prevented from reaching the port where there have been many incidents--something that has caused an unwillingness on the part of shipowners to jeopardize themselves, a rise in the rate of naval insurance and demands for higher salaries by sailors--similar to the current situation in the Persian Gulf.

The oil pipeline that passes through the Golan Heights has an appreciable flow capability: about 0.5 million barrels a day out of Saudi Arabia's total output--which is 9.5 million barrels a day and is marketed via the tanker route through the Straits of Hormuz.

ARABIC JOURNAL JERUSALEM DEBUT--A new Arabic literary monthly, the first to be published by an East Jerusalem Arabic daily, made its debut yesterday. AL-AFJR's literary supplement is edited by 'Ali Khalili and appears in a 16-page tabloid format selling for 1.5 Israeli shekels. Most of the contributions come from writers on the West Bank and in East Jerusalem. Hanah (Siniora), chief editor of AL-FAJR newspapers, which include the Arabic daily and an English weekly, said that preparations for a Hebrew weekly were well advanced. He said that he hoped that the first Palestinian publication in Hebrew would appear within a few weeks. [Text] [TA210920 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 21 Sep 80 p 3]

DEVALUATION OF SHEKEL--The devaluation of the shekel in the first eight months of the year lagged behind the rate of inflation by about 12 percent, according to data released this week by the Bank of Israel and the Central Bureau of Statistics. While inflation was 68.8 percent in this period (168.8 points, taking December 1979 as 100), the devaluation of the shekel was 48 percent (148 points compared with the same base). This lag caused the Bank of Israel to accelerate the devaluation of the shekel from the beginning of this month. The rate of devaluation is now 6-7 percent below the rate of inflation. The Bank of Israel's declared policy on devaluation is to keep it equal to the difference between the domestic rate of inflation and the rate prevailing abroad. The shekel is devalued to keep pace with domestic inflation, deducting the inflation "imported" from abroad. [Text] [TA191112 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 19 Sep 80 p 3]

AUGUST IMMIGRATION--Aliya continued to decline last month, with only 1,748 immigrants in August compared to 3,919 the same month in 1979. The biggest decrease was from the Soviet Union. Only 211 came here last month from that country, compared to 1,511 in August of last year. Only Rumanian aliya was up, while that from the U.S., South America, England and South Africa were all down. EXPORTS UP--Israel's exports during the first 8 months of the year were $3.8 billion, a 26 percent increase over the same period a year ago. During that same period, imports amounted to $5.3 billion, oil imports account for 30 percent of all imports. [Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 1800 GMT 23 Sep 80 TA]

EGYPTIAN TOURISM--Tourism circles yesterday noted a dramatic turn for the better in the normalization of tourist traffic between Israel and Egypt, despite a renewed attempt to link such a concession to the return of a monastery to the copts in Jerusalem. Since 10 September, the sources said, the Egyptians have granted some 500 tourist visas to Israelis, many of whom had been waiting for months for an answer to their applications. At the same time the Egyptians also shortened the time it takes for their own nationals to acquire a second passport, needed to visit Israel. Both El Al and the Nefertiti Airlines are fully booked for the next few weeks, with long waiting lists for every flight. There is also at least one busload in each direction daily. [Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 22 Sep 80 p 6 TA]

HOUSING AID INCREASED--The aid plans for the rural Arab sector have been updated and adjusted to the aid schemes for everyone eligible by virtue of belonging to the housing and construction ministry schemes, jews and druze alike, both in the urban and the rural sectors. This was reported by the minister of housing and construction's aide, Uri Oren. The loans given to Arabs in the rural sector have been increased 4 or 5 times and now amount to 655,000 Israeli pounds for families without housing provisions compared with 140,000 pounds given in the past. The sum of 500,000 pounds is now given to families possessing housing accommodations, but living in distressing conditions compared with the 100,000 such families got in the past. The initial monthly returns will not exceed 4,200 pounds. [Text] [TA241457 Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 24 Sep 80 p 3]

FAMILIES SEEK PERMANENT SETTLEMENT--Forty families of the Giv'on Settlement new Jerusalem have left their camp this morning and have arrived at the site which, according to them, has been designated to become the permanent site of the settlement. They argue that they have been staying in a temporary camp for 3 years, and that all the promises made to arrange their transfer to the permanent settlement have not been met. Our correspondent Hayim Zisovitz reports that an officer of the military government arrived on the site and asked the settlers to leave the premises voluntarily. The settlers, however, demand to meet with Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhai Tzipori to discuss the future of the settlement and unless this demand is met, they will refuse to leave the site. CABINET'S DECISIONS ON BUDGET, TAXES--The government decided to impose a tax, the rate of which has not been set yet, on every person earning 750,000 or more Israeli pounds annually. A tax, whose rate has not been determined yet, will be imposed on firms. The government has also endorsed all the expenditure items in the new budget. The government decided to refer to a committee the decision on reducing tax on stock, and the reduction of exemption from taxes for border settlements. The government has annulled 11 types of tax exemption, including the exemption on value added tax for tourists. These decisions have been made in a cabinet meeting that lasted for over 5 hours. Minister of Finance Yiga'el Hurvitz said that these decisions constitute an expression of confidence for him, and encouragement for his work. [Text] [TA261230 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1200 GMT 26 Sep 80]

FURTHER DETAILS ON CABINET DECISIONS--The government has decided to impose a special tax on every person who earned over 750,000 Israeli pounds last [fiscal] year. Our correspondent Gid'on Selinger says that apparently a 5 percent tax will be decided upon. This means that the minimum tax would amount to 37,500 Israeli pounds. It will be collected in installments and the treasury revenue from it will amount to several million Israeli pounds. The government also decided to cut 6 percent from the investment and purchase budgets and also canceled several tax exemptions and benefits that will amount to some 8.5 billion pounds. The tourists exemption from the value added tax has been canceled. The automatic deduction on dividends from nonnegotiable stocks was raised to 45 percent. Tax exemptions for gifts and meals given by employers to their employees have been canceled. The tax exemption given to marketing boards on 3 percent of their income has also been canceled. It was decided to increase the fine for a delay in the paying of taxes to up to 1 percent a week, and to increase the interest for a delay to up to 120 percent. A meeting will be held on a number of other issues such as the taxation of stocks and a reduction in the number of settlements enjoying tax deductions. COMMUNIST PARTY SUPPORTS KHOMEYNI--Rakah supports Khomeyni against what it calls the "Iraqi aggression." The Rakah Arabic-language organ AL-ITTIHAD has expressed firm support for Iran against Iraq's bloody regime under the leadership of Saddam Husayn. Rakah members are accusing the Iraqis of aggression against the Iranian revolution which is fighting U.S. neocolonialism. However, it is very possible that in its next edition AL-ITTIHAD will retract its firm stand. Last night, in its broadcasts in Hebrew, Moscow Radio broadcast an article published in PRAVDA, the organ of the Soviet Union's communist party, containing a balanced commentary praising Iraq and its revolution which destroyed the Baghdad Pact and Iran and its Muslim revolution which buried the Cento Pact. The PRAVDA article concludes with the words: "It would be better for the border dispute between Iran and Iraq to end, since it is of no benefit to anyone except the Americans and Israel." The Soviet paper expresses no position for or against either side. [Text] [TA261927 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 26 Sep 80 p 2]

NEW NAHAL SETTLEMENT--This afternoon, a ceremony marking the settling of the Nahal foothold at Bet Ha'arava took place in the Jordan Rift Valley a few kilometers from the dead sea's northern shore. The new foothold is located near the area where the original Bet Ha'arava was located until it was deserted in 1948. RELIANCE ON U.S.--The majority of the Israeli public relies on the United States for help in weapons "in the event that the existence of Israel is placed in danger in another war with the Arab states." That opinion emerges from a nation-wide opinion poll conducted by the Pori Institute at the request of HA'ARETZ. Of the respondents 35 percent are certain that the United States would give Israel, in such an event, "all the arms aid it needed." Another 35 percent hold the opinion that the United States "would give us limited weapons aid." Only 3 percent believe the United States "will send its army to aid us." In other words, over 70 percent of the public believe that aid in weapons could be expected from the United States in case of another war with the Arab countries. "In contrast, 9.2 percent said that at most the United States could be expected to give us political and moral support" but would not give us weapons and 3.3 percent believe that in such a case that United States would take a neutral stance and "would stand by." Over 14.5 percent of the respondents said they "do not know" how much aid the United States would be willing to extend Israel in case of war. The poll included a representative sample of 1,200 men and women who were interviewed individually. [Text] [TA281530 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 28 Sep 80 p 3]

STUDENT EXCHANGE--Israel and Egypt will exchange delegations of medical students next summer. This is the first practical result of the first official meeting of student representatives from Israel and Egypt held in Cairo late last August. This meeting was held in the framework of the annual General Assembly of the Organization of the International Federation of Medical Students. It was the first time that a student delegation from Israel took part in an official event in Egypt. [TA290810 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 28 Sep 80 p 4]

POLL SHOWS RABIN FAVORITE--Yitzhaq Rabin continues to be the preferred candidate for the premiership. Second is Menahem Begin and Shim'on Peres takes third place. These are the findings of a nation-wide Pori Institute public opinion poll commissioned by HA'ARETZ. Replying to the question: "If you were faced with the choice, whom would you prefer to see as prime minister: Menahem Begin, Shim'on Peres or Yitzhaq Rabin?" Some 38.2 percent preferred Yitzhaq Rabin, 23.2 percent favored Menahem Begin and 17.2 percent opted for Shim'on Peres. Some 13.1 percent said they want neither of these three personalities as prime minister and the remaining 8.3 percent said they "do not know" which of the three is fit to serve as prime minister. The conductor of the poll, Pori Institute Director Refa'el Gil, noted that the gap between those who support Rabin for the premiership and those who support Peres for the same post is even greater among the Alignment voters. While among the general public the gap between Rabin and Peres is 21 percent, among the Alignment voters it is currently 27 percent, with 58.5 percent favoring Rabin as prime minister as against 31.5 percent who want Peres as prime minister. The poll included 1,200 people of both sexes, who were interviewed individually. [Text] [TA291457 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 29 Sep 80 p 3]

LABOR PARTY ARABS--Some 13,000 Arabs from 90 villages have so far joined the Labor Party. This has been reported by the Labor Party Arab department head, Ra'anan Kohen. On 25 November the Arab sector will for the first time elect its delegates to the Labor Party conference. [Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 30 Sep 80 p 8]

MUNICIPALITIES AWARDED GRANTS--Bethlehem, 22 Sep--Military commander of Judaea and Samaria Brig Gen Binyamin Ben-Eli'ezer visited the Bethlehem and Bayt Jala municipalities on Monday. He conferred with the mayors and members of the city councils and awarded each town a grant of 1 million Israeli pounds for the development of urban projects. The ITIM correspondent notes that the two municipalities have recently warned that they were having budgetary difficulties. The mayors requested to leave for Jordan in order to procure funds from the joint Jordanian-PLO Committee. [Text] [TA230849 Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 1810 GMT 22 Sep 80]

HADDAD ASKS FOR AID--Today Major Sa'd Haddad called on the leaders of local councils and local authorities in the Galilee and the northern part of the country to assist the Christian and Shi'ite villages. He requested investment for the construction of joint manufacturing plants and for Lebanese villages to be connected to Israel's national electricity network. Haddad says the terrorists in the an-Nabatiyah platteau control the electricity supply for Marj 'Uyun and al-Qulay'ah and they are able to disconnect it any time. Major Haddad also asked for aid for the construction of a telephone line, water supply system and for moral support for the residents on the front line of the joint front. Heads of local authorities in the north promised to do their best to help him. [Text] [TA212052 Jerusalam Domestic Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 21 Sep 80]

SOLDIERS MUST SERVE IN TERRITORIES--The High Court of Justice this morning rejected the appeal submitted by soldier Gadi Elgazi who has refused to serve in the territories. The court ruled that the IDF was authorized to compel any soldier to serve beyond the green line in accord with the army's needs. Our correspondent Moshe Negbi notes that the decision was adopted unanimously by Justices Hayim Kohen, Moshe Baisky and Shlomo Levin. In his ruling, Justice Kohen stated that in view of the numerous cases of soldiers refusing to serve in the territories due conscience, the IDF was permitted to set a comprehensive policy that would deal with such requests. In the past the army had taken such appeals by soldiers on a case by case basis. Justice Kohen expressed his skepticism about the benefit to the IDF of imposing its will on soldiers. On the other hand, he recommended that the appeallant and his colleagues desist in their action and not insist on sitting in a military prison because the presence of peace-minded soldiers in the territories helps promote peace in the area. AL-ASAD URGED TO RESTORE SYRIAN-IRAQI HARMONY

LD220939 Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 17 Sep 80 p 11

[Article by Najib 'Abd al-Hadi: "Mr President"]

[Excerpts] A few days ago we addressed a message through this newspaper to His Excellency President Saddam Husayn of Iraq appealing to him to surmount the differences existing between Damascus and Baghdad in order to make it possible to achieve the Arab aspirations and fill the frightening vacuum which al-Sadat's Egypt has left by tearing itself away from the Arab body. In my message to the Iraqi President I said that this vacuum can be filled only by the unification of Syrian and Iraqi efforts so they flow in one stream.

Yesterday, we published Iraqi President Saddam Husayn's comprehensive reply to my message. Your Excellency [President al-Sada] has most probably purused its contents.

Mr President Hafiz al-Asad, because we are eager to see that the current situation does not continue and that all obstacles are eliminated--although their elimination is not as easy as some imagine--we have written to you in your capacity as one of the October War heroes and on the grounds that Syria is the pulsating heart of Arabism and the citadel of steadfastness and confrontation which the hostile forces are trying to fragmentize in order to implement the capitulationist solutions according with the plans of the Camp David agreements.

We are aware, Mr President, that the downfall of Syria--God forbid--means the downfall of the Arabs--all the Arabs--that support for Syria is the duty of every Arab and that the disputes existing between you and revolutionary and Ba'thist Iraq are not of a type that are difficult to resolve or surmount. We also realize that Syria's al-Asad is aware of the importance of Iraq and its unlimited capabilities and that the utilization and employment of these capabilities in the service of our national and pan-Arab causes would strengthen the position of the Arabs and enable them to confront all the dangers facing this nation and homeland. But--woe to this word "but"--how can the Arab aspirations be achieved?

What we are demanding, Mr President, can only be achieved through a bold decision that would restore serenity and affection to the Arab atmosphere--a decision that would establish amity among the hearts, unify the efforts and frustrate all the conspiracies that are tearing the Arab body apart in order to weaken it, make it bleed and subject it to delusions and to the blows that are being dealt to it by wicked murderous hands whose only concern is to keep the Arab body weak and staggering under the impact of blows, tragedies and tribulations.

Mr President Hafiz al-Asad, we are writing to you and we have great hopes that the Iraq-Syrian rapprochement will be restored, bright and cohesive. We also hope that the pulsating heart of Arabism will once again beat strong. This can be achieved only through the unification of the Iraqi-Syrian aim, efforts and forces.

We wonder, will we live long enough to see that day? Will we see the day in which al-Asad from Damascus will embrace Saddam from Baghdad?

COMMITMENT TO ARAB UNITY KEY TO ACHIEVING ARAB AIMS

LD250837 Kuwait AR-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 23 Sep 80 pp 1, 19

[Editorial: "The Fes Conference and the Simple Fact"]

[Excerpts] The Islamic States Ministerial Conference, which concluded its meetings in Fes, Morocco, recently, rolled up its sleeves and decided to reject Resolution 242 as a settlement between the Arabs and Israel. It also decided to work for expelling Israel from the United Nations during the current UN session.

The Arabs and, consequently, the Muslims are becoming increasingly aware that this resolution does not solve the problem but makes it more complicated. The only Arab state which accepted this resolution, tactically at first but then unilaterally proceeding to resolve the issue on its basis, is Egypt.

But the United States continues to defend this resolution and to work toward imposing it as the only means for a solution. Because the United States and Israel do not want any Palestinian political entity to be established, the formula represented in this resolution is the only thing that conforms with and fulfills their desire.

It remains for us to ask what the Islamic conference has done, more than past Arab conferences, in the way of preparations to make its decision stick and achieve Israel's expulsion from the United Nations. Most probably, the decision was made without any plans to support it and then impose it as a fait accompli on the United States and Israel.

Although it is beneficial in the way of propaganda to win the largest section of the world public opinion to our side at the United Nations or in any other international forum, the simple fact remains that the world trends to support and to yield to the strong.

As long as the Arabs do not act on the basis of this fact, every effort they make will be utter nonsense. The way to realize this simple fact is well known. It is hopeless to expect to change the image of Arab weakness unless we change our behavior--that is, unless we are able to make one united move without entertaining delusions and doubts toward each other.

War, as one can see, is waged only in cooperation with a major source of arms. The Iraqi-Persian war is the best proof of this. To wage a successful war, we must unite our forces in a joint active front to counterbalance the might of American-Israeli arms. Most probably, the United States will not be the source of our arms.

Iraq is not communist and will never be, yet it went to the Soviet Union to ask for arms.

War has its rules, and anyone who wages war or has no alternative but to wage it in order to regain his rights must act according to these rules. Otherwise he will be a member of the pauper club.

SIGNIFICANCE OF SEMINAR OF CADRES NOTED

Nouakchott CHAAB in French 27 Aug 80 pp 1, 8

[Editorial by "Chaab": "From Words to Action"]

[Text] The seminar of cadres devoted to "the economic situation and prospects in our country" concluded its work late yesterday evening.

The seminar, which lasted a week, had an extremely fruitful dialog between national leaders and cadres concerning the current and future development situation in our country. Without any exaggeration, it was a symbol of our determination to follow the path of recovery.

The seminar provided an opportunity to strengthen the democratic experiment underway since 10 July and enlightened our cadres in their search for an original development strategy designed by Mauritanians serving their country.

In this connection, one must hail the positive move of national leaders, who have opened the way to the broadest concertation, without restrictions, throughout the debate, hearing all voices. In this way, they have helped national cadres to emerge from their isolation and to realize their responsibilities to the task of building their country. One must also welcome the massive response of cadres to the national leaders' summons to attend the seminar.

Our cadres engaged in their discussions in an attempt to find an original path to development. They made a noteworthy intellectual effort and completed a diagnosis of the country's economic situation.

They analyzed the situation and made proposals concerning ways and means of improving it in order to meet the challenges our country faces from hostile nature, international inflation, and effects of war, poor management and a mediocre administration.

Actually, in both cases, it was a duty which both groups made in order to seek the path of salvation. In the final analysis, the most important thing is to adopt that path as a method in order to move constantly forward, whether it be a question of this concertation or any other positive move to be undertaken in the future. The value of the seminar therefore resides in the effect it will have on the thinking of our cadres and on their behavior, wherever they may be, but also in the impact it will have on the economic situation of our country and all our people.

Moved by this spirit, Lt Col Mohamed Khouna O. Haidalla, president of the CMSN [Supreme National Military Committee], head of state and the government, was anxious to attend the debates of the seminar and closely followed all proceedings. It was in this same spirit that he closed the seminar, after reaffirming that the success of any development strategy depends on a change in thinking on the part of those who apply it. He said that the problem of the administration is above all linked to ways of thinking. The seminar will not have been fruitful if our cadres did not become aware of the dangers threatening our country.

Our cadres must become aware of their responsibilities and demonstrate a great willingness to do their patriotic duty.

They must show a spirit of sacrifice in order to serve the higher interests of their people and the nation.

After the seminar is over, the essential thing is for our cadres to understand that they must link words with constructive action. They must individually and collectively help in the national effort undertaken in order to rehabilitate the country's economy.

In addition, there is the responsibility of the national leadership, which must use the results of the cadres' seminar, taking the constructive viewpoints of our cadres into account.

Lt Col Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla, president of the CMSN, chief of state and the government, made a commitment in this area which we are convinced will be honored. In general, the seminar will only have achieved its objective when the participants have understood that they best position they expressed in their speeches is their commitment to their nation and history.

They must therefore understand that they must honor their commitment to faithfully serve their country and contribute to the overall recovery effort undertaken by the nation's leaders.

OPPOSITION LEADER'S APPEAL--The "free" return to his country of former Mauritanian president Mokhtar Ould Daddah "would restore the dignity and credibility lacking in Nouakchott." This statement was made yesterday in Paris by the founder of the National Unity Movement (MUN, in opposition to the regime of Colonel Ould Haidallah), Ahmed Moilid. Moilid, who has resided in Rabat since the overthrow of former Mauritanian chief of state Ould Daddah by a coup on 10 July 1978, said that Colonel Ould Haidalla, currently president of the Supreme National Military Committee (CMSN), "is an invention of the POLISARIO Front and is totally in line with the policy of the Libyan chief of state, Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi. Recommending "the complementary nature of the Rabat-Nouakchott-Dakar axis" because of the "historic coexistence of bonds linking the three countries," Moilid also came out in favor of a military presence in Mauritania, "providing the people with security," he said. The exiled leader branded the "defeatism" of the current government and called on the Mauritanian people "to mobilize against the enemies of the nation." "We must save Mauritania at a decisive time in its history," said Moilid, who also denounced the "persecution of opponents by the Nouakchott government." MINISTER COMMENTS ON PROJECTS--Brother 'Abd al-Ghani 'Abd al-Qadir, member of the central committee and minister of industry, has affirmed that the Ministry of Industry is aspiring to set up new industrial units centered in factories dependent on local raw materials. Foremost among such industries will be those of cement manufacturing and marble-making and the processing of local raw materials such as cotton in order to develop the local textile industry. In the area of electricity, Brother 'Abd al-Ghani said in a statement to the radio that there are a number of projects which will be implemented during the second amended 5-year plan. Work is now progressing on building two powerstations in Wadi Hadramawt and Wadi Abyan. During the next few weeks work will begin on the Mansurah power station. Work is also in progress to construct a geothermal plant at Hiswa. In the course of his statement, the minister said that the government is giving great attention to the Aden refinery. It will be developed to keep pace with the other refineries in the region. [Text] [LD132059 Aden Domestic Service in Arabic 1630 GMT 13 Sep 80 EA]

LONDON ARAB PAPER URGES ACTION TO 'COOL' IRAQI-IRANIAN CONFLICT

LD221009 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 19 Sep 80 p 5

[Article by 'Irfan Nizam Ad-din: "The Gulf Fear"]

[Excerpts] The situation in the gulf area has reached the danger point following the recent developments represented by the Iraqi-Iranian battles and Iraq's abrogation of the 6 March agreement which was concluded in Algiers between President Saddam Husayn (who was deputy chairman of the Iraqi Revolution Command Council at the time) and the departed shah, whereby Iran obtained navigational "concessions" in Shatt al-'Arab.

Amid the prevailing state of watchfulness and anxiety, everything is possible as to which direction the crisis might take. It is definite however that the crisis would not remain confined to Iraq and Iran, were the situation to continue to deteriorate and war break out, but would affect the entire gulf area and whole Arab and Islamic world.

Therefore, there is an urgent need for swift action to cool the atmosphere and pave the way for fraternal negotiations between the two countries to resolve their problems peacefully and put an end to the unnecessary squandering of Islamic forces which only serves their many enemies, particularly Israel.

The critical situation the Arab nation is experiencing calls for vigilance and watchfulness and for avoiding becoming dragged into peripheral crises at a time when the Zionist campaigns are intensifying to consolidate Israeli occupation of the Arab territories and turn the area into an arena for international conflict.

Without entering into the details of the Iraqi-Iranian dispute and its reasons, the two sides must be asked to have recourse to reason and patience and to dialog instead of arms. It would be better for the Arab states to move collectively to achieve this matter and to reach a new formula for cooperation based on noninterference in internal affairs, on refraining from provoking sensitivities and hatreds and on ending the logic of domination and the "policeman" policy invented by the departed shah.

It is in the interest of everybody to devote attention to building the intrinsic power, to implementing the development projects and to consolidating the ranks to confront the biggest danger posed by the Israeli presence.

QATARI PAPER COMMENTS ON PALESTINIANS LIVING IN GULF

GF201910 Doha AL-RAYAH in Arabic 18 Sep 80 pp 1, 10

[Editorial: "Palestinians in the Gulf"]

[Excerpts] In a statement to the Lebanese paper AL-SAFIR, PLO Central Committee member Salah Khalaf (Abu Iyad) referred to Palestinians in the Gulf and what our enemies are trying to do by creating problems between these Palestinians and Gulf natives. Palestinians in the Gulf are carrying a message for humanity and civilization in the fields of education, economics and construction. Gulf citizens have welcomed them and received them with amity as their brothers. No unusual problems have arisen between Palestinians and Gulf citizens. What has happened here is normal and happens everywhere.

But the crisis to which Abu Iyad refers is that there are persons who "have an interest in creating a rift between Arab expatriates in the Gulf and native Gulf citizens. Therefore some persons provoke personal and security incidents and attribute them to the Palestinians."

Those individuals who are fighting Arabs in general and the Palestinian cause in particular want to kindle the fire between Palestinian Arabs and Gulf Arabs. They are attributing, without justification or proof, any acts aimed at harming the security of the Gulf to the Palestinians. But we must face this attempt and foil it at an early stage.

Abu Iyad says: "We do not object to the trial of any Palestinian offender. However, we are against any such campaign directed at Palestinians that may spread to schools, factories and institutions and lead to undesirable results."

This is what we must guard against and totally reject. Our decisive stand against such acts is part of the defense of the Gulf and the security of all Arabs against the tragedies being created by our enemies everywhere. This is what we should do at a time when true cooperation must exist between the Arabs themselves--cooperation based on mutual interests and the Arab homeland.

IRAQI-IRANIAN CLASHES STATEMENT--The Deputy Amir and heir apparent, Shaykh Hamad Ibn Khalifah al Thani, presided over the weekly cabinet meeting in al-Dawhah Palace today. At the beginning of the meeting the cabinet discussed current events between Iraq and Iran. In this regard Information Minister 'Isa Ghanim al-Kuwari made the following statement: The cabinet today discussed reports on the escalating bloody conflict between the two neighboring Muslim countries, Iraq and Iran. The government of Qatar, which is following with extreme anxiety and great pain the development of this conflict between the two countries, hopes that the appeal of wisdom which provides for the resolution of differences among brothers by peaceful means will win out. In this way the bloodshed can end and the strength and energy expended can contribute toward our Islamic nation's struggle in the face of the aggression by our common enemy against our Arab rights and Islamic holy places. Also, no opportunity will be created for foreign intervention, which we are all anxious to avoid. The cabinet discussed the topics on its agenda and adopted the appropriate decisions. INDEPENDENCE IN CHOICE OF ARMS SUPPLIER EMPHASIZED

[Editorial: "The Freedom to Arms"]

[Excerpts] The question of armament is no longer a problem for the Middle East countries, since the area has become the biggest consumer of arms of various types. Arms purchases have reached billions of dollars, which has made arms manufacturers drool and made them compete strongly to promote their goods regardless of the political implications involved, especially in view of the political ties which most countries in the area have had for more than a quarter of a century.

The question of armament is now particularly sensitive, and this has prompted most Arab countries, particularly the Gulf countries, to crack the monopoly and break away from the domination of the two giants, so as to obtain good quality arms from other countries, especially France, Britain and Germany, whose arms are to a large extent superior to Russian and U.S. arms.

The problem for the countries of the area lies not in the purchase of arms, since they have plenty of money to conclude the biggest deals despite the competition and the political strings, but in training the men to use, control, maintain and insure proper utilization of those arms. This calls for great efforts and large amounts of money, which in most cases exceed the cost of the arms themselves. This also means the need for a correct training policy based first and foremost on providing efficient instructors, building of the necessary installations, and planning a sound defense policy in which the citizen is the cornerstone and the prime mover.

Proceeding from these clear basis, the kingdom has begun drawing up its comprehensive defensive policy on the basis of the principle of general defense rather than of concentrating on one particular area, as his highness the defense minister said at his important press conference.

The principle of diversifying armament, as his highness pointed out, is also a commitment undertaken by the kingdom and considered one important step toward breaking the arms monopoly which Washington and Moscow have in the Arab world.

His highness' reference clarifies an established fact and rules out any link between politics and armament, although some arms-exporting countries insist or make it a condition that a certain policy be adopted in return for obtaining a certain arm.

The right choice of the source of arms with total independence is evidence of nonbelief in the axis policy, which the kingdom has always rejected and warned against involvement in.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL OIL COMPANY NOT VIEWED AS IMMINENT

LD171055 London AL-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Report by Yunis Muhammad Ishaq: "Saudi Arabia Has Acquired Its Share in Aramco, and Arrangements for the Establishment of the National Company Will Be Completed"]

[Excerpt] Jidda AL-SHARQ AL-AWSAT Bureau--Dr 'Abd al-Hadi Tahir, governor of the Saudi General Organization for Petroleum and Minerals (PETROMIN), has emphasized that the Saudi Arabian Government acquired full ownership of Aramco shares as of 10 March 1980.

The PETROMIN governor added in an exclusive statement to AL-SHARQ AL-AWSAT that this acquisition does not mean the imminent establishment of the national petroleum company, since there is no hurry about completing the necessary arrangements.

He explained that many things ought to be resolved before embarking on the establishment of this company, particularly how to manage it.

Dr Tahir pointed out that immediate commitments will not be affected if production is reduced to 8.3 million barrels a day. He said: The additional quantities produced are not part of the original basic quota sold through companies. Discounting these quantities therefore has nothing to do with the subject, because they are not included in the basic quota in any case.

The PETROMIN governor said that present production is 1 million barrels a day higher than the fixed maximum. He added that the Saudi Arabian kingdom's production capability has now reached 11 million barrels daily. He added that this figure could be increased to 12 million barrels daily by mid-1985.

ADEQUATE CORN CROP, SHORTAGES IN DARFUR DISCUSSED

Khartoum AL-SAHAFAH in Arabic 1 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] Dr Umar al-Amin, minister of agriculture, nutrition and natural resources confirmed that during the last harvest, the nation's production of corn totaled 1.8 million tons, thus maintaining the national average for seasonal production. The sum of the crop and the general reserve exceeds national consumption by 600,000 tons. The combined supply of corn in both the public and private sectors will enable the state to withstand any slack in production in any particular region of the nation, should it occur.

Dr al-Amin reviewed the efforts of central state agencies to cope with shortages of corn in western and southern regions of the Sudan. These efforts began with the maintenance of a general reserve. Executive Popular Councils are allowed to obtain corn at official prices without [advance] payment commitments. State agencies even contribute to the transportation cost of the corn to needy areas. The ministry of transport is committed to transporting the corn via the railroad, even if passenger trains have to be cancelled to do so.

This information was given in a statement delivered yesterday in the People's Assembly by the minister of agriculture, Dr al-Amin, in response to an urgent question submitted by 64 members of the western governorates regarding a potential corn shortage, high prices and a resultant specter of starvation. Dr al-Amin asked the local agencies in the governorates to obtain their needs of corn without delay in order to make this basic nutritional staple available to the citizens in western and southern Sudan. He also called on all agencies and organizations to urge the citizens in western Sudan and throughout the nation to plant corn, whose season has started, to secure their needs and preclude crises in future years.

In a statistical review of the situation, the minister of agriculture said: "The nation's average production of corn last season dropped from 2 to 1.8 million tons. This is due to the decrease in the areas planted with corn in the irrigated sector as well as in the traditional sector. This decrease amounted to 1 million acres. The average production in the western governorates dropped from 400,000 tons annually to 260,000 tons in the last season. The traditional planted area decreased by 200,000 acres, while the level of production in the mechanized sector in south Kurdufan was maintained. In spite of all this, the corn crop along with the national reserve exceeds annual consumption by more than 600,000 tons."

Dr al-Amin referred to the fact that only limited quantities of corn had been exported and that this would not affect the abundant supply available for domestic consumption. He added that the corn reserve at the Agricultural Bank has reached 434,000 sacks. The state maintains this reserve every year in order to direct it to areas of need and to sell it on the market to stabilize the price of corn.

Dr al-Amin stated that the first reports indicating the seriousness of the corn situation in the western provinces were received from the governors of North Darfur and South Darfur in mid-May 1980. Following that, an emergency meeting chaired by the minister of finance and economy was held. It was decided that 50,000 sacks of corn from the Agricultural Bank warehouse would be allocated to South Darfur under guarantee of the finance ministry. The price was set at 7.8 pounds per sack. The corn will be transported by railroad to Niala, the ministry of finance will absorb 50 percent of the transportation cost. All preliminary steps for this transaction were completed, but representatives of the South Darfur governorate have so far not been able to sign the contract and take delivery of the corn.

Dr al-Amin indicated that he had learned only yesterday [30 June] that the representatives of South Darfur had requested a special type of corn which they wished to buy directly from the private sector. Therefore, they were requesting the ministry of finance to give them the money to make this purchase. Naturally, the minister of finance did not approve this request. Dr al-Amin mentioned that the ministry of finance had approved an allocation to North Darfur last May, and had paid for it. But until now, the transactions have not been completed for similar reasons as above.

Dr al-Amin gave figures representing quantities of corn which were transported via railroad to Niala. These quantities were: 20,000 sacks from Khartoum through the private sector in February-March 1980; 26,000 sacks from Dabibat to South Darfur in March-April 1980; and 10,000 sacks to South Darfur in April-May 1980.

A total of 8,400 sacks of corn have been shipped for Niala by the private sector, but they have been held up between Kusta and al-Rashif railroad stations, because the governor of South Darfur wanted to give priority to other supplies.

Dr al-Amin emphasized the readiness of the railroad authorities to transport the corn needed by the people of South Darfur, once the priorities requested by the governor are completed.

Dr al-Amin emphasized that the authorities had not received information about a corn supply crisis in the western governorates. He stated that the ministry is ready to solve any problems which might impede the availability of corn to the citizens everywhere. Dr al-Amin said appropriate measures have been adopted in this regard from May to July 1980. Thus, the minister of finance issued a decree stopping the sale of corn by the Agricultural Bank until 20 July 1980, and the minister of transport issued a decree to transport corn to the western governorates by railroad, cancelling passenger trains if necessary. Also, 60,000 sacks of corn were allocated to the southern region to be transported from Kusti at the expense of the finance ministry.

In conclusion, Dr al-Amin said that the ministry of agriculture has begun preparations to carry out a special pest-control program in the western provinces in the next six months. The program has been referred to the council of ministers for approval.

[Article: "Concern of the Two Countries To Promote Cooperation"]

[Text] Hassan Belkhoja, minister of foreign affairs, yesterday at noon in the headquarters of his department received Maurice Abdela, secretary general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Malta, who was accompanied by the chief of the Arab Division of the same office and by a Maltese member of parliament.

The meeting was carried out in the presence of Taleb Sahbani, secretary general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, who met beforehand with the Maltese guests.

In a statement at the conclusion of the meeting, Abdela said that he had examined with Belkhoja and Sahbani several issues concerning particularly the means of strengthening cooperation between Tunisia and Malta.

In this regard, Abdela emphasized that the decision of the Tunisian government to very soon open an embassy in La Valette and the coming meeting of the Tunisian-Maltese Joint Commission that has to examine the program of cooperation between the two countries, represent their concern to promote relations between them, to develop their cooperation and to strengthen their ties of friendship.

Abdela concluded by emphasizing that his visit to Tunisia is made within the framework of periodic contacts and harmony between the leaders of the two countries to achieve these objectives.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION WITH KUWAIT REPORTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 23 Aug 80 p 5

[Article: "Optimism for Prospects of Development of Tunisian-Kuwaiti Cooperation. Toward Creation of a Joint Bank for Development"]

[Text] Abderrahman Salem Al Atiki, Kuwaiti minister of finance, left Tunis yesterday after having participated in a meeting of the Arab Economic Council, the result of the Conference of Arab Ministers of Foreign Affairs held in Amman at the beginning of last July.

In a statement, Al Atiki praised the excellent Tunisian-Kuwaiti relations which, he emphasized, are based on mutual respect, reciprocal esteem and serious labor that was made possible thanks to the enlightened policy of the Supreme Warrior and to his actions benefiting cooperation between the two countries.

Al Atiki moreover expressed his satisfaction regarding the state of Tunisian-Kuwaiti cooperation and the pace of its development, explaining his optimism for the prospects of development of this cooperation in the future. In this regard he noted that the success of cooperation between the two countries is due to several factors, especially the good results obtained and the success of programs achieved within the framework of this cooperation. Thus, explained Finance Minister Al Atiki, Kuwaiti investments in Tunisia have brought the hoped-for results, especially in tourism.

Al Atiki stated in this connection that because of this success, other initiatives will be taken, including particularly creation of a Tunisian-Kuwaiti bank for development. Emphasizing the interest of Arab investments in Arab countries, Al Atiki reaffirmed Kuwait's full inclination to strengthen such investments even if they were less profitable than those in other countries. He explained that investments in Arab countries must be based on the common interest within a concern for achieving economic and social development in the Arab world.

Al Atiki was attended on his departure from the Tunis-Carthage international airport by Mansour Moalla, planning and finance minister; Abdelhassen Zalzala, assistant secretary general of the League of Arab States, entrusted with economic affairs and Majran Ahmad Al Hamad, ambassador of Kuwait to Tunis.

[Article: "Desire To See Cooperation between the Two Countries Strengthened"]

[Text] At the end of the official visit to Tunisia from 21 to 23 August by Kwassivi Kpetigo, Togolese minister of industry and state companies, a final communique was published, the text of which is the following:

At the invitation of His Excellence, the Tunisian Minister of National Economy, Abdelaziz Lasram, His Excellence, the Togolese Minister of Industry and State Companies, Kwassivi Kpetigo, made an official visit to Tunisia from 21 to 23 August 1980.

This visit provided the opportunity for the two ministers to exchange views about cooperation between the two countries in economic and technical areas and especially in the area of industry and state companies.

For this purpose His Excellence, Mr Lasram, presented to the Togolese minister a summary of the results obtained by the Tunisian Government under the guidance of President Bourguiba in his efforts to promote the economic and social development of the Tunisian Republic.

His Excellence, Minister Kpetigo, after having thanked the Tunisian Government; its party, the Destourien Socialist Party and President Habib Bourguiba, in the name of the Togolese Government, its party and its president, Army General Eyadema, described to Minister Lasram the broad outlines of Togolese policies regarding economic, social and technical development.

In observing the condition of Tunisian-Togolese cooperation, the two ministers congratulated each other on the excellent state of this cooperation and on the vast possibilities available for pursuing and strengthening it.

During their stay, the Togolese delegation became aware of the dynamic quality of the Tunisian economy, when they visited certain Tunisian Government projects in areas such as: mining, metallurgy, manufacturing, agro-industry, tourism, etc.

At the conclusion of this visit, the two ministers expressed their desire to see cooperation strengthened between Togo and Tunisia especially in the areas of:

Economics--through trade exchanges and joint projects.

Technical matters--through exchanges of technicians, and professional training, in order to set up the necessary structures for the industrial development of their countries out of concern for improving living conditions.

His Excellence, Minister Kpetigo, quite sensitive to the brotherly welcome accorded him and his delegation, warmly thanks Minister Lasram and, through him, his colleagues and all the regional and local authorities who have not spared any effort to make his stay fruitful, and he asks to please convey to the President of the Tunisian Republic his thanks and a brotherly greeting from the President of the Togolese Republic.

Minister Kpetigo invites His Excellence, Mr. Lasram, to pay an official visit to Togo at his convenience.

OIL MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON OIL PRODUCTION, PRICING POLICIES

JN131103 Doha QNA in Arabic 1005 GMT 13 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Abu Dhabi, 13 Sep (QNA)--Dr Mani' Sa'id al-'Utaybah, UAE minister of petroleum and natural resources, has called for removing the oil weapon from outbiddings that call for using it as a threat, so that oil will not lose its value.

In an interview with the Abu Dhabi newspaper AL-WAHDAH today, he said: We are ready to use the oil weapon in the service of our Pan-Arab causes and to suspend its export to any country proven to be fighting the Arabs, whether the United States or any other country, because in this matter there is no difference between East and West.

Dr al-'Utaybah reiterated his country's consistent policy of continuing to decrease its oil production. He said: We are determined to carry out more oil production reductions before the end of this year and early next year regardless of whether there is a surplus on the oil market. However, the UAE minister did not define the rate of such reductions.

Dr al-'Utaybah said that his country will not permit oil price reductions even if it becomes necessary to close down its oil fields.

Dr al-'Utaybah expressed pessimism on the possibility of unifying prices under the current circumstances. He said: It is very difficult to achieve this at present because OPEC needs more time to gradually unify prices. This should be achieved in stages and not at one time because of the possible effects of such a step on the world economy and its political repercussions.

Dr al-'Utaybah denied any knowledge about news reports that Saudi Arabia intends to raise its oil prices in the range of $4 per barrel. He stressed that his country is not ready to increase its oil prices at present in the range of $4 at one time.

'SDAR' COMMUNIQUE REPORTS MILITARY SUCCESSES AGAINST MOROCCANS

LD211348 Algiers Domestic Service in Arabic 1200 GMT 21 Sep 80

[Text] News agency reports this morning carry the story of a new sweeping attack by the Saharan fighters on the city of El Aaiun, capital of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic on 18 September. The reports cite the communique issued by the Saharan Defense Ministry this morning announcing that on 18 September naval units of the Saharan Popular Liberation Army attacked the port of El Aaiun, occupied by the Moroccan invasion forces and were able to free it for a while. The communique notes that the Saharan fighters destroyed a significant part of the port's warehouses and also destroyed the ducts carrying the city's fuel and water and the port's electricity lines.

The communique also notes that during 13-15 September, the Saharan fighters shelled the town of Semara, killing 7 Moroccan soldiers and wounding 10 others. On 16 September, forces of the Saharan Popular Liberation Army attacked the garrisons of Rous-el-Ouk and Rous-el-Sabt at Oued Dras in southern Morocco. This shelling led to the killing of 29 soldiers, the wounding of 16 others and the destruction of several military fortifications. The Saharan communique also notes that on 17 September, Saharan fighters attacked Moroccan military installations at Bu Ghirbah in southern Morocco, first for 30 minutes and later for another 15 minutes. This led to the killing of eight Moroccan soldiers, the wounding of four others and to material losses.

DATA ON U.S., FRENCH, SOVIET MADE TANKS IN MID-EAST

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 21 Jul 80 pp 36-37

[Article by Tawfiq Nakhalh Ibrahim: "Tanks M60, T-72, AMX-30; Jordan Arms Itself with American Equipment, While Saudi Arabia Adopts French Equipment"]

[Text] Three tanks have been created for which the Arab nations are competing with each other: The American, the Soviet and the French. The Soviet T-72 has clearly superior charactersitics. Israel has entered the field with the MIRKAV, known for its low speed.

The Jordanian army is to be provided with two hundred M60 American medium tanks. These machines are equipped with a night vision system which operates on infrared rays.

The Israelis have protested this transaction, but this protest is unwarranted. On one hand, the two hundred new tanks will never make the Jordanian ground forces a power whch poses a danger to Israel. If the tank is of the M60 model, it is the most modern equipment which the American army uses, because the new X-M-1 tank has not yet been placed into actual service (its speed is 80 Km/h, and the American tank drivers liken it to a Cadillac). The Americans intend to provide the first batch of XM-1 tanks with new engines (Rolls Royce) operating on diesel fuel. The Shir tanks which Iran ordered during the reign of the Shah used to be equipped with these engines.

The design of the M60 tank is now considered obsolete. The tank's speed is 48 Km/h. However, never models of this tank, especially the M60-I-3 model, equipped with a strong engine and a rangefinder which operates on laser beams, aside from its great ammunition storage capacity, is considered among the best equipment.

However, what Jordan will be provided with, is not tanks of the M60-I-3 type. It should be noted that the M60 tanks, which Jordan will not obtain before 1981/1982, are not equipped with modern electronic firing systems, which could make them terribly effective. However, the positive point of this tank, of which Saudi Arabia owns 250 units, the thickness of its armor, (its weight is fifty six tons) and its type of gun (105 mm), is that it is made in the United States.

In the United States, the M60 tank is still considered to be a good medium-heavy offensive tank, probably thanks to the thickness of its armor, especially when it is driven by an inexperienced driver and exposed to hits by the enemy.

On the other hand, we find that the French AMX-30 tank has light armor. However, it is well-equipped with modern equipment. Its weight is 36 tons, its speed is 60 Km/h, and it is distinguished by tremendous mobility. However, it's relatively light armor requires that its driver be proficient in order to avoid exposing the tank to enemy hits.

This tank, designed in 1957, is equipped with a rangefinder which operates on laser beams, and with a semi-automatic 105 mm gun. It is possible for its projectiles to penetrate an armored wall 36 cm thick from a distance of 3 km.

Saudi Arabia (which owns 250 AMX tanks), Iraq, Morocco and Libya have chosen to provide their armies with this type of tank, also equipped with a 20 mm gun and with a 7.62 mm machinegun. In 1978, Lebanon ordered 30 AMX-30 tanks. The solution upon which Saudi Arabia has relied by equipping itself with American M-60 tanks and French AMX-30 tanks is considered an intelligent solution, because it adds defensive capability to offensive capability.

The primary concern of nations manufacturing the tanks remains to provide maximum protection for the tanks from enemy hits, in order minimize loss of armored equipment. Thus, research has been directed toward manufacturing new armor plate such as (Shobham,) or such as that which the Soviets introduced on the T-72 tanks. It is well known that the Soviet T-72 tank currently found in the Middle East theater of military operations is the most modern of armored vehicles in the region, and is much superior to other existing armored vehicles, in spite of certain defects found in it.

The T-72 tank, designed by the Soviets in the late sixties, with its special characteristics, is considered a technical success. It weighs around 45 tons and moves at a speed of 80 km/h (the Soviets claim 100 km/h, but this may be an exaggeration). It is equipped with a 125 mm gun, with a 7.62 mm machinegun, and with a "Doska" mounted on its turret. Its gun is loaded automatically, at a rate of 10 to 12 rounds per minute. It has a three-man crew.

The Soviet Union produces about 2,000 T-72 tanks annually. These tanks, over a period of two years, will replace the T-54 and T-55 tanks, and will replace a large portion of the Syrian and Iraqi T-62 tanks. Syria currently has about 100 T-72 tanks. Iraq and Libya have the same. One of the drawbacks of this tank is that ammunition storage is located on the sides, and that fuel (which practically under the right fender and part of the left fender) is vulnerable to enemy hits. Therefore, the Soviets are working on using nonflammable diesel fuel. However, it is difficult to store a new type of fuel for one type of armored vehicle in petroleum producing countries where regular fuel is available in abundance. Thus, it is likely that these tanks will operate in Syria, for example, using regular fuel. This makes them very dangerous.

The T-72 tank has the most modern of tank technology, especially the laser beam system and the infra-red system for night battles.

Future tank battles will be carried out for the most part at night, as modern tank divisions will not wait for daybreak to mount their attacks. At around 0300 hours, T-72, M-60 and AMX-30 tanks are capable of waging battle as though it were broad daylight. It should be noted that tanks such as the American M-47 and M-48, which date back to the period immediately following World War II (Jordan has 250 of them, Israel 650, Iran 400 and Morocco 100), can be equipped with infra-red systems for night firing and control.

In the past year, the Israelis have produced 40 armored vehicles of a new type called MIRK (Vehicle), equipped with a semi-automatic 105 mm gun. When these armored vehicles were demonstrated to Western experts, these noted that there were two small doors in the rear of the armored vehicle. The experts learned later that the small doors were used for storing ammunition. However, this armored vehicle is not fast, and this constitutes one of its most important defects in the theater of military operations.

PDRY, OMAN DIPLOMATIC MOVES ASSESSED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 20 Jul 80 p 8

[Article by 'Ali Hashim: "Moves of South Yemen and Oman; Oman Attempts to Avoid Isolation; Aden Mediates between Area and Soviets"]

[Text] The Arab Gulf is stifled by burning summer heat, 50 degrees centigrade temperature, and 100 percent humidity. On top of this, the month of Ramadan arrives to bring all activity to a standstill. Nobody receives guests, nobody discusses anything, and everybody abstains from food, activity, and conversation!

However, despite this calm, people in the Gulf are not tranquil. They are to some degree confident, but also afraid, hesitant, and questioning. What is going to happen to their area? What is in store? What will be the fate of the oil?

More and more talk goes on in private gatherings--more than in public ones. Questions follow one another. You try to ask questions, but others turn to you with their own, hoping to hear a reassuring answer.

Two moves took place in the area this week. A PDRY move by president 'Ali Nasir Muhammad al-Hasani, and an Omani move which did not attract too much attention.

There was silence in the Gulf following the revelation that Oman had given military concessions to the United States. No one had the courage to take a stand regarding it, with the exception of Iraq. There, a statement was published in AL-THAWRA, official newspaper of the ruling Arab Socialist Ba-ath party, attributed to Latif Nasif Jasim, minister of culture and information, and Hamid 'Alwan, minister of state for foreign affairs.

Of course, declarations are made rejecting the idea of granting bases to any major power and maintaining that the Gulf's security is the responsibility of its own people. But if any reference is made to the Omani concessions, it is made in whispers, and it never mentions or attacks the sultanate by name. It is as though the Omani bases concern Alaska, not the Gulf, the Sea of Oman, and the Indian Ocean.

The Omani Move

Yusuf al-'Alwi Abdullah, undersecretary of Omani foreign affairs, made a surprise visit to Saudi Arabia accompanied by Maj Salim al-Ghazali, undersecretary of defense and most powerful officer in the Omani armed forces after Sultan Qaboos bin Said himself. The communique issued at the end of the visit stated that the Omani delegation gave King Khalid ibn 'Abdal-'Aziz a message from Sultan Qaboos concerning the situation in the area and Saudi-Omani relations.

Al-'Alwi then returned to Muscat, while al-Ghazali went to Doha to give the Amir of Qatar, Shaykh Khalifa bin Hamad al-Thani, another message from the sultan.

In Jiddah, the Omani visit resulted in no official comments, and the visit of the Omani undersecretary of defense likewise drew no comments in Doha. When questioned, officials merely replied: "Just a friendly message."

"Friendly messages" exchanged between Gulf officials may carry news of "invasions" or may only contain greetings. These messages are part of tribal traditions, such as visiting and inquiring about a neighbor's health. But they may also express complaints, worries, and mutual requests.

The Omani move coincided with the move of the president of the PDRY. After 'Ali Nasir Muhammad visited Jiddah, he went to Abu Dhabi, capital of the United Arab Emirates, for lengthy discussions with its president, Shaykh Zayid bin Sultan Al Nahayyan.

Therefore, the Omani messages and visits were not undertaken just to check on the health of neighbors. They were much more important.

Breaking Loose

What do knowledgeable Gulf sources say about these developments? A high official told AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI that the Omani visits were meant to break loose from the isolation of the sultanate following its unilateral agreement providing facilitations to the U.S.

While the Gulf countries did not rise in protest against this agreement, at least in the press, their silence did not mean recognition or acceptance of the fait accompli.

Oman was worried most about leaks that Saudi Arabia was taking steps to improve its relations with Marxist South Yemen, without South Yemen first improving its relations with Oman, as previously agreed upon.

The country closest to Saudi Arabia in the area is Qatar, because both follow the Islamic Wahabi doctrine. Therefore, the Omanis concentrated their efforts on Saudi Arabia and Qatar.

As to the United Arab Emiratis, they have firm relations and old accounts to settle with the Sultanate of Oman. In light of this, the sultanate does not find that any steps taken in Abu Dhabi would affect it adversely, since such steps must take into account "sensitive issues" as well as common interests between the two, particularly the border issue which is still not a closed subject, although it is on its way to a final settlement.

What about Kuwait? For some time now, Kuwait has been seeking to resolve differences in the area. Based on its balanced foreign policy and lack of embroilment in marginal disputes, it has been trying to bring about a reconciliation between north and south Yemen, and, subsequently, between the Aden regime and Oman.

Therefore, the Omanis had only the Saudi and Qatar positions to worry about, and acted accordingly to thwart any move to isolate Oman.

The Road to Moscow

What about the objectives of the PDRY move? As hot weather and poltics settle over the Gulf, observers continue to ask: Will there be war? Will the oil go up in flames? Or will there be a settlement? On the very day that 'Ali Nasir Muhammad was in Jiddah, and about to leave for Abu Dhabi, 'Ali Muhammad Nasir 'Antar, PDRY minister of defense and strong man of president 'Ali Nasir's "group," was in Moscow.

The PDRY move was inevitable, because the resignation of the former president, 'Abd al-Fattah Ismail, created an easing of the situation between the Aden Marxist regime and the conservative Gulf states. Ismail was trying to outdo Moscow itself in socialism, nationalism, Marxism, Leninism and even Stalinism.

'Ali Nasir Muhammad changed things, though not totally. South Yemen took on an Arab nationalist stance and returned to Islam, though not the brand advocated by Khomeyni, the Kuwaiti religious reform group, or the Saudi Wahabis. 'Ali Nasir Muhammad's philosophy of government is grounded in the Arab and Islamic history of the Gulf area. But at the same time, he maintains an ideology based on scientific socialism.

Reservations in the Gulf countries about the Aden regime disappeared with Ismail's departure and Nasir's coming to power. Discussions based on common Arab aims were inevitable. Good relations between Aden and Riyadh are necessary, and 'Ali Nasir is expected to seek further improvements, particularly in developing good relations with the Emirates. The latter's president is an ardent nationalist who generously gives large amounts of aid to the non-petroleum producing countries of the area, such as Somalia, the two Yemens, and Djibouti.

Of equal importance to 'Ali Nasir are relations with Kuwait, for many reasons. Kuwait has a special section in its foreign ministry for providing aid to non-petroleum producing countries, including the PDRY. Kuwait did not stop aid to the latter in spite of pressures to do so on a number of occasions, particularly at the Tunis summit, which recommended severing relations with Aden when forces of the latter invaded the Yemen Arab Republic (the north).

A common denominator between the PDRY and Kuwait is that they are the only two Gulf nations, aside from Iraq, which have diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. This brings us to the basic purpose of 'Ali Nasir's trip. Having been accused of turning his country into a Soviet military base, he wishes to deny these accusations and maintain that relations between countries can be based on mutual respect of sovereignty. He has the Kuwaiti example in mind. In the case of Kuwait, a conservative country is maintaining diplomatic relations with Moscow and Peking without becoming communist or being influenced by those countries.

Nevertheless, 'Ali Nasir's motives include explaining his version of reasons for establishing relations with Moscow.

Moscow's Road to the Gulf

'Ali Nasir began "evangelizing" to dispel the Gulf region's fears of the Soviets in the midst of events percipitated by the Iranian revolution and the "legitimate" Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. He is playing the Afghanistan card and opening Moscow's road to the Gulf, even if at the start only diplomatically. This oepning will involve oil--for a price--at the final stage.

Several officials and observers in the Gulf are almost convinced that diplomatic relations with the Soviets are at hand, not to spite the U.S., which is assembling naval and strike forces in the area, but as a hedge against the future. Gulf nations would thus be following the example of West European nations. These are with the U.S. within NATO, but maintain a dialogue with the Soviets.

The establishment of diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union could avert a war that the Americans may be preparing for in Don Quixote fashion, unilaterally and without consulting the rest of the world, including what Washington calls "the world of allies."

TOP PALESTINIAN SPOKESMAN DISPARAGES EUROPEAN INITIATIVE

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 29 Jun 80 p 10

/Article by Samir Sa'd-al-Din: "The Head of the Palestine National Council Talks to AL-RIYAD: The European Activity Is Not Serious"/

/Text/ The Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the secretaries general of various Palestinian organizations and a number of members of the Palestine National Congress recently held a joint meeting in Damascus to review setting the time and place for holding the new session of the Palestine National Congress, in order to discuss new developments on the Palestinian stage, including increasing the members of the Executive Committee and international and Arab influences on it. Those at the meeting decided that the 15th National Congress session would be held toward the end of August in Damascus.

AL-RIYAD had this meeting with Khalid al-Fahum, head of the Palestine National Congress, on this session, the political and organizational matters which might be discussed in the light of the program set out for it, as well as the official Palestinian view on the Venice declaration which, the Arabs had expected (as they had been promised by the European countries) would take the form of an initiative based on recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization as a sole legitimate representative and these people's right to return and determine their destiny, the theses which appear from time to time concerning future relations between Palestine and Jordan, in view of the organic and spiritual links and interests the two countries possess, and the popular revolution in the bank and the strip which has begun to take serious dimensions against the colonialist Israeli presence.

AL-RIYAD : There has been much talk about the place and the convening of the new Palestine National Congress session. When might that take place? What subjects are listed on its agenda? What is the truth of the statement that some resistance detachments which are not represented on the Executive Council will enter it for the first time, especially the small ones?

al-Fahum: At the last meeting it was decided that 31 August 1980 would be the date for the convening of the 15th session of the National Congress and that Damascus would be the site. As regards this session's agenda, a special committee consisting of our brother Yasir 'Arafat, chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization Executive Committee, the secretaries general of the detachments of the resistance movement, and the chairman of the national congress will now proceed to hold continuous meetings to reach agreement on all political and organizational matters to be presented to the congress.

As regards political matters, there is total agreement over the importance of and unanimity on the political program which the National Congress approved at its last session. Thus the political program remains the firm basis for united Palestinian political movement on the Arab and international stage. Naturally, political matters which have arisen recently will be presented to the congress, especially European activity in the context of the statement issued by the Venice conference and Palestinian-Arab relations, so that united Palestinian positions may be taken with regard to these issues.

Here I have not referred to the subject of Camp David, which is without a doubt a conspiracy to liquidate the Palestinian cause, on grounds that the political program ratified at the congress' 14th session deals with all the minutiae of this subject. As far as Camp David goes, our position is firm.

As regards the Executive Committee, it is natural that a new committee will be formed in which all the detachments of the resistance movement will be represented, especially since some of them, as everyone knows, are outside the Executive Committee--although in their totality they, that is, the detachments of the resistance, are represented in the Palestine National Congress. We hope that our coming congress will be the background in which better Palestinian relations may be realized, and that we will make large strides toward national unity, especially in the political, military and financial fields.

AL-RIYAD: What is the true state of current and future Palestinian-Jordanian relations, in the light of the ideas and plans that are presented from time to time regarding the future of the Palestinian cause?

al-Fahum: Any talk about future relations with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan or any other Arab country assuming a constitutional form is premature before the establishment of an independent Palestinian state. Priority, as far as the Palestine Liberation Organization goes, now goes to struggline with every means to realize the fixed national rights of the Palestinian people, that is, their right to return, determine their destiny and establish an independent Palestinian state on Palestinian soil. We are cooperating with all our Arab brethren, including Jordan, proceeding from the resolutions of Riyad in 1974, Baghdad in 1978 and Tunis in 1979. Therefore, any discussion about constitutional relations or any other form will not be made before establishment of the Palestinian state.

AL-RIYAD: What about the Venice declaration, and the observations the organization has adopted on it, especially since we had heard before it was issued that the Europeans would present an initiative founded on a basis of recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization as a sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and these people's right to self-determination?

Answer: The Liberation Organization's official position on the declaration is that expressed by the official organization spokesman after the conclusion of the Executive Committee meetings, but to what the official spokesman said I would like to add that any serious European activity will have to take basic objectivity into consideration, if Europe wants to contribute to solving the Middle East problem.

First, any European activity must take into consideration that the Camp David agreement, and the results it produced, are unacceptable and must announce its failure in categoric, final fashion; any European activity based on the premise of Camp David, or acceptance of the results it produced, is something which cannot be accepted in the Palestinian or Arab context.

Second, no European activity can acquire a serious character unless it begins with recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization as a sole legitimate representative in this people's name. This is something the Europeans must carry out with utmost speed if they want to start serious, objective, realistic movement.

The statement issued at Venice did not achieve these two obvious things, and therefore we cannot state that the European movement is serious or that its premises for a comprehensive solution to the Middle East problem are correct. Our position regarding any future European movement can be defined only in the light of consideration for these two points. This is in addition to our conviction that the issue of investigating the facts which the Europeans will carry out, is only aimed at postponing all European activity until after the American elections. During his visit to the Arab Gulf states and Saudi Arabia, the French president received a clear notion of the Palestinian and Arab viewpoint, and the same was true when Schmidt, the West German chancellor, visited Saudi Arabia.

AL-RIYAD: How can we explain the organized wave of terror directed against the Palestinian people and their fighting men in the occupied territories, in the light of what the citizens and mayors are exposed to?

al-Fahum: The policy Israel is proceeding with, which its prime minister Menachem Begin is directing, is clear and well known to the Palestinians, the Arabs and the whole world. Begin the terrorist is stating publicly repeatedly, in earshot of the entire world, that he does not consider that the West Bank and Gaza are occupied territories but are an integral part of the land of greater Israel, and that greater Israel, as the Zionist fanatics, headed by Begin, see it, has no specific borders but is capable of expansion whenever the opportunity arises. The Camp David agreements gave Begin the cover he required, I mean, the presence of a big Arab party which would make it easy for him to implement his aggressive policy.

Everyone knows the truth of the heroic role which our Palestinian Arab people and their national leaders in the bank and the strip are playing to thwart the Camp David policy and the agreements which resulted from it.

Everyone without a doubt knows that our people in the occupied territories have been the basic force preventing application of the autonomy agreements which will incorporate the bank and Gaza to Israel by law and permit them to be occupied militarily for an unspecified time.

Absolute Palestinian rejection of the autonomy agreement was basically what brought this agreement down.

Everyone knows that Menachem Begin's policy, which calls for the incorporation of the West Bank and Gaza into Israel, requires that both be emptied of their inhabitants so that incorporation will be easy and the absorption smooth. Therefore it is not surprising that Begin should launch an attack against the national leaders in the occupied territories by banishing them sometimes and trying to assassinate them at other times, as happened recently to the devoted sons of Palestine Fahd al-Qawasimah, Milhim, al-Tamimi, al-Shak'ah, Khalar and al-Tawil.

This is not new. The sequence of terror, banishment and assassination has been going on since 1967 and is a matter which is in harmony with the nature and personality of Menachem Begin as a terrorist with deep roots and a founder of the expansionist Zionist movement.

We urge our Arab nation and all Arab officials to continue their stand of support for the combatants and our people within who are in isolation challenging all the force Israel possesses, especially since information has it that the settlers in the bank have started to increase arming themselves and have received the agreement of a number of senior officials in the state of Israel that they may maintain law and order alongside the army within the West Bank, which means that our homes and our honor will be at the mercy of the settlers and the inhabitants in the settlements--settlements situated in the heart of the villages and towns of the bank and the strip and in direct contact with our people. Here I would like to point out that our people in the occupied territories are now embarking on a bitter struggle against the Zionist presence and that the first light of a popular revolution has now appeared. Proof of that is that there is a large rate of increase of molotov cocktails in the field which people are manufacturing, as well as an increase in mass acts of violence against policemen and Jews entering Arab sections and places. The source of the trouble the people are facing is not, as the friends of Israel state, Jewish extremists, and the assertion that the government has no knowledge of it is contrary to the truth. They are facing an organized terrorist onslaught run by the government of Israel under the leadership of Menachem Begin.

As regards the fighting men, they have full appreciation and greetings from us, which through the newspaper AL-RIYAD, I would like to send to them, especially our brother Bassam Shak'ah, whom I visited recently in Amman and who was without a doubt a source of inspiration to all of us and all the people of Palestine and the Arab nation in their splendid perseverance and adherence as Palestinians and Arabs to their positions of principle, their absolute rejection of all the Camp David schemes, and their rejection of all the pressures and conspiracies to which they and their brothers are exposed.

Each of us must be like al-Shak'ah, at the apex of challenge and determination to continue the holy war against the Zionist occupation which is passing through special severe conditions.

This was the end of the report, which took extensive time from an official who has time only for work.

BRIEFS

SOVIET FORCE IN PDRY--During his recent meeting with King Khalid in Riyad, the president of South Yemen, Muhammad 'Ali Nasir, tried to convince King Khalid not to attach too much importance to the military euqipment (surface-to-surface missiles, Mig-23 aircraft and T-62/72 tanks) obtained by Aden from Moscow. 'Ali Nasir informed the Saudi officials that the presence of a batallion of sharpshooters and a squadron of Soviet Mig-25 aircraft in Aden is temporary. However, King Khalid stressed to the South Yemeni officials the need to honor the principle of barring the presence of foreign forces in the region. SAUDIS FINANCE WEAPONS PURCHASES--Arab political sources here have told AL-SAFIR that the Saudi Arabian government recently agreed to finance a "basic portion" of Tunisia's weapons requirements. The sources say that most of the weapons will come from France and will consist of fighter planes, helicopters, and antiaircraft guns. The sources added that the Saudi government will also pay for training Tunisian military forces in the use of these weapons. They said that during a recent visit of the Tunisian foreign minister, Hasan Belkhodja, to Saudi Arabia several joint Saudi-Tunisian committees were formed to deal with "broad issues." These committees were headed by the foreign ministers of the two countries. [Text] [Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 27 Jun 80 p 1] 9669

AFGHAN CRISIS STUDIED IN VARIOUS ASPECTS

Afghan Crisis: Questions Abound

Florence POLITICA INTERNAZIONALE in Italian Feb 80 pp 3-28

[Text] Even without the diversity in ideological or alignment positions, of which there are clearly considerable, deciphering the Afghan crisis requires a number of keys. The most striking thing about it is the international reactions it has triggered: Carter called it the gravest crisis since World War II. Official U.S. reactions in areas ranging from disarmament (a freeze of SALT ratification) to economic relations (the embargo on 17 million tons of grain) and even to the threat to boycott the Moscow Olympics, which as we all know reached out to all kinds of people all over the world, even people with no politics to speak of, have combined to give top priority to international aspects of the crisis. In this context, in addition to the East-West dimension, with its impact on U.S.-USSR relations, there is the North-South dimension to consider, with the effect the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has had and may have on relations between Moscow and the Third World (and we have already seen some of this at the UN and at the Islamic Conference); also calling for assessment, though, is the part powers such as the European nations can play in keeping the processes of radicalization and polarization from inexorably smothering the last hopes of cooperation and detente. The Afghan crisis, however, has its own inner dynamics, very heavy-handed foreign interference has subverted, though not totally nullified, and which could, under less tense conditions, return to their own autonomous ways of dealing with the matter.

At the root of it all lies the coup d'etat in April 1978, which set off a "revolution from the top," perhaps limited in its actual consensus but nevertheless endowed with its own unquestioned capacity for innovation and an objective legitimacy of its own, and has as its protagonists the civilian and military cadres that work together in the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, out of which have come all the presidents who have succeeded one another in power in Kabul during these 2 years of strife and tragedy in Afghanistani history. The results of that revolution are still controversial, and in any case have not led to any visible stabilization. Still to emerge is any well defined social bloc to take the place of the one that had held power, first under the monarchy and later under Daoud, the prince-president who was overthrown in 1978. The reforms spelt out with remarkable clarity on paper but launched amid too much resistance from many quarters to be really effective, particularly since there had been no proper preparation for their implementation, met with opposition on all sides: with their impact on custom, on property, and on social relationships they affected traditions and power positions that had seemed immutable and naturally all who felt themselves dispossessed turned to whatever help they could find, from Islamic fundamentalism to armed efforts to reverse the situation. The combined upshot has been endemic guerrilla warfare which has only made the whole picture still more precarious by weakening the regime's ability to make changes and win support while inviting outside intervention.

There is a good deal of speculation as to how much or how little of such involvement there actually was. Was the 1978 coup spontaneous? or was it remote-controlled from Moscow, which had always had special ties with the small but homogeneous communist group there? And to what extent did China, Pakistan, the United States, and even Iran actively try to make the Taraki experiment fail? Because, in the event, it was the international scenario that took over, these are questions worth looking into in depth, not written off as irrelevant, on the argument, correct though it may be, that all revolutionary processes succeed or fail in the final analysis depending on how deep their roots reach into the historical, social, and cultural fabric upon which they must work.

POLITICA INTERNATIONALE dealt with the Afghan revolution in 1979 (n°4, pp 29-37) in an article by Gaetano La Pira, presciently titled "From Feudalism to Imported Socialism." Feudalism held out over the revolution thanks to the flame of Islam, and the high import duty on socialism, while Taraki was beaten by Amin, his second in command, and while Amin was abruptly ousted by a conspiracy in which Babrak Karmal, a victim of earlier purges, enjoyed the open and direct aid of the USSR, turned out to be even steeper than expected. The headlong rush of events requires that we update our analyses and check into the impact of the latest twists and turns. To do this, we are devoting three articles to the Afghan crisis; although they do not exhaust the whole subject, they do attempt to shed light on the various processes, domestic and foreign, without regard to overlapping one another if doing so will help provide a pluralistic and even a dialectical overview of a state of affairs as complex and confusing as this one.

Renato Sandri, a scholar and politician, not only wants to understand the reasons for the crisis but asks how Afghanistan might call upon its existing relations to avoid being drawn into the vortex of cold war. The superpowers have a logic all their own, which is not necessarily the sort that small and middle-sized powers, like those of Europe, should take as their model. The wound inflicted on Afghanistan's independence is still there, but the idea here is to figure out how it might be feasible to use a policy of detente to reconstruct those areas of autonomy in which even the Third World countries -- as the experience of non-alignment, now in very serious trouble, teaches us -- can find safer ground on which to play.

In Giorgio Vercellin's article, which centers primarily on the reach of Islam as the dominant cultural point of reference, seeks to show the impact of the reforms instituted first under Taraki and then under Amin, whose regime after all did not have all that much time to go further, if the reports and various versions now making the rounds even in Afghanistan are true, than recourse to the most brutal repression. Was Afghanistan, a desperately poor and wretchedly backward country, really impermeable to the "wind from the East" or was it clever orchestration by class enemies, whose historical ascendancy Vercellin traces with such perception, that brought about the rising tide? Afghanistan had ancient traditions of instability and perhaps even anarchy at the tribal level, and the Muslim guerrilla war fed on all these factors which predisposed it to "permanent counterrevolution." It was in order to put an end to this state of insecurity, at least formally, that the USSR's intervention was triggered, damnable though it was, whether you take your precedents from Budapest and Prague or from Saigon during the Sixties, where even presidents were attacked and overthrown on instructions from the secret services of a great power. Soviet intervention was partly the spectre that Taraki and Amin, but Claudio Moffa says the ax-grinding editorials of the Western media as well, both sought to avert and wound up making inevitable.

Claudio Moffa also looks at the power struggles within the regime, at the real potential in the reforms, and at their grip on the country's reality: the forcible action of December 1979 was, in some ways, a "moderate coup," in that it replaced Amin with the more malleable and reasonable Karmal. It is yet to be shown, however, if and how Karmal will be able to carry off the role of his country's Kadar, in which some have tried to cast him.

The alarm events in Kabol have set off all over the world is equal to the questions -- not all of them merely academic -- to which those events give rise. They have to do with the real balance of power inside Afghanistan, to measure the chances for success of a policy of swift transformation in a land of the Deep or Super-Deep South. They have to do with the way in which the relations between internal processes and hegemonic or sub-hegemonic policies work in an area like Central Asia, since the USSR is not the only protagonist in the foreign meddling, and in view of the fact that ever since last December's invasion and even today the Afghan rebels are at the core of "major maneuvers" that bring some very high-ranking personages to the Khyber Pass. They have to do with the thinking that might have driven the USSR to infringe so violently upon the sovereignty of a state which, no matter what its political system, had been picked to act as the "Asiatic Finland." And they have to do with the outlook for detente at a particularly critical juncture in international relations arising from the simultaneous explosion of situations that had for too long been artificially clamped under tight lids. One more reason not to give up -- even in the teeth of an event so tragic as this one -- on the uses of sweet reason, because international relations are a very delicate blend of actions and reactions which a rash or divisive decision, no less than a misstep, can plunge into irreversible crisis.

Can Detente Survive Kabul

Florence POLITICA INTERNAZIONALE in Italian Feb 80 pp 5-10

[Article by Renato Sandri]

[Text] The military insurrection that toppled Daoud in April 1978 was in fact a "revolution from on high," confined to the urban perimeter and to small segments of society. Venturing outside the cities, the revolutionary process ran up against tooth-and-nail resistance of a religious and tribal nature, which further restricted the area of consensus. The factional strife within the Democratic People's Party opened the way for growing Soviet interference, culmination in the country's invasion. To save detente, Europe must refuse to get involved in the merits of the dispute and must offer itself as spokesman for the Third World countries anxious to break away from great-power hegemony and to be left in peace as they go about building a new international order.

The facts about the situation inside Afghanistan available to the observer who wants to understand the motivations -- relevant to that situation -- behind the Soviet intervention are far from complete, and yet they seem to be sufficient. Sufficient at least for a try at coming close that must be made: not merely an academic exercise, but an "operational necessity" in the face of the grave nature of that event and of the complexity of its consequences to every area of international relations.

The People's Democratic Party (PDP) government, born of the military and popular uprising of 27 April 1978 in Kabul, seized power in a republic which, in many areas, had been bogged down in national conditions -- social and cultural -- inherited from the monarchy stripped of power by Prince Daoud in 1973 with the bloodless ukase that turned Mohammad Zahir's Italian holiday to permanent exile. The monarchy had held the nation's international position in shaky balance since 1919, when Afghanistan was the first state to establish diplomatic relations with the infant Soviet Union, then proclaiming its neutrality during World War II, and lastly taking the initiative, among the five sponsoring countries, of the Belgrade Conference which in 1961 saw the birth of the non-aligned movement. At home, Zahir had started a timid reform in dress, ending the requirement that women wear the veil in 1959, and updating the country by means of 5-year plans beginning in 1957, whose end result was shattering shortages in 1971 and 1972, when about a million Afghans died (lack of irrigation infrastructures, drought, hunger, disease, etc.).

The first enormous problem the new republic had to cope with was that of making a nation of its inhabitants -- 18 million or so of them, of whom 55 percent were Pashtun, 25 percent Tajiks, and the rest were Uzbeks, Halzaras, Beluchis, and some 2 million were nomads: the Kochi. The choice of Pashtun (Afghan-Persian) as the nation's lingua franca and the primacy of the Pashtun ethnic group, backed up by the monarchy, marked the confines of the grouping, which remained fluid, prey to tensions and conflicts made even more intractable by their being part of a social structure at once heterogeneous and inflexible. Unwieldy traces of pre-feudal society, such as the nomadic shepherds, were part of the predominant feudal production relations in the rural areas, the owners of land and water which was channeled and sold to renters or small freeholders, along with the widespread practice of usury, extending over arable land that was in very scant supply, amounting to only 22 percent of the total. In the cities, embryonic capitalism was foundering in the fog of petty trade, an impoverished artisan class, and haphazard businesses, plus growing masses of a lumpenproletariat pouring into the cities from the rural areas. Its structures are typically bone-poor Third-World, with a single product for export

(the hides of millions and millions of karakul sheep, a.k.a. Persian lamb), and with a chilling fit into the parameters set forth by the UN for its list of the 29 "poorest countries" in the world: average yearly per capita income less than $100, industry's share of the GNP less than 10 percent, and an illiteracy rate of at least 80 percent of the population (actually the rate in Afghanistan is 92 percent).

The country had not been truly unified either by the monarchy or by such other institutions as the Jirga (a kind of senate made up of the highest-ranking notables), or the Grand Council consisting of more than 1,000 delegates from all parts of the country, from every province and every tribe; nor yet by the Pushtuwali (the unwritten law dating back to the dim, dark past which stipulates the rules of honor in peace and in war -- but the rules are those of the dominant ethnic group). The glue that held it together was Islam, practiced by 99 percent of the population -- the vast majority of them Sunni -- and in reality the bulwark of the unchanging and unchangeable order, with particular reference to woman's condition. And despite the legal abolition of the obligation to wear the veil, a dereliction from Koranic jurisprudence -- the shari'ah -- in force in other Islamic countries, the Afghan woman was deprived of all property rights, according to tribal custom, not to mention her subjection to polygamy, to imprisonment at hard labor, and illiteracy.

Daoud's regime was very swiftly brought to a halt by the immovable viscosity of this "social roadblock," the expression as it was of a low-level compromise between the old feudal sectors and the nascent urban bourgeoisie. Over the 5 years the efforts at reform petered out, while the country slowly drifted into Iran's sphere of influence, which the shah's paranoia was seeking to erect between Saudi Arabia and Pakistan into a pillar of imperialist domination of the Arabian Gulf and the Indian Ocean (look for instance at the plans and advance financing for the railroad that would have crossed the country to link Iran with Pakistan, as well as for a chain of airports, etc.).

From his quest for consensus, Daoud moved to repression of the progressive groups, even though they had supported the birth of the republic; among the hardest hit was the People's Democratic Party (better known as the Khalq Party) and the Parcham Party, both of them leaning toward Marxism, and subsequently merging to form the PDP, not to mention the straggly labor organizations in the towns. In early April 1978 the police shot down Amir Khyber, the Kabul labor leader, and went on to massacre more than 200 citizens during the protest demonstrations over the assassination and against the arrest of other labor leaders (among them Nur Mohammad Taraki). On 27 April, while Daoud, his family, and the presidential guard were put to the sword by the military uprising, a detachment of tanks and APCs was demolishing the walls of the prisons, and in the process freeing Taraki, who with the PDP took over national leadership.

Of course this was a military coup, but it was touched off in the midst of determined mass movements in the capital by groups with their roots in the PDP with its years-long history of clandestine operations: it was the specific driving force behind a "revolution from above," both by virtue of the urban setting for its explosion and by virtue of the features of the party itself. The party had surfaced in 1965, then split into two factions before getting back together on the eve of the insurrection. Its Parcham wing, headed by Babrak Karmal, had been concentrating primarily on winning adherents among the military (a good share of its officers were graduates of Soviet military schools), among civil servants, students, and intellectuals; one very active member of the party's leadership was Anahita Ratebzad, a prestigious lady who for years had been fighting for women's liberation. The Khalq Party, headed by Taraki and Hafizullah Amin, had done its recruiting not only among the petty bourgeoisie, but among activist worker nuclei, and had, albeit without much success, sought support among the poor peasants of the outlying provinces.

When you take over a government, your impact is not in the least diminished when you say that everything starts over with you, particularly in a backward and dependent country. And the new government did begin with a program that reasserted Afghanistan's position as a non-aligned nation, on the basis of its friendship -- not to say alliance -- with the USSR; in domestic policy the backbone of its program was agrarian reform, accompanied by two fundamental policy thrusts: one was equal social and legal rights for women, and the other was compulsory universal education.

On paper, this read like the program of a democratic, anti-feudal revolution; yet the first schism within the PDP, which set the Khalq wing against Parcham (with the ouster of B. Karmal, A. Ratzebad, and others from the government and their posting abroad as ambassadors in posts they quickly resigned to chose exile in Prague, Belgrade, and other socialist countries), above and beyond the rivalries which certainly had something to do with it, assuredly had its roots in the disagreement over the rate at which the revolution was to be stepped up; the winning side was the more radical, while those who lost were better attuned to the nation's "readiness" to accept revolutionary change.

As it ventured out of the cities the revolutionary process instantly ran up against resistance, which rose steadily all through the fall. First came the gusty winds from the South, stirred up by the Islamic movement in Iran; then friction begotten by the agrarian reforms of 1 January 1979 triggered furious agitation by the dispossessed landowners. Meanwhile such measures as the abolition of dowries for women or the new law requiring that they be taught to read and write, by flying in the face of thousands of years of the dominant culture, helped stir up feelings against all these "new ways," stirring up the boiling lava of instincts, of habits, and of the fiery preaching of the mullahs.

Afghanistan's food relations with the USSR -- as already noted -- dated from 1919 and had improved still further even in the final period of the monarchy. In that connection, one need only recall that U.S. "aid," which up to around 1966-67 had constituted around a third of all international "aid" received by Afghanistan, by 1969-70 had declined to 3 percent of the total, not so much in reflection of its absolute decline (although that happened, too) as by reason of the steep increase in Soviet "aid," which over those 2 years ran up to 70 percent of the overall total of international "aid."

However, with the advent of the new regime, not only did Soviet aid grow steadily more generous: it underwent a qualitative change, taking a hand even in handling current affairs (we are sticking here to known facts: consider the involvement of Soviet personnel in the tragic and ill-fated attempt to save the American ambassador to Kabul from the hands of Islamic extremists -- or provocateurs? -- who killed him in the spring of 1979). There are two different but convergent reasons behind that change: one was the weakness of the domestic revolutionary movement which was looking for practical help in Soviet support, along with models for action and ideological counsel; and the other was the USSR's interest in beefing up its own presence and control over this crossroads of the enormous region that had suddenly moved into a phase of destabilization.

This poured more oil onto the embers of the nationalist-religious coals that had begun to glow and which were manifest not so much in occasional outbursts of xenophobia directed at Soviet citizens, civilian or military, in bazaars here and there, but in far more massive form, particularly along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan. The border region, known as Pashtunistan, had been divided when Pakistan was founded along the so-called Durand Line. Afghanistan had never been reconciled to this amputation of its territory, and the Pashtun population living astride that artificial frontier had continued to take an active part in Afghan life. And yet, only a few months after the birth of the new regime, the irredentist movement reversed its signals, sucked in by pressures from the "Islamic republic" in Pakistan (while the same thing was happening, although to a lesser degree, to the southwest, in the Iranian-Afghan Khorasan border region).

There, all of a sudden, was Islam which in the crumbling of the ancient state-to-society relationship was shaping up as a potent factor in a unification movement transcending more than one frontier.

It is a matter of record that the area of consensus in the infant revolution began to shrink back from its initial perimeters, not to mention its initial potential; the response from the group running things in the new regime to guerrilla warfare in the mountains and to creeping paralysis afflicting the urban masses was a steady forward fugue: repression, radicalization of government measures, uncontrolled and painful "personality cult" around Taraki, and ceaseless showers of propaganda lauding socialist achievements. These were surrogate responses, quite out of touch with reality; the infighting within the PDP leadership, drained by never-ending purges, did the rest.

We remember Taraki at the Havana summit meeting of the nonaligned nations. He held the spotlight at the press conferences, but he looked and acted like a sleepwalker. He spoke of stability, of advancement, of victory -- and all the while even the least informed among the reporters sent word back home that he was already dead. There is little point here in going over the record of events in the period that followed, all too familiar to all in the actual facts surrounding its end (and equally obscure and impenetrable insofar as the behind-the-scenes drama is concerned). From the assassination of Taraki (just back from Havana and after his stopoff at Moscow airport where he was welcomed with the highest honors by top Soviet leaders) at Amin's instigation, to the extension of guerrilla control over a good share of the provinces, the only response to which the government was able to come up with was a plea -- quickly acceded to -- for a larger Soviet military presence and thence step by step to the intervention of the USSR expeditionary force, with the execution of Amin, the "hard-liner" who never let a day go by without some flattering reference to his Soviet ally and with the return to government (one of history's dirty tricks) of Babrak Karmal, Anahita Ratebzad, and the others who had been exiled as "opportunists" or "bourgeois nationalists."

What we have here is the chronicle of the gradual isolation and defeat of a revolution. Naturally, pressures and infiltration and support of all kinds for subversion were brought to bear in Afghanistan from Iran, from China, and most of all from Pakistan. But this is the inevitable lot of every revolution (today often with the "Chinese factor" thrown in as an extra). It's all part of the rules of the game, in this particular Afghan instance further restored to balance by the far more massive and not merely geographical contiguity of the USSR.

The "revolution from the top" on 27 April 1978 never managed to get beyond the Kabul city limits; on the contrary, it merely heightened the city-country conflict, owing to its inability to find the right ways and means and pace to launch the process of unifying and integrating the country behind the task of organizing real democracy and hammering out a national identity. Mass social mobilization slipped gradually under the hegemony of enemy forces; the revolution's lack of creativity and the internal strife that ripped and tore at its leadership, then that leader ship's retreat to the shelter of the USSR alliance as the prime guarantor of the process -- all of them combined to trigger the explosion of the endogenous causes (aside from the conflicts that had arisen out of foreign invasion) that led to the final collapse. Meanwhile, the Red Army's intervention, with the execution of Amin (who only a few hours after his bloody rise to the presidency had received the warmest of congratulations from the Soviet government) emerges as the end result of a commitment which, in the hellish cogs and wheels of events, gave the upper hand to the strategic factor, to reasons of state, right up to and including the occupation of Afghanistan. A slice of history, if you will; but was it also the heavy price of a revolution defeated so that the hope of one could be saved?

We are not even ready to venture a guess now as to whether that revolution, or some tenuous shred of it, might find expression in the Karmal government. Why? Because in the practical context of the regional situation, and in that of the no less troubled world situation, the occupation of Afghanistan turns out to be something quite different: the conquest and holding of a geopolitical outpost of tremendous importance to the socialist superpower, in the global confrontation that pits it against the capitalist superpower and its network of alliances.

Giuseppe Boffa (see UNITA, 13 January) quite properly reminded us of the Khrushchev-Bulganin trip to Afghanistan, India, and Burma in 1955, which touched off the "great policy" of detente, feasible just insofar as it might prove possible to find a toehold in the Third-World non-aligned movement (and this is where you will find those alliances with the "national bourgeoisies" of the nations just then emerging from their colonial past that took up so much time in the CPSU's 20th congress). We should like to add a reminder of the Tashkent Conference in 1966, while Kosyghin was chairman, which led to the peace between India and Pakistan and thereby marked one of the high points in the USSR's role vis-à-vis the Third World and, more generally, in active coexistence on an international scale.

Now that relations between the USSR and the Third World are running out of the scope and the specific objectives they had in those days, are those relations beginning to settle back into concepts and practice of "tightening the ranks?" And still another question arises out of the events in Afghanistan, which are unquestionably having serious impact on the non-aligned movement, coming on top of the countless centrifugal pressures to which they are subjected by imperialism (ranging from penetration by the multinational corporations to power-plays by medium-size nations like France, to official U.S. threats to OPEC. Is the menacing hint of dislocation in the nonaligned movement one more open clue to the collision course upon which the two superpowers are embarked (along with their respective systems of alliances) in the crisis that is shaking every corner of international relations, as the inevitable outcome of the very logic intrinsic to counterposed blocs?

Whatever the answers may be, here we see taking shape the tasks for us Europeans (not only in the EEC meaning); for us as the democratic forces in Europe, in government or in the opposition.

First of all, vis-à-vis the Third World. Down through the past 30 years the nations of the Third World, committed to the struggle against colonialism and neocolonialism for the conquest of their own political independence -- in the more radical forms thrust upon them by oppression -- which was objectively incompatible with the dominant system: help from the USSR which, proffered in the heat of competition between the rival social systems and politico-military blocs (which are one of its expressions), wound up begetting the bloc logic even in those countries, with all its inherent evils: rigidity, interference, and docile compliance with one model and one policy. (To see the process in action, just glance down the list of nations that voted either against or abstained from voting on the motion introduced on 14 January deploring the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan and calling for withdrawal of "foreign troops.")

And should such a country openly break out of the Soviet sphere, it either moves into or goes back into the U.S. sphere as a prime candidate to be used as the conflict between the superpowers starts to heat up again: just as Sadat's Egypt was in this tragic situation.

The Vietnamese people's battle, fought just to be their own masters and to speak and act for themselves, acquired as it went on extraordinarily broad autonomy; but the Sino-Soviet quarrel (I do not intend to go into its causes and dynamics here), eventually involving tormented Indochina, showed us how truly the big game in which the stakes are the peace and the future of the world is still one in which only two can play. Make that two plus one.

Between the two extreme wings wavers the "center" zone of the Third World -- and of the non-aligned movement -- torn at once between solidarity and alienation by its own internal and growing disparity, by the need for its "second independence," by the burden of its backwardness, by its need for the West, despite the blows the West has dealt it in the past and just recently -- from the aggression in Vietnam or the occupation of Santo Domingo to the strangulation of Unidad Popular -- and by its mindless greed that keeps digging the chasm between "development" and "underdevelopment" deeper and deeper.

Looking back over the past 30 years, particularly the most recent ones, we see how for Vietnam and, on the opposite front, for Egypt, not to mention the entire "central" area of the Third World, what has been missing is a sympathetic listener who would help them get out of the suffocating confines of the contest between the superpowers; who would restore practical content and hence validity to the original motives of the non-aligned movement, which emerged as an independent factor in international relations specifically to leave politico-military blocs behind, to foster the full unfolding of the dialectic between classes and nations into true independence, as well as into cooperation among nations. That sympathetic listener, that pole for diversification in the Third World's economic and political relations should have been Europe, and the sudden acceleration in the current crisis in Afghanistan (while the world's economy is in disarray owing to the "irresponsibility" of the dollar) is interfering with North-South and East-West relations alike, underlines with unmistakable force that it cannot go on missing the rendezvous, playing the idle onlooker, as it is, to the march of events governed by a logic whose inevitable outcome would be "the unthinkable."

These days there are leaders and groups listening to one another who until yesterday were leery of any revisionist, philistine, reformist talk, of any hint of a Europeanist discourse, who are calling now for "Europe's role" with the contrite fervor of activists in the dawning hours of the Federalist Movement. The fact of the matter is that we must not be misled. Western Europe today swings back and forth between subordination and squabbling, between resignation and awareness of its destiny, which would be crushed by cold war and by its divorce from the deepest needs and aspirations of the Third World.

Europe's democratic parties, in and out of government, must seek out the ground for understanding where they can turn a hand to building the new world economic order rooted in cooperation among equals. In Europe, its principal pole for dialogue with the Third World lies in furtherance in the West, according to whatever timetable the march of history may impose, of the transition from the culture based on the "American way of life" to another culture, one that would consume different goods and enjoy greater human wealth; one that would not allow every "opening" to the Third World to be more hypocrisy and more plundering in a new disguise. Inseparably linked with this effort -- and with all there is of immeasurable greatness linked with it in every area -- cultural, political, productive -- stands Europe's second fateful rendezvous, to which it is summoned by the tiny margin of time left for negotiations between the superpowers: that from the restoration of the minimum climate of trust and confidence it rise once again to the challenge of nuclear disarmament, to the abandonment of any perverse trend toward the creation of "axes" or "encirclements," and of the crude effectiveness of the usual responses to that sort of thing. There are only a few months between us and the Madrid Conference.

We have been alerted just recently to the fact that the very prospect for global coexistence is rooted in general principles: in respect for the sovereignty of states and in recognition of the United Nations as the supreme forum for negotiated solutions to international differences.

No less acute, though, as we measure the perilously narrow ridge along which the world is moving, is our perception of the need for every one of us to shout out his refusal to go down into either line of bunkers in the cold war. Should this not happen. the collision routes would eventually, perhaps very soon, proliferate out of all control. Clearly, that refusal must be translated from an ethical stand into positive political positions on the part of parties, social forces, and governments. This, though, iswhere we must start from, from a refusal to choose between trenches. And that is exactly where the world crisis seems, yet again, to be leading us.

Reform, Islam, Tribal Society

[Article by Giorgio Vercellin]

[Text] The author, a teacher in the Iranian and Afghan Affairs seminar at Venice University, argues that the reforms introduced by the Taraki government did not conflict with Islamic tradition or the people's religious beliefs, but were a response to widely felt social needs. Opposition to the regime was not motivated so much by religious issues as by ethnic and tribal quarrels. Refusal to accept the dominance of the ruling ethnic group by the other groups that make up the ethnic mosaic called Afghanistan, combined with opposition from the privileged classes, explains the gradual weakening of the revolution.

The year 1979 began in the Middle East with an event which unquestionably marked a turning-point in history: on 11 February the last of the "javidans," the "immortals" who formed the personal guard of Muhammad Reza Pahlevi, King of Kings and Light of the Aryans, surrendered to the people's revolt that had been going on for more than a year. At that moment, the embryo of the future Islamic Republic of Iran was born. Such a reversal, though it was a consummation devoutly wished by the Iranian people, seemed until a very short time ago, in the view of almost every international political commentator, a most unlikely eventuality.

The pundits based their predictions on a set of apparently sound assumptions: the immense wealth available to the shah and to his ruling class were adequate to fund development programs that would satisfy the needs of the population; the interests of the U.S., Japanese, and European corporations that had invested capital and were involved in local projects provided an umbilical cord for economic, cultural, and political exchanges between Iran, only now emerging from backwardness, and the developed world; furthermore, and most important, the geographical and strategic position of the country, allied with the West, on the border of the Soviet Union and in the richest oil-producing region in the world, made the shah seem untouchable, because his overthrow would be too traumatic and destabilizing at the global level.

Despite the initial reaction of dazed disbelief, however, Pahlevi's downfall did not give rise in the West to any major questions or attempts at analysis which might be, as the saying goes, equal to the situation. On the contrary, all, or almost all of them very swiftly settled on the "Islamic" factor in the revolt, while some even drew superficial parallels between the leader of a revolution that had the support of millions of Iranians, the Ayatollah Khomeyni, and Savonarola, as TIME magazine did in February last year. This certainly not accidental demonization of a new movement full of promise, purposely overlooked by the Western mass media, is still dominant in the most disparate forms which involve political forces on both the right and the left (1), and which continue to gain currency in a situation that is steadily deteriorating (or was it actually taken for granted from the outset that it would be?).

Then in 1979 there were other chances to observe that the problem of which the Iranian revolution was a factor, perhaps the most visible, could not be dismissed as merely an unforeseen and historically meaningless revival of Islamic fundamentalism. To any who cared to understand it was increasingly clear that in relations among states we were in a crucial phase, at a turning-point and a redefinition of reciprocal relations.

To add to this already complicated picture of conflicting tensions came the USSR's December military intervention in Afghanistan. Immediately the commentators began scurrying about for more or less pro- or anti-Soviet explanations, either kind, of course, still seen primarily through the prism of the two blocs taking advantage of one another to move into the "grey areas." These analyses, though -- which might have contained some portion of the truth -- are obviously inadequate to respond to all the variables moving across the Middle East chessboard.

In fact events over the past few months force us once again and in increasingly unavoidable fashion to look at and deal with the world of today from a lay point of view, free from any ideological prejudice and from any preconceived notions. This holds true particularly for those who for the last several decades have at least shared in the management of international power. We must, in other words, reread carefully and perhaps a bit self-critically the record of events hitherto dismissed out of hand as unimportant, once and for all jettisoning that bogey now conjured up by everybody (perhaps to exorcize it) known as "Eurocentrism."

Islamic Tradition and Revolution

One of the prime requisites for reaching that goal is the most accurate and thorough knowledge of the individual realities in the process of change. To do this, for example, it is wrong to perceive in Islam alone the driving motive behind everything happening in the area, let alone reading the Islamic phenomenon from a schizoid angle. In Iran, it is indeed painted as the vector element in all that is most backward, reactionary, regressive, and xenophobic, while in Afghanistan it is protrayed as the bulwark of respect for healthy primitive traditions and customs against the godless reforms of a regime in alien bondage. And yet for the media people, who see opposition to the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan as consisting of "Islamic guerrilla fighters" warring against the anti-Muslim measures promulgated by the Kabul government, such as abolition of the dowry, it would be enough simply to read Decree number 7, readily available in English (2), to realize that nothing of the sort is in fact going on.

Then there is the fact that, even before getting down to the heart of the matter, we must bear in mind the meaning of the issue in Afghanistan, with at least a touch of historical perspective: for many men of modest income, the dowry (it would be more accurate to call it the price the groom pays to the bride's family) used to mean, because of the large amount of money involved, enforced celibacy that could last to age 40 or 50, if not longer. In a country ranked by the United Nations among the 29 poorest in the world, this writer was told in the Kabul bazaar that a Hazara or Turkoman woman would cost 300,000 or 400,000 afghani, which is something like 7-8 million lire. A Kabul bricklayer then earned around 60 afghani a day (1,200 lire): clearly, for him to contemplate spending that kind of money meant he was absolutely forced to go into debt, if he could. For this reason the issue had already been considered in various ways by other rulers, but never to any practical end.

One of the first acts of Nur Mohammad Taraki's government after it took power with the coup d'etat on 27 April 1979 was precisely in that direction (perhaps partly owing to the work done in the women's rights field by Anahita Ratebzad, then minister for social affairs, and back in the Kabul government today along with the other members of the Parcham group). True, the dowry decree does prohibit the sale "in exchange for money or goods" of any woman (Article 1): specifically, though, it is Article 3 that deals with the marriage gift, the one we actually call the dowry, which is sanctioned for Muslims by the Koran itself, which says: "Freely shall ye give women dowries" (Koran, LV,4). It is, in Islamic canon law, a "God-given right," making it a fundamental part of the social order which cannot be waived. And in fact the policy laid down by the Kabul leaders had carefully avoided violating that principle, relying instead -- and theirs was a strategy we shall encounted again elsewhere -- on the elbow-room provided by Islamic jurisprudence itself. Since, unlike other instances, neother the Koran nor the sunna, the "body of tradition," stipulates any economic definition of the size of the dowry, the RDA lawmaker took advantage of the law's silence. The decree sets a limit on the dowry, an act which is, Islamically speaking, the clear right of any ruler, and for which many precedents may be found in similar governmental measures both ancient and modern.

Briefly, what the government did was to set 300 afghani as the upper limit of the dowry or bride-price -- a sum within the reach of any citizen. In so doing, and in keeping within the most complete and unimpeachable compliance with Islamic law, against which neither canon judges nor mullahs could adduce logical argument or pertinent precedent, the new regime made it practically possible for anybody to marry. Clearly in some cases this decree had what might be called unfortunate results: for families with a lot of daughters, it meant a net loss of capital. But over and against such cases stand the spectacularly opposite cases of families blessed with many sons, not to mention those of a lot of men (and somen) who can now see their way to forming a family without going into debt for the rest of their lives.

Be that as it may, it did avoid a different danger, and this was something the RDA leadership perhaps had in mind, once again to dodge giving any practical pretext for attack by the religious conservatives. I am referring to the risk that, with the bride-price fallen so low there might be a rise in cases of polygamy (the decree says not a word about that).

The same argument holds, even more specifically, with regard to agrarian reform. Afghanistan, like most of the developing countries, is a predominantly agricultural state; even in 1975 85 percent of the population lived in some 10,000 villages, four fifths of which with less than 500 inhabitants, with no links whatever to the outside world -- if we except mule-drivers and transistor radios. There are very few big landowners, while most lesser freeholders had farms too small to support a family, no matter that Afghanistan's farmlands are potentially good.

Furthermore, in the years just prior to the April 1978 coup, the situation had deteriorated markedly, partly as a result of the 1970-1971 famine which, according to FAO, brought death to more than 500,000 people, partly because of the use of tractors and other mechanical devices to bring land under cultivation but which only the richest farmers could afford, and partly because of the constant shrinkage in plot sizes owing to repeated land division for purposes of inheritance.

When Taraki took to the radio on 9 May 1978 to announce the broad outlines of RDA policy, he gave first place to "completion of democratic land reforms, in the interests of the workers on the land and with their active participation." A few months later came ammouncement of the legislation that would do this: here again, as had been hinted, the lawmaker had tried to forestall any pretext for criticism from religious quarters. In fact, one of the law's articles provided that "no family may own more than 30 giarib of prime land or its equivalent" (Art. IV).

As we know, the life of every Muslim true believer is governed by five duties which he must perform to prove that he truly belongs to the Muslim community, and which are indispensable but not sufficient to his soul's salvation. Among these five duties is almsgiving, which is the canonical tithe paid by the believer on all he possesses, by means of which an ordinary tax is replaced by a religious obligation which enables the entire community to perceive itself as a whole in its institutional patterns. There is nothing more sacred than such "almsgiving," no obligation more binding on a Muslim. However, according to Islamic jurisprudence, it must be given only by those who can give or, as we would put it, only those with the "minimum tax liability": this is the nisab mentioned in the Afghan agrarian reform act. In introducing this concept, the RDA lawmaker showed his sensitivity to the religious aspects of the issue, in that, by allowing ownership of the minimum required for almsgiving, he was guaranteeing that every true Muslim would have the means to fulfill his own spiritual life.

But there is more: lay society calls for sacrifice only upon those who are also bound by the demands of the religious society, placing no burden upon those who are considered "poor" by both. And here we have what looks like a paradox, if we look at it from the usual approach of the western pundits: the lay Afghan leaders showed that they were far more in sympathy with indigenous (Islamic) feelings than the "intransigent" propounders of the constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran were to do. What they did in fact, as grounds for the shari'ah (cf. note 6) deduction on the basis of the ijtihad or reasonable procedure, feel the need -- unjustified by anything except western acculturation -- to cite as remedy a latter-day "supplement" to that ijtihad to wit: "utilization of the latest in science, technology, and experience, and of whatever is designed to improve them."

In my view, this clearly indicates extreme care on the part of the Taraki regime in dealing with the whole corpus of problems that add up to Islam in its juridical and legal aspects. In short, this was no "godless" government, but an ordinary "laic" regime striving to force the religious strata in Afghan society to come to terms with itself on the grounds of practical choices. And that laic position was decidedly modern and far more advanced even than the one tested or implemented in the "Islamic" republics of the USSR (which, by comparison with countries like Iran, Libya, or Pakistan, are not, from the legislative point of view, "Islamic" at all any more).

If these were then the "religious" aspects of the agrarian reform law, the technical side of it looked just as sound. In a debate on the theory of agrarian reform (5) an English scholar argued that "the question of feasibility demands a bottom limit on the size of farmland holdings," and that therefore "it is better to give small landowners enough land to provide them with a decent living rather than to turn the landless peasants into mini-freeholders without a chance of making even a subsistence living." Furthermore, this same savant suggested that a 5 to 1 ratio between the maximum allowable (in land grants) and the subsistence level (for a single nuclear family) would cushion the impact on large landholders who are also good farmers, and would give the farmers in general no incentive to stick with inadequate habits of husbandry."

This writer is in no position to make a critical judgment between such arguments: this does not conflict with the fact that they sound to him like views with facts and figures to back them up. sound, and worthy of sharing. And positions of this kind were taken into consideration in shaping Afghanistan's agrarian reform act, whose Article 3 in facts provides that every family shall have the right to own "no more than 30 giarib of prime farmland, while Article XII stipulates that "to every person having the right and to his family land shall be granted free of charge according to the following procedures" etc. Article XXIV, which sets down the levels of priority for land grants, gives top priority to "landless peasants or smallholders who work the land to be distributed [and to] landless peasants and smallholders whose lands have been taken by the government under condemnation procedings."

A problem often encountered by governments that have launched agrarian reforms has been the choice of deeds upon which to base grants; this hurdle of course sprang up before the RDA leaders, too, since they had no registry of deeds to refer to because the previous regimes had kept none. This is why, in the enabling regulations for Decree number 8 on land (meaning the agrarian reform act) considerable space is devoted to property deeds. Once again, we must admit the groundlessness of the allegations that the Afghan People's Democratic Party (PDPA) had strayed from existing tradition. Article IX of the enabling legislation says, in fact: "property deeds shall include: 1) governmental and ministerial decrees and bills of sale of government property...; 2) shari'ah records of sale, transfers of ownership, and inheritance...; 3) tax records...; 4) records in customary law..." As you can see, in status the Islamic records and deeds come second only to government acts and ahead of administrative action, and their religious nature is reemphasized again in the clause in Article X stating that [administrative actions] must, in order to be valid, be "recorded with the Court of the Cadi." Not does it affect the opinion stemming from the final limitation, which provides that "the person holding title (shari'ah title) as of the date of issuance up to the date when said title is produced, or a year prior to that date, shall have paid taxes [thereon]", inasmuch as a like provision applies to all property deeds, be they Islamic, civil, or customary.

Yet further evidence of the good will and care devoted by the RDA leaders to dealing with the problem of altering economic and social relationships in the rural areas came, in fact, from the publication in September 1978 (3 months prior to promulgation of the agrarian reform act) of the model charter for cooperatives, whose aim was to "organize small landowners, improve agricultural production, raise the social consciousness of the peasants, elevate the standard of living for the gallant and noble classes that labor in the fields and eliminate feudal-style relationships dating back to the Middle Ages" (Article I). This is not the place for a critical examen of the content of this model charter for cooperatives. Nevertheless, using only the brief excerpts from it quoted here, it seems clear to me that the RDA government had drafted a reform plan which was not utopian or demagogic -- the kind that too often emerges from regimes that have come to power through a coup d'etat and who thereafter go searching for mass support from the people; rather, it looks to me like a plan that could be the start to practical solutions to the problems of the peasants.

Only trouble is -- the plan never got off the ground. There were numerous reasons: the difficulties in implementing it in almost inaccessible regions, where the old landowners often stirred up the peasants against the government agents, many of whom were actually killed; there was a bitterly hard winter in 1978-79, which destroyed the harvest at a particularly critical time; and, most of all, the lack of the required capital. Aggravating this last factor, and multiplying its effects were the problems ignited by Decree number 6, the first act of the new government in the economic area, which abolished both mortgages and usury.

This, mark you, was a practice harshly condemned in Islam, although it was widely practiced (through solutions we should call "jesuitical") -- so widely that in the early Seventies an expert studying the country's agricultural situation wrote that "the mullahs would find in this (the fight against usury) a good pretext for declaring a holy war, rather than inveighing against miniskirts or hurling anathemas at the few inns that dispense alcoholic beverages." (7) This does not alter the fact that in the socio-economic structure of the Afghan village, this kind of loan, even at very long term, did perform a useful function in that it was a way for the poor peasants to find seed-money for their annual planting, and also the wherewithal to put food on the family table in cases of extreme need. After the ban on usury this form of credit -- illegal but a realistic response to local realities -- suddenly disappeared, to be replaced, in the PDPA plan, by cooperatives. Unfortunately, the RDA's economic and political situation right then made it impossible for the government to solve the peasants' problems.

The Roots of Guerrilla Warfare

All of this was of course aggravated by the guerrilla war that called itself "Islamic." As far back as the Twenties, the experiments at reform tried by King Amanullah (1919-1929) were violently cut short by an insurrection brandishing "Islamic" slogans against the king's "godless" measures. The fact is, as recent research has proved (8), that then, as now, the fight was mounted to keep economic and political power in the hands of certain groups (tribes, landowners, religious leaders) who opposed the changes that curtailed their hitherto free hand.

The clue to the continuity between the events of 1929 and what we are seeing today is provided, physically, by the presence at the head of the rebellion of descendants of the leaders of 60 years ago: we find among those who rose up from the start against the Kabul government such dignitaries as Sibqatollah Mogiaddadi, president of the National Front for the Salvation of Afghanistan (FNSA), a descendant of Hazrat-e-Saheb of Shor-Bazar. His ancestor was a religious leader who, after escaping from the Soviet Union where he had fought in the anti-communist uprising of the Basmaci, had settled at Jalalabad (one of the areas in which the anti-RDA resistance is most active today), where he quickly won himself fame, veneration, and large estates. In 1929, he even threw in with his country's traditional foes, the English, and successfully fomented the tribes and the most conservative strata of the Afghan population to revolt against the sovereign's reforms which -- here again -- threatened his political and economic power far more than it did religious orthodoxy.

As for the opposition forces ranged against the Kabul government right now -- since the Soviet military intervention and the consequent higher level of attention on the part of the international media to developments in the area -- we hear that there is a merger afoot among various and sundry movements (nobody seems to know precisely how many: TIME magazine sets the number at 60, no less (9). This is hardly a recent trend, inasmuch as in the 2 years that have elapsed since the April 1978 coup d'etat there has been one merger after another under one unified command after another, just as there has been one split after another. The reasons behind all of this are numeerous; first of all, ethnic and tribal feuds, which -- as we shall see -- severely hamper the Kabul government, are visible in the ranks of the opposition as well. For instance, there is the Afghan Islamic Union (Jami'yat -e-Eslami, or UIA), said to be led by Seyyed Rabbani, which apparently is made up exclusively of Pashtun, the majority group that for 2 centuries held power in Afghanistan. Then there are the people who speak Dari (Afghani Persian, the mother tongue of a good many ethnic groups and widely used as an inter-ethnic lingua franca), who are to be found in the Afghan Islamic Party (PIA or Hezb e Eslami) head by Muhammad Nabi, who some observers say -- but cannot prove -- has ties with the Muslim Brotherhood in Pakistan.

In addition to this first element, and to social distinctions (many refugees are peasants fleeing from the food shortage due in part to the failure of agrarian reform and in part to the very inclement harvest season, who find themselves sharing the lot of rich landowners and religious leaders who managed to get part of their wealth out in time and are now, on top of all that, speculating in foreign aid materials), there are still further subdivisions caused by the conflicting goals of the individual groups: the UIA seems to want a republic along the lines of the Iranian one, and the PIA hopes for the return of King Zahir, overthrown by Daoud's coup d'etat in 1973; and then the FNSA "is trying to create an economic and social order consistent with the Islamic concept of social justice." There is of course no lack of mutual accusations of collusion with the enemy, who is not necessarily identified either with Kabul or with the Soviets: frozen out of a very recent -- perhaps the nth merger was the Islamic Revolution Movement (Enqelab-e Eslami) because it was accused of being "in contact with the CIA." (10)

These groups, running on religious slogans, are not the movements really active in the fight against the RDA: in it as well are pro-Chinese and Marxist-Leninist groups, like Setam-e Melli (Oppression of the People). As for the former, active in the country since the Sixties with the Shol'e-ye Giavid (Eternal Flame) group, they were split into two or three factions, one of which collaborated with the Muslim Brotherhood, to the point where, as early as April of last year, Indian sources, picked up by Moscow and Kabul as well, were reporting that guerrilla fighters were getting training on Chinese territory, and that among them were 200 Muslim Brotherhood warriors. It is more than likely that now, under pressure from Peking, the pro-Chinese groups have got together again and are strengthening their ties with the Islamic movements.

Setam-e Melli, though, is a group that surfaced after a split in the ranks of the PDPA itself at the end of the Sixties: back in 1975 they put together an uprising, quickly put down, in the Badakhshan region, where even now the fiercest fighting is centered, and they were also accused by the Kabul government of responsibility for the February 1979 kidnaping of U.S. Ambassador Dubs, ending in his death, with the cutoff of U.S. economic aid to Afghanistan and deteriorating relations between the White House and the Kremlin, and were under suspicion of direct involvement in the tragic conclusion of that episode. Setam-e Melli says it is Marxist-Leninist, its main article of faith is that "the main conflict in Afghanistan is not class conflict, but conflict among nationalities," and it denounces the PDPA as "an agent of Pashtun hegemony." From this position stems its practical coincidence of interests with Peking, which has always viewed the problem of Pashtunistan (the region the English colonials split into Palkistan and Afghanistan and in which the great majority of Pashtuni live, as a tool devised by Moscow to dismember its own ally in the area, the Islamabad government.

Still another element can be attached to the "religious" rebels and the political groups already mentioned in the ongoing struggle against the Kabul government, although coming from quite another direction: I mean the tribes. What they are actually doing is taking advantage of existing tensions to reassert their own autonomy with regard to any central government (Kabul today, but tomorrow it might just as well be Islamabad, should they feel threatened from there) and also to capture more modern weapons than the ancient Enfield rifles they captured from the English in 1839 and in later conflicts.

In view of all this, it is altogether natural that when the RDA government launched its reform program, the situation immediately radicalized. It could hardly be otherwise, given the fact that at the same time there was a heating up in the never-settled conflict we just mentioned between any central government seeking to impose its authority and the centrifugal forces of a tribal society whose life-style requires total freedom from any domestic ties. Actually, the tribes rose up at the very time when they became aware of the fact that the new regime in Kabul, owing to weakness connected with its internal stabilization, with the troubles encountered in implementing the reforms, and with the problems created by alien forces, could not maintain control (except in the very random fashion it had been trying to do so) over the outlying areas. However, I would stress once again, this came about in response to reasons of tribal policy, not because of religious issues.

I referred earlier to the problems stemming from the variety of ethnic and linguistic groups. Since 1747, when the chiefs of the Pashtun confederation of the Durrani declared their autonomy of the Persian kingdom of Nadir Shah Afshar, who after centuries had reunified the territories of what is now Afghanistan, whatever government sits in Kabul has been run either by Pashtun or by Pathans, also known simply but incorrectly as Afghani. These people, who live mainly in the eastern and southern regions of the country (as well as in the northwest province of Pakistan known as Pashtunistan) are nomads organized into tribes, with an agricultural-pastoral culture they feel beyond comparison with that of the sedentary Tajiks who live in Herat and in the other areas bordering on Iran.

These people, who make up the second largest ethnic group in Afghanistan, feel toward the nomadic herdsmen the mistrust and condescension they would show toward anybody with no fixed address, and reputed to live a primitive or backward life and suspected of religious laxity into the bargain. Mutual hostility is further deepened by the fact that the Tajiks for centuries have played a major economic role in trade between the towns and the country districts, whereas of recent years Afghanistan's rulers have given preference in the foreign trade that has been taking on increasing importance in local life with the hated Pashtuni.

Nor is that all: during the Sixties, for instance, the experts sent out by the international organizations were utilized mainly in the capital or in the Pathan zones where development projects were under way, whereas in the Tajik city of Herat, even though it is in the middle of an oasis with tremendous agricultural potential, there were only four foreign technical experts.

Nor is this merely a recent state of affairs: back in 1863, a Hungarian traveler wrote that "never has any ruler or conqueror been so loathed by the inhabitants of Herat as the Pashtun; in a region where they are called upon to play a major role, these Afghans have made themselves the objects of hatred. This is why the people of Herat would immediately plunge once again into a desperate struggle rather than recognize Afghan supremacy." (11)

So here, in my view, unlike what is taking place along the Pakistani border, is where the underlying cause of the rebellions that have occurred in the western regions of Afghanistan lies: now, just as it did a year ago, when in March 1979 a rebellion swept the city of Herat and was strangled in blood. This is above and beyond other factors, which unquestionably have been accumulating steadily (provocation on the part of the Tehran regime; occasional anti-Soviet feeling -- which in any case was not very widespread in the country; revolt against agrarian reform and the other decrees; pro-Shiite and anti-Sunni religious sympathies spreading beneath the surface throughout the area), but which were only the detonator for hostility already centuries old. What I mean to say is that the uprising last March, like the tensions still running high along the Iranian border, where most of the people are Tajiks, was simply but tragically the outbreak of popular hostility not so much directed against the RDA as -- above all -- against Pashtun domination, however historically represented.

Proof of this can be found in the very pattern of last year's revolt: insofar as we know, and unlike the situation on the Pakistani border, the rebels here sought no aid from any quarter, and were supported by no one (possible Iranian intervention was not absolutely decisive, nor have there ever been reports of the formation in Iran of organizations of exiles from Herat comparable to those active in Peshawar), nor yet have they indicated any desire to join with Iran or of wanting to form a "Greater Khorasan" (the geographical region which historically included the city of Herat, the city of Mashhad in Iran, and the town of Marv in the Soviet Union) as an independent entity.

The March 1979 uprising in Herat came about despite the RDA's leaders' having taken a series of steps in favor of ethnic minorities in a radical break with the policies of previous rulers. Those governments had always given privilege of place to the Pashtun language, despite the fact that the latest constitutions (those of 1964 and 1977) declared Dari an official language as well, but totally omitted any mention of all the other languages (no fewer than 34) spoken in the country. Only 3 weeks after the 27 April 1978 coup d'etat, the RDA government gave the"(relevant) ministries a mandate to begin broadcasting programs in the Uzbek, Turkoman, Baluchi, and Nuristani languages and to introduce the cultures of all the tribes and nations of our one land, our beloved Afghanistan." Nor were these early measures the only ones: magazines in the various languages were published; an Academy of Science was opened in which there were provisions made for the various minorities; textbooks were printed (initially only in Turkoman and Baluchi).

In short, contrary to all allegations in the foreign press, the RDA's action during the early days of its power was aimed at implementing measures designed to help the social strata and the social and ethnic groups that had been most underprivileged heretofore and also, because of that, the easiest prey to the influence of the conservative sectors. But who were the RDA's leaders? Who made up the cadres of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan?

A Party Divided

Alone among all the states sharing borders with the Soviet Union, in which, after 1917, "a mixture of refugees, students, prisoners of war, and emigrant workers succeeded in forming organizations under the tutelage and inspiration of the Russian revolution, no communist party was created in Afghanistan during the Twenties," partly because "there was no point, for the Bolsheviks, in setting up a separate Afghan communist party (in that) their main concern was ... to consolidate relations with Amanullah, who ruled the only country in the world that was willing, in those days, to cooperate with the Bolsheviks." (12). This did not mean that various "leftist" movements of one kind or other have not always been active in the country, particularly in the late forties, when for the first time some of the RDA's leaders-to-be, including Taraki and Karmal, emerged upon the national scene.

The official birth of a progressive, pro-communist movement in Afghanistan is usually dated as 1 January 1965, when the PDPA was founded. Its advent must of course be viewed within the context of the Afghan situation at the time: just the year before, a new constitution had been promulgated in order to lay down the guidelines for more up-to-date national development and for political integration of the new classes emerging as the fruit of Daoud's work during the previous December (the military, the bureaucrats, teachers, import-export dealers, and the like).

In that basic law of the land provision was made, for the first time in Afghan history, for political parties: that meant that the PDPA was part of a general trend in offering progressives a channel for voicing their own demands.

There is no record of the identities and numbers of those who came together in the semi-official PDPA (since King Zahir never got around to issuing the enabling regulations for the 1965 constitution). Other clues would indicate, however, that its size was by no means small -- by Afghan standards, of course (but in any case its membership was confined to intellectual and urban middle-class circles).

There is, however, one major problem in connection with the PDPA in the causes and extent of the differences between the Khalq (People) faction, headed by Taraki, and the Parcham (Banner) faction under Karmal. On the basis of material available in the West it is not possible, for the time being, to grasp the practical motivation that led in 1967 to the split (probably only at the summit, and in any case a relative thing, since we do know that the two factions worked together even afterwards), or above all what their relations were with the Daoud regime (it would appear that Khalq backed him only at the outset, whereas Parcham was actually part of the governing group, but was ousted from it for good in 1975). Nor is it clear whether the USSR ever expressed or indicated a preference for one faction over the other: outright support would seem, however, to be ruled out, in that the Kremlin preferred, for so long as possible, to deal directly with the governing leaders in Kabul. Only after 1976-77 did it become clear that Daoud was growing increasingly dependent on the shah of Iran (who had not only promised tremendous amounts of financial aid -- which was never forthcoming -- to Afghan development, but had used his influence in Kabul to the point that members of Savak -- the Iranian secret police -- were serving in the Afghan army); only at this juncture, then, does there seem to be specific direct Soviet intervention in connection with the PDPA (which in July 1976 "officially" reunited).

And so it was that in April 1978, when the coup came that overthrew Daoud, and everywhere you looked the symptoms of the impending revolution were rife in the pervasive bloody uprisings, the first RDA government embraced both Parcham and Khalq members. That collaboration was not long-lived, however. In July of that same year Taraki ordered a purge, in the course of which he sent several Parchami -- including Karmal and Ratebzad -- out of the country as ambassadors.

To go into the details of occurrences in Afghanistan during the months that followed, illuminating though it might be, is most assuredly impossible: in brief, it may be said that while the "out" faction went underground and refused to return home even when Taraki ordered them to do so in August of 1978, just as news broke of the discovery of a conspiracy (this, according to a number of commentators, handily providing Moscow with a second team should Taraki's programs fail) the domestic political situation centered, in the opening months of 1979, on the split between the RDA president and his prime minister, Hafisullah Amin. Amin has been fingered by some observers as the government's strong man, more pro-Soviet than his rival: the one thing that is certain, though, is that when reunification between the warring factions was under way, he was the one entrusted with the job of political activity inside the army, which since the Fifties had been commanded by cadres trained in the USSR, and hence conditioned to accept a message along the PDPA's progressive lines. While he was engaged in this task, Amin must have made intimate contacts with certain military circles which were subsequently to serve him well: unequivocal proof of this can be found in the fact that the one and only PDPA member who was not arrested by Daoud's police on the eve of the 1978 coup d'etat was -- Amin.

Be that as it may, Amin's shady dealings seemed to be matter for concern in 1979 for the Soviets as well. On his way home from Havana where he had been a delegate to the Conference of Non-Aligned Nations, Taraki stopped off in Moscow where he was granted an audience with Brezhnev: rumor had it, even before the recent Soviet intervention, that Amin's banishment and the return home of Karmal and his group were decided upon at that meeting. Karmal was being recalled to support Taraki, who still enjoyed some support in the Kremlin, partly because the problems it had encountered there had proved more serious than anticipated. The catch was, though, according to these same sources, that Amin had got wind of the fact, while he was setting up Taraki's overthrow, just a few days before he returned home. Clearly, this contretemps not only gave rise to considerable irritation in the Kremlin at the elimination of a leader it had just lately pinned considerable faith on, but also at the need to review its own Afghan programs. There you have the "Afghan" motives for the Soviet intervention, which, in my view, cannot be adequately explained either in the strength of the guerrilla forces (the Kremlin was already providing the Afghan army with ample supplies of weapons and advisers) or in Kabul's economic woes (it is much harder now to provide food as aid to Afghanistan than it was before, when there were no United States restrictions on grain sales). Any reading of events must perforce turn at this point to the global options of the superpowers, and their "need," in the void left by the fall of the Iranian keystone, to redefine the boundaries of their respective areas of influence.

'Normalized' Revolution

Florence POLITICA INTERNAZIONALE in Italian Feb 80 pp 21-28

[Article by Claudio Moffa]

[Text] The roots of the conflict are to be sought in the Democratic People's Party, split from its beginning in 1965 into a moderate, pro-Soviet wing, known as Parcham, and a radical wing, the Khalq, which was internationally independent, and headed by Taraki and Amin. Long story of internal feuding and the clash between the two lines. The Islamic guerrilla war and its function in the strategy of the dispossessed interests. Soviet intervention put a stop to the radical turn taken by Amin's guidance of the revolution and returned the moderate Karmal to power.

Overwhelmed by the tidal wave of dispatches filed on the varying fortunes of the war and by the reams of commentary on the actual or assumed strategies of the superpowers in southern Asia and the Middle East, the overthrow of Hafizullah Amin, Afghanistan's president from 16 September to 27 December 1979, and member of the central committee of the PDP since its founding, went almost completely unnoticed, as if it had been a minor "incident" in what the Soviets had been up to in the midst of their massive intervention in Afghanistan. And yet, it is our opinion that in that sudden change at the summit lies one of the principal keys for understanding the complex and sanguinary game the Soviet superpower is putting together in the area, with its eye not so much on Afghanistan as on neighboring Iran with its latent civil war; and for understanding, on the other hand, the U.S. reaction against a Soviet military presence in Kabul dating back, although in far smaller dimensions, long before 27 December 1979 (not to mention those economic ties of much older vintage).

Just who was Amin, who is now branded by Soviet propaganda and by the new Afghan government -- Stalinism dies hard -- as "an agent of imperialism" and a "mass murderer"? What sort of quarrel set him against his successor Babrak Karmal, leader of the PDP's Parcham faction?

While available material on Afghanistan is scanty([1]), it is adequate to provide fairly exhaustive answers to these questions. The People's Democratic Party (PDP) was founded on New Year's Day 1965, the day when a whole string of Afghan intellectuals -- including Amin, Karmal, and other such lesser lights as Dastagir Pandjsheri, Akbar Khaybar, and Sherai Giawgezani -- got together in Kabul at the home of Mohammad Taraki to hammer out the policy foundations for the nascent organization. With its eye on a monarchy that had enjoyed Stalin's open support through the Twenties and that still maintained not unfriendly relations with the Soviet Union in the context of the region's geopolitical balance, the PDP went on record with the statement that it was too soon to abolish the crown, at least "in this phase of the nation's development"; but at the same time it took a stance against feudalism, calling for the abolition of large land-holdings and for agrarian reform that would redistribute the land among the destitute peasants.

These economic goals were a natural part of the "nationalist democratic revolution, the first and necessary phase in the socialist revolution" typical of all revolutionary processes in the emergent world.

Yet it was on precisely this point, on the interpretation to be placed upon the "nationalist democratic" phase of the revolutionary process, that, a scant year later, brought the first open dissent among the leadership and set off the first split in the PDP. Arrayed on one side was the minority Parcham (Banner) wing headed by Babrak Karmal, who argued for what amounted to a moderate interpretation: all the anti-feudal classes on a footing of equality, around a program of cautious, "modernizing" reform. On the other side was the Khalq (People) faction, led by Taraki and Amin, advocating a more radical strategy, symbolized by the postulate of hegemony for the working class over the rest of the democratic and anti-feudal united front as it already existed and as it would develop. In view of the fact that the working class in Afghanistan was and is practically non-existent, this statement of principle was to be understood as a more resolute and muscular leadership of the anti-feudalist movement on the part of the party which -- as a Marxian-inspired group -- was the true repository of the proletarian ideology.

The basic strategic difference was reflected later on in other aspects of the political line. At the level of internatonal alignment Parcham was always identified as the pro-Soviet component of Kabul's revolutionary intelligentsia; the Khalq faction under Taraki and Amin, on the contrary -- and never mind the countless gross inaccuracies in the Western media after Daoud was overthrown in 1978 -- held firmly to "by common recognition, an independent position." (2) This is not to say that Khalq was not part, root and branch, of the "Soviet-Leninist" tradition in its ideological and policy sense, which rejected the Mao-Lin Piao strategy of war by the country people: a tiny splinter of Khalq was openly pro-Chinese, and argued that the rural areas should be the strategic center of revolutionary action; its members broke with Taraki and Amin in 1968, but never did manage to rally any serious mass following. (3)

Khalq and Parcham had their differences, too, on the practical action level: while Khalq urged a complete break with middle- and upper-middle class circles, to which most of its members belonged, and directed its mass work toward the lower classes in the capital and in the outlying rural areas, Parcham -- which was not idly dubbed the "communist monarchical party" by its foes -- was preaching infiltration of the feudal state apparatus, including the military hierarchy. In this connection it should be remembered that the royal army's officer corps had traditionally been trained in the military schools of the neighboring Soviet Union.

Behind these strategic and practical differences, too, there are those who perhaps rightly see the stamp of Karmal's and Taraki's personalities: Karmal, son of an army general, came from a rich and influential family; Taraki was a child of poverty (a Pathan tribe, the Ghizlai clan), who had to work his way through school.

The Parcham-Daoud Alliance (1973-77)

At first events seemed to prove Parcham right: although it had always espoused the more cautious position in the PDP as to the type of regime and the monarchy-republic option, Karmal's faction suddenly and unexpectedly found itself with an edge over the rival Khalq faction when in 1973 the "Red Prince" Daoud took power, announcing major reforms that were to change the face of the country, and the creation -- more or less in line with Parcham's own program -- of a "broad front of all nationalist, progressive, and patriotic forces."

Daoud's experiment, however -- in which Parcham had a first-hand part with major positions in the ministries and in the civil service in general -- soon proved a failure: the promised democratic elections would never be held. Further, the quasi-traditional option of non-alignment in foreign policy seemed shaken when Daoud paid a visit to neighboring Iran, eliciting an indignant protest from Parcham. The understanding with the shah, most important of all, involved some watering down of Kabul's claims to Beluchistan, which it had claimed from neighboring Pakistan for longer than anyone remembered. Above all, as a close relative of the deposed monarch, the prince could not find it in his heart to break with the landowning class: that meant that the argarian reform plans boiled down to a little "green revolution" with disastrous consequences, which, combined with the effects of the world economic crisis, further impoverished the already bone-poor masses of the Afghan people. From 1970 to 1975 the annual growth rate in the GNP, which during the Sixties had been 1.6 percent, dropped to 0.2 percent; a wave of inflation hit the towns and cities, particularly the food markets; about a million unemployed were driven to emigrate to neighboring Iran and the Arab Emirates, or stayed home to swell the ranks of the urban lumpenproletariat. Kabul's population rose from 450,000 in 1970 to 740,000 by 1976.

As the crisis deepened, it swallowed up whatever margin of time there had been for the effort to transform the country gradually that Parcham had been preaching: and so conditions grew ripe -- Afghanistan is not the only country to have experienced this sort of thing during those years -- for the radical shift of 1978. The year before, called to account by Kabul's intelligentsia and students, Parcham duly recited its mea culpa and rejoined the Khalq-PDP in a minority position. At the same time, Khalq had been revising its line of action, and launching -- this too is a symptom of the bankruptcy in long-term strategies -- a campaign of inflitration among the armed forces: this was the only way out for a revolutionary party which, considering ways of overthrowing the feudal monarchy, at the same time rejected, as we have seen, the route of armed struggle and of a people's guerrilla war.

Daoud's Overthrow and PDP Reforms

The positive effects of the break between Parcham and Daoud and of mending the breach between the two PDP factions came on 27 April 1978. The prince, after trying partial liberalization of the system, had once more turned the screws of repression on his country's politics, and his police had arrested, among others, Taraki himself. He was overthrown in a PDP-fomented uprising, in which several army detachments openly took part. It was a coup d'etat, yes, insofar as its "Blanquist" and insurrectionary technique was concerned, but it was decidedly not a military coup nor yet one engineered by the USSR, as the western media would go on repeating day after day. It began with an all-but-unforeseen -- though obviously organized by Hafizullah Amin for one -- reaction to Daoud's order for a wave of arrests: "The leftist coup d'etat of 27 April was more the upshot of an impromptu action than of any formal plan" (4) In the second place there were only three military men among the 21 members of the new government. In the third place, despite Parcham's active participation in the rebellion, the Khalq faction swiftly took the situation into hand. "Despite numerous allegations to the contrary, we believe that the Soviets were not directly involved in the random operation of 27 April." (5)

For that matter, Taraki went on repeatedly, in the course of the weeks following the seizure of power, stressing the new government's loyalty to the principles of non-alignment, and the "homegrown" and "new model" nature of the "Afghan revolution."

The convulsive events that followed the revolutionary turnabout, at least until Taraki was overthrown by Amin (September 1979), can be boiled down to three fundamental givens.

1. In the first place, the moderate wing of the PDP, and the one with the closest ties to the USSR, Parcham, was soon squeezed out of the party by the Khalq under Taraki and Amin. As early as July 1978 Babrak Karmal was removed as prime minister and made ambassador to Prague while, a few days later, Gen Kadir, a moderate nationalist-Muslim, was politically eliminated and arrested on charges of conspiracy. It should be noted that Parcham's alienation from the government occurred concomitantly with the PDP's promulgation of revolutionary decree n°6, which abolished usury, a traditional scourge in the country, particularly in the rural areas: with one pass of the sponge a total of 600 billion lire in debts -- debts owed by millions of peasants -- were wiped out by that law.

2. In the second place, and conversely, the radicalization of the social class and the revolutionary process was beginning to chip away at the non-alignment stance officially reiterated by both Taraki and Amin: as the new government was tightening cooperation agreements with the USSR to finance the forthcoming reforms, Pakistan and Iran -- the latter already shaken by the popular uprising against Reza Palhavi's dictatorship and, furthermore, already economically involved in Afghanistan -- were steadily stiffening in their attitude toward events in Kabul. The Federal Republic of Germany -- to which earlier regimes had followed the practise fairly widespread in the pro-Western Third World and entrusted the training of its police -- voluntarily withdrew its military advisers once the corps had been suitably neutralized by the new government for fear of reactionary coups. And thus the groundwork was laid -- under the aegis of the western media campaign against what was a purely imaginary "pro-Soviet" switch in Kabul (in 1978) -- for the pro-Soviet switch that did indeed come to pass a year later, thanks to Amin's overthrow and Karmal's takeover with direct support by Soviet tanks. The Soviet military presence was to increase steadily, keeping pace with the feudal "vendée" organized or at least financed by the CIA from Pakistan, spread and thereby imperilled the nation's stability and implementation of agrarian reform programs.

3. The third of our basic givens: the reforms launched by the new government and their impact on the social and ethnic conflicts inside the country. Of the eight decrees issued by the revolutionary government between April 1978 and July 1979, three were truly fundamental: one was the abolition of usury, which we have already mentioned; the second was the one calling for equality between the sexes, for reduction of the bride-price (total abolition would have conflicted with Islamic tradition), and banning forced marriages -- a practice widespread in rural areas, with the approval of the religious authorities (decree-law No 7): and the third was agrarian reform, which took effect on 1 January 1979 (nº 8). It was the keystone in the revolutionary process in a country where 75 percent of the population works on the land. The "democratic agrarian reform" called for confiscation of large land-holdings and redistribution of title to family plots among the landless..."Something halfway between Mao-style cooperatives and the Yugoslav type based on individual ownership of the land." (6) In September of 1979 a count showed that 600,000 hectares had been redistributed to a total of 300,000 families.

Along with these revolutionary decrees, the new government launched a set of measures also designed to break up the country's old social, political, and cultural order. Thousands of political prisoners were freed and members of the royal family and of the nobility jailed. A campaign for multilingual literacy was launched (abolition of Pathan as the "official" language applied to radio broadcasts as well), under which more than 600 new schools were opened and more than a million adults were involved. A start was made at overhauling the ancient government bureaocracy through wholesale purges and arrests of the old regime's civil servants, and the insertion en masse of party cadres into the central and provincial administrations. The work of providing political education to the armed forces went on from its timid start under Daud; and, as we have seen, the police force was neutralized by disarming it mere days after the 27 April turnabout.

Islamic Opposition

And so it was that Afghanistan, through a "revolution from the top" typical of so many Third World countries, struck out on the road to far-reaching transformation. Clearly, though, it was inevitable that any such process would run into widespread obstacles and resistance. The problems the new regime had inherited from the past were as numerous as they were thorny. There was the heavy burden of underdevelopment: industry -- except for textiles and a few cement factories and sugar refineries -- was practically non-existent. As for agriculture, of the potentially arable land (14 million hectares) only a tiny share (3 million hectares) was actually under cultivation. Cultural and sanitary conditions were the most backward imaginable: 90 percent of the population illiterate, 30 percent suffering from one or another form of tuberculosis, and tens of thousands of lepers. The social stratification was only partly "simple" and dichotomous: in the rural districts the landless masses (36 percent of the peasant population) was "easy" to win over to the revolution when the big estates were broken up and redistributed. But there were also millions of smallholders (45 percent of the peasantry) who, although they too were poor (their holdings were never more than 4 hectares) were nevertheless hierarchically arrayed among themselves, and were relatively privileged by comparison with the rest of the rural population. Also at work in the country districts was the age-old web of patterns of control by the old feudal establishment over the peasant population, which operated through the traditional village headmen (mirab, malek, arbab, etc.,) and the Islamic mullahs.

Lastly, the government was also facing the manifold unresolved national questions in the country: the artificial offspring of British imperial policy in southern Asia, Afghanistan is a mishmash of disparate ethnic groups. The Pathans (or Afghani) are by far the majority ethnic group (some 7 million of them); then there are more millions of Tajiks, Uzbeks, Turkomans, Hazaras, etc. Many of these populations are nomadic (2.5 million in all) or semi-nomadic, and they are an obstacle to agricultural development.

It was out of these complex problems we have listed here that there began to emerge early in 1979 a mass opposition to the regime: significantly (PDP members are mostly Pathan in origin) it takes on tribal characteristics in non-Pathan regions, but feeds on the religious factor where Pathans predominate. The latter brand is far more widespread: of the ten or so anti-government guerrilla groups on which there are hard data today, most are Islamic in orientation.

The Islamic-tribal opposition to the regime -- bearing in mind the opinions provided us by the western press on the matter -- raises at least two problems of interpretation. The first has to do with the opposition's real nature, its "social" and political stamp: from this point of view the often-drawn comparison between the Iranian revolution and the Afghan feudal "vendée" emerge as the really superficial and hasty judgments they are. They fail to allow for the fact that the Islamic opposition in Afghanistan, unlike that in Iran against the Reza Palhavi regime, has a decidedly reactionary tinge. There are a number of clues pointing that way: it was first openly manifested shortly after the issuance of the decrees for liberation of women and for agrarian reform; there is the spread of reaction against the reforms which, although it is indeed a "grass-roots" thing, is hard to share and hard to estimate: "In many cases husbands, urged on and manipulated by religious spokesmen, have turned out en masse to "get their wives back," set fires to schools, and driven away or actually killed agents from the ministry of education." (7) And then there is the fact that the overwhelming majority of the Afghan population (12.5 million out of around 17 million) are of the Sunni rather than the Shi'ite persuasion, meaning that they profess the most conservative variety of the Islamic faith. The only shi'ites in Afghanistan are the Hazara nomads: but that ethnic group's opposition to the central government -- in October 1979 its tribal chiefs set up an Islamic Revolutionary Council -- is based on nomadism, on their anything but "progressive" refusal to accept the new government's still very tentative plans to get them into permanent settlements.

If to all these facts we add the vaporous and ambiguous nature of the Islamic organizations' programs (the struggle against "atheism" and against "Marxism") which are held up as rivals to the solid practicality of the government-sponsored reforms, not to mention the international support and connivance these same organizations enjoy (the U.S., China, and Pakistan: symptomatic is what can only be called the lukewarm support they get -- at least thus far -- from Iran), the reactionary and pro-feudal nature of the Afghan guerrilla war emerges clearly, even in the few cases where it does not openly call for the return of the Zahir monarchy.

The second problem has to do with the real strength of the rebellion: the impression one gets, bolstered by the pictures we have been getting from a number of recent and very recent TV specials, is that once again the western mass media have failed to convey an objective picture of the situation. The Afghan Islamic opposition is certainly a mass phenomenon: and yet, at least up till the Soviet intervention, it was never really shown to be widespread. The 40 to 50,000 strength attributed by the western press to the anti-government organizations (figures obtained from Pakistani sources) is not all that big for a country with a population of 17 million, particularly when set against a PDP which (according to American sources) has 10 to 50,000 active members. As for the large numbers of "refugees" in Pakistan -- 300 to 500,000 -- they also cloak a more complex reality, particularly the nomadic habits of large segments of the population: "Often semi-nomads, the Pathans drift more or less freely back and forth between Afghanistan and Pakistan," reported LE MONDE on 26 September 1979. On the other hand, it is the very lack of any widespread Islamic opposition to the new government -- at least prior to Amin's ouster -- that makes the Soviet intervention still more unacceptable and "imperialistic."

Even with all this, we would repeat once again with emphasis, the guerrilla war was a mass phenomenon, and constituted a serious problem -- particularly in hindsight -- for the new government; it was no accident that from the moment Daoud was toppled, it took a pretty cautious attitude toward the religious problem (typical, a propos, of some of Taraki's tactics: going to the mosque for prayer, refraining from too outspokenly Marxist terminology in official pronouncements, etc): in effect, the underlying "dualism of power" between the old state in the process of demolition and the new one being built made the solution to that question an absolute necessity, the more so in that the armed forces -- and this was indeed "opposition" often underestimated -- were a long way from enthusiastic over the new direction, and had repeatedly shown that they were the prime focus of possible reactionary countercoups. Between April 1978 and September 1979 there were numerous coup attempts and desertions, sometimes by entire military units.

The Taraki-Amin Clash

So we see that the Islamic opposition in any case posed a serious problem to the Taraki government, and it became the focus for all the other issues clustered around the "phase" of the revolutionary process: from restructuring the armed forces to agrarian reform and its advancement -- apparently -- from the individual family farm to the cooperative stage. And this was precisely the point, contemplation of this vast array of issues, where dissent and all the divergences that seemed to have been got rid of when the moderate Parcham wing was severed in the summer of 1978, floated to the surface once again. This time the polarization resolved itself around Taraki and Amin: it was Amin's increasingly swift climb into the upper reaches of the party hierarchy and of government (in March Amin became prime minister, while still holding fast to his place as PDP secretary general and his foreign affairs portfolio) that increasingly worried the then president. On the one hand Taraki, who favored some softening in the process and compromise settlements with the Islamic opposition, and on the other Amin who -- after having been the man mainly responsible for the breach with Parcham -- sought to make the revolutionary process still more radical.

This is what emerges from three illuminating reports in IL MONDO on 17, 19, and 20 September 1979. From them we extract another crucial given: Amin was not the "pro-Soviet" sympathizer we had been given to understand from several quarters. His coup had taken the Soviet Union "by surprise," and thereby had made him an inconvenient ally in the geopolitical context of western Asia. Actually, secure in his own power support network that was beyond the reach even of the Soviet advisers already on the scene in Afghanistan, Amin successfully parried Taraki's attempt to cut him down to size (on Amin's own admission according to a report quoted by LE MONDE on 22 December, to assassinate him) and thus to do unto his adversary as he had been done by. And he succeeded in doing just that against the desires of the Soviets, who were supporting the Taraki-led moderates. The western media error was no accident, either; it was part of an already familiar pattern, in which the object is to aim at the "pro-Soviet" until -- as happened in the Karmal case -- the "pro-Soviet" eventually appears. In the meantime, though, ignorance and failure to understand the real internal dynamics of the pro-Soviet bloc prevailed over any objective approach.

According to LE MONDE, Amin, "aware of opposition from part of the army, tended to rely increasingly on the armed civilian militia" (20 September 1979): once he had held firm in defense of his commitment to revolutionary reforms, he had perforce to set up a strong people's force to protect those same laws. A dispatch dated August 1979 had already reported that the peasants were being armed in the Herat zone and in the regions north of Kabul. Amin, according to reliable sources, was apparently trying to play on the U.S.-USSR conflict to make his country more independent of Moscow, following a nonalignment dodge fairly common among "Soviet-leaning" countries these days.

As things turned out, though, events took another turn, culminating in an attempt to turn things around completely: the Soviet-engineered "coup" on 27 December 1979 represented a complete break with the radical course upon which Amin wanted to strike out, and an attempt to restore dialogue between the Islamic-feudal opposition and the government, under the aegis of constituting what Karmal himself had borrowed the old Parcham program's language to style "a broad front, with participation by all the nationalist and democratic forces." The statements in favor of the new government emanating from the Kabul ulema only a few days after Karmal had taken power, are symptomatic. In much the same way, the very recent hints at the possibility of some revision in the agrarian reform laws (or is this merely a breathing-stop at the status quo, an indication that the reforms will go this far and no further?) shed some light on the anything but secondary scope of the infighting at the top echelons of the PDP. Defeated after the failed Daoud experiment and consigned to outer darkness after April 1979, Parcham was restored to full power within the Afghan People's Democratic Party.

Soviet Intervention

Some conclusions can be drawn, then, if we purposely skip over all considerations of the tragic consequences triggered internationally by events in Afghanistan.

1. First of all, the ouster of Amin, the Soviets' embarrassing ally, was something the Soviets themselves wanted. Carter is unquestionably quite right in charging the Kremlin with lying when it says that "the Afghan government" had asked for its intervention. If by that he means intervention against Islamic reaction, this is absolutely true. Yet in the process of their intervention the Soviets violated the sovereignty and legitimacy of the only real Afghan government in existence on 26 December 1979, which was Amin's. And so what the USSR could not bring off in Angola (the Nito Alves business) or even in Ethiopia (there have been many reports of the Kremlin's mistrust of the "radical" Mengistu) worked in Afghanistan: the country's geographical placement -- 1,500 to 2,000 kilometers of it borders on the territory of the Soviet superpower -- transformed it, with the help of that domestic instability for which the American secret services are at least partly to blame, into a "Warsaw Pact country." Even so, be it added, the rhetorical comparisons with Czechoslovakia really don't stand up all that well, in view of the fact that those taking issue today with the new pro-Soviet government have very little in common with Dubcek's democratic socialist option. The "principal contradiction" in the Afghan revolutionary process in this phase is still the one between the anti-feudal front and pro-feudal reaction.

2. The pro-Soviet coup in Kabul is an attempt at a moderate change of course by comparison with the social conflict in that country: evidence to that is the Parcham story, Karmal's statements on the morning after the seizure of power, the ulema's official recognition of the new government, and the coolish Iranian attitude to the whole thing. In this context, the heightened tension in the U.S.-USSR confrontation immediately following the turnaround of 27 December 1979 is not quite so paradoxical as it looked at first: superpower policy, apparently, does not necessarily or invariable automatically reflect class conflict inside this or that country. However, it may be tending toward "automation": Soviet tanks in Afghanistan to back a moderate switch at the top of the Kabul government are, for the United States, far more of an immediate threat than any "radical" leadership such as Amin's might have turned out to be.

3. All this can be explained by the real motives behind the Soviet intervention, which have a lot more to do with the regional situation -- neighboring Iran -- and with an "imperial" logic of operations on one of the planet's basic strategic chessboards -- the Middle East -- than with domestic events in Afghanistan. The Soviets overthrew Amin -- the same Amin who in August had delivered a blistering attack on the "fanatics in power in Tehran," accusing them of supporting the Afghan guerrilla war -- with an eye and a half on Iran. Not so much in the sense that the American impasse in Tehran had left them a free hand in the Kabul coup (this too), as in the sense that the policy of compromise with Islamic reaction in Afghanistan was useful to the USSR in getting a firmer toehold in among the internal tensions of the Iranian revolution, during a phase when it is radicalizing and when the likelihood of a full-scale civil war is mounting.

4. That still leaves open the question as to whether the Soviet-Karmal ploy will work or not: apart from western reactions to the USSR's move -- clearly unforeseen in the Kremlin -- a great many obstacles lie in the way of success for "operation Kabul;" those obstacles might well thwart the attempt to turn the Afghan revolution off its moderate course. Here are the main obstacles in its way: from the tough reaction to Karmal's softness toward Islamic reaction -- which can now claim the "solidarity" of the western media as grounds for upping its price -- to the possibility that even the Iranians and Khomeiny himself -- with the issue of anti-Iran economic sanctions by the UN out of the way -- might be driven to take a tougher stand vis-à-vis Moscow; to the no less significant fact that in view of the scarcity of trained Parcham cadre in the "renewed" PDP, Karmal may well have to come to terms with the Khalq apparatus once run by Amin, only part of which has been purged or jailed.

U.S. MILITARY PRESENCE IN EGYPT EXAMINED

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 2 Sep 80 pp 1, 5

[Article by Ahmed Fattani: "What Is Behind Egyptian-American Cooperation?"]

[Text] Since the beginning of the Afghanistan affair, Carter's America has set up several support points for possible military intervention in the Near East and the Indian Ocean. Only recently, Washington and Cairo announced the establishment of the third U. S. base at Ras Banas on the Red Sea in Egypt. It is American dollars that will pay for the construction and facilities of this naval air base, just as they have elsewhere in Oman, Somalia and Kenya. The Pentagon has not concealed the fact that it plans to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to modernize the base from which the B-52 strategic bombers and the KC-135 supply planes could take off and land.

Since the Camp David accords, the United States has had two bases, one located near Cairo, housing about 15 F-4's, and the other on the Nile at Qena. It was from this base some 500 kilometers from Cairo that the planes which were to make the attack on Tabas in Iran took off. A wide range of sophisticated equipment, radar and other detection devices have been installed there and have been operating for several months. Observation missions, especially satellite spying, is carried out by American pilots. The F-4 that recently crashed was stationed there and revealed to public opinion that the American bases in Egypt had a different objective than the one officially announced by Egyptian and American officials.

It is a secret to no one that Sadat's Egypt is destined to be a military base of aggression serving the United States.

Dollars are raining down on the Nile. The proof? The Pentagon has just officially admitted that it will spend some $400 million on modernizing the Ras Banas military airport alone. Once completed, the base could accommodate 16,000 men, according to statements made by the Americans themselves. Ras Banas would then be a decisive element in controlling the straits, the Red Sea and the Arabian Gulf. It would be a relay station strengthening the U.S. bases at Berbera (Somalia), Monbasa (Kenya) and Massirah (Oman). These are definitely preparations for war in which Washington is zealously engaging from Sadat's Egypt.

What is concealed behind the sudden generosity of Uncle Sam toward a country which until 10 years ago was the leader of Arab nationalism, the epicenter of the fight against imperialism and support for Third World liberation movements?

After the disappearance of Nasser, America succeeded, with Kissinger's help, in taming the Arab country having the strongest army in order to drag it into the most condemnable undertaking in history: surrender to the Israeli enemy. It came about because one man was ready to offer his services and become America's factotum in the region. Today he wears his Harlequin costume, like a cowboy in the West seeking new adventures.

In 1980, political observers easily discovered that the Camp David accords were nothing more than a screen for a new American plan of military offensives in the world, shrewdly put together by Pentagon strategists. This new plan would respond better to the strategic needs of a United States constantly showing its teeth rather than looking for real peace in the region.

After being booted out of Southeast Asia, the United States saw its sphere of influence diminish over the years. In the Third World, it is the scapegoat blamed for everything and to which all ills are attributed. In Angola in 1975, the agents of American imperialism were brought to bay and did not even put up a fight.

Neither Savimbi's UNITA [National Union for the Total Independence of Angola] nor Roberto Holden's FLNA [Angolan National Liberation Front] were able to contain the people's force led by Agostino Neto's MPLA.

The rise of the socialist current on the African continent and in the Arab Machrek is perceived in Washington as an alarming sign for the future of the influence exercised throughout the world by the United States. Ford is gone and the new White House tenant, Jimmy Carter, calmly readies his weapons. He sees that the geopolitical map has undergone profound changes since 1975. In the Pentagon, the losses are counted: Haile Selassie's Ethiopia, the Iran of Shah Mohamed Reza Pahlavi, the departure of British forces from South Yemen, which opted for a people's democracy and Afghanistan.

On Egypt's western borders, it is Mu'ammar Qadhdhafi's Libya that arouses the ire of the American-Israeli-Egyptian trio.

All of these factors affected Carter's decision when he invited Sadat and Begin to work out the Camp David accords.

The Egyptians, who in October 1979 -- at the time of the celebration of the sixth anniversary of the Ramadan war -- saw American F-4 planes for the first time, had already understood that Sadat was offering Carter all of Egypt to serve as a base from which aggression would be launched against future objectives in the Maghreb, Africa, the Machrek, the Gulf and Asia.

The Americans entered Egypt by the front door. Under pressure from the White House, the American Congress approved a military aid program amounting to $4 billion over 5 years, while the Pentagon agreed to supply Sadat with new weapons: 550 troop transport vehicles, 240 tanks and 40 F-16 planes. Gen Kamal Hassan Ali had already received 800 troop transport vehicles and 86 campaign trucks.

After long negotiations, Douglas-McDonnell concluded an agreement to build F-14, F-15, F-16 and F-18 bombers in Egypt.

It goes without saying that in order to defend Israel better, the United States prefers to invest billions of dollars for the establishment and maintenance of their military bases in Egypt. The Israelis have understood this very well, recognizing that "the American bases in Egypt are an advantage (for Tel Aviv) if President Sadat should die or be overthrown."

COOPERATION INTENSIFIED WITH SEVERAL COUNTRIES

Meeting With Bulgarian Minister

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 29-30 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] (APS)--On Thursday, Abdelaziz Khelef, member of the Central Committee and minister of commerce, and Ali Oubouzar, secretary of state for foreign trade, met with Assen Stamenov, deputy chairman of electronics and electrical equipment of the People's Republic of Bulgaria.

The meeting dealt with the evolution of commercial relations and cooperation between Algeria and Bulgaria and prospects for further development.

Special emphasis was placed on preparations for the 12th session of the Algerian-Bulgarian joint committee, which will be held in the coming months.

Hungarian Delegation in Algiers

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] Istvan Soltesz, minister of metallurgy and the machine industry, accompanied by a large delegation and the Hungarian ambassador to Algiers, met yesterday with Abdennoun Bekka, minister of posts and telecommunications, who was assisted by the secretary general of the Ministry of Posts and Telecommunications.

In the course of the meeting, the possibilities of developing cooperation between the Algerian and Hungarian Posts and Telecommunications ministries were discussed.

The two ministers expressed their satisfaction with the quality and level of cooperation and said they were optimistic about the consolidation of the cordial bonds existing between officials of the two countries in the field of posts and telecommunications.

Industrial Cooperation With Hungary

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 5-6 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] (APS)--Thursday afternoon, Mohamed Nabi, secretary of state for professional training, received Soltesz Istvan, Hungarian minister of metallurgy and the machine industry, at the Ministry of Labor and Professional Training. Istvan is in Algeria to attend the 17th International Fair in Algiers.

The meeting was also attended by the Hungarian ambassador to Algeria. The officials examined possibilities of broadening cooperation between the two countries in the different areas of professional training.

On Wednesday, Secretary General Boudjemline of the Ministry of Light Industries, met with Istvan Soltesz, Hungarian minister of metallurgy and the machine industry, and the delegation accompanying him for the purpose of attending the 17th International Fair in Algiers.

The meeting dealt with Algerian-Hungarian relations in the field of light industries and on prospects and the expansion of industrial cooperation between the two countries.

Improved Relations With Italy

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 5-6 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by A. Z.]

[Text] With the official visit to Algiers which Minister of Foreign Trade Enrico Manca began Wednesday, accompanied by a large delegation of high officials from his ministry, Italian participation in the 17th International Fair in Algiers seemed to augur well for Algerian-Italian relations.

During his visit, the Italian minister was able to examine real possibilities of developing those relations and measure the quality of our ties, which began before our independence and which are favored by many historic and geocultural affinities.

Taking these prospects for cooperation into account, Italy's participation in the International Fair was expanded to 80 firms, which exhibited a diversified range of products from all priority sectors of the Five-Year Plan: machinery and equipment for public works and the construction industry, valves for water, gas and steam, tractors and power-driven cultivators, facilities for water treatment, machinery for the processing and packing of agricultural products, prefabricated buildings, naval shipyards, the electronics industry, engineering, machines for bottling, and so on.

Covering an area of 5,500 square meters, the Italian pavilion is filled with the very latest equipment from Italian industry, which generally covers the Mediterranean market.

Their competitiveness is such that it incites Italian manufacturers to further intensify their presence in regional fairs.

In his successive talks with the Algerian ministries of Commerce, Energy and the Petrochemical Industry, Transport, Light Industries, Finance, Public Works, Heavy Industry and the Office of Secretary of State for Foreign Trade, Manca reviewed cooperation between our two countries and provided a note of optimism concerning its growth under better conditions, thereby confirming the spirit of the recent visit to Algeria by the president of Italy, Sandro Pertini.

On the occasion of Italy's "national day" Thursday, the climate was most cordial between ministers Manca, Khellef and Oubouzar.

Harmonious Relations With Sweden

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Interview with Swedish Minister of Industry Nils G. Asling, conducted in Algiers by A. Zouied; date not given]

[Text] In Algeria since Sunday on an official visit to the 17th International Fair in Algiers, Nils G. Asling told Abdelkader Zouied, during an interview granted us, that "Our discussions (with Algerian officials) have been fruitful, concrete and have even covered specific projects." Asling had met with high officials from the ministries of Commerce, Finance, Energy, Housing, Transport and Heavy Industry.

"It is my impression that our relations are bound to enjoy harmonious development," he said.

In answer to a question about good prospects for our relations, Asling said: "We are of the opinion that it is not merely a matter of stepping up commercial trade, but also of achieving technological transfers that will truly contribute to the Algerian development effort."

Evoking the image his country has of Algeria, the Swedish minister of industry said: "We view Algeria as a modern nation whose struggle is watched with enormous sympathy by the Swedish nation." He underlined the need to "demonstrate our common political determination to cooperate" in the spirit of the new international economic order -- thereby hailing the move of the Group of the 77 -- by engaging in concrete overall negotiations.

[Question] Mr Minister, can you tell us anything about relations between Sweden and Algeria in the light of the meetings you have just had with Algerian economic officials?

[Answer] First of all, I would like to emphasize the warm welcome extended to me and the open attitude I found among the Algerians. Furthermore, I would like to mention the common basis we have on both sides for cooperation between our two countries, especially as regards fundamental principles.

Our discussions were fruitful, specific and even dealt with individual projects. My impression is therefore that our bilateral relations are very positive and assured of harmonious development. This can be seen from Sweden's participation in the International Fair in Algiers.

[Question] In the course of your talks, did you consider giving them new impetus in keeping with the objectives of our Five-Year Plan?

[Answer] At the time of the visit to Sweden of Algerian Minister of Finance Hadj Yala, we began fruitful discussions on improving conditions for financing Swedish exports to Algeria.

These efforts were crowned with success because we reached an advantageous framework credit agreement and we firmly believe that it can serve as a framework for the development of our economic relations. I am optimistic and I still have the impression that our Algerian colleagues share our hopes about the future of our cooperation. We also believe that it is not solely a question of increasing commercial trade, but of effecting technological transfers that will truly contribute to the Algerian development effort.

That is why my visit to the International Fair in Algiers is important because it shows the interest the Swedish Government has in furthering our relations.

[Question] What image do the people in Sweden have of Algeria?

[Answer] First of all, I must remark that the image Sweden has of Algeria was sealed once and for all by the Algerian people's fight for their independence.

It was a struggle that was followed closely by the Swedish people with enormous sympathy. It generated lasting respect and admiration for the Algerian people.

The efforts which Algeria has made, despite all the difficulties, to achieve development have only reinforced our impressions.

I was able to see that these feelings were well founded when I visited the international pavilions at the Fair in Algiers.

In Sweden, we regard Algeria as a modern nation that is rapidly industrializing with the help of its large gas and petroleum deposits, which ensure its growth and the development necessary for the well-being of the Algerian people. We are also closely following its international action along the lines traced by the late President Boumediene, particularly regarding the establishment of a new international economic order.

[Question] In this connection, Mr Minister, the Algerian and Swedish approaches to the major international economic problems seem to coincide in some ways. Could you tell us more about the attitude of Sweden toward the overall negotiations on international economic cooperation demanded by the Third World countries at the current special session of the UN General Assembly?

[Answer] We are living in an indivisible world, in which no one can resolve his problems alone. For a better future, we must therefore have a dialog with all partners. The need for such a dialog amidst solidarity is deeply anchored in the Swedish people, who fully support the government in its effort to contribute to the establishment of acceptable economic and social justice within an overall framework.

With that backing, our government has already made its contribution in public aid to development countries in the amount of 1 percent of our GNP.

We believe that with such a level of resources transferred, the industrialized countries could considerably change the international situation and thereby increase the purchasing power of Third World countries, benefiting the world economy as a whole.

We therefore all need one another. We are interdependent and hail the overall North-South negotiations as an important opportunity to solve together the problems that concern all of us.

Finally, since I have the honor of being in Algeria, I would like to tell you of my impression that Algeria and Sweden have a great deal in common. We are fighting on the same side of the barricades for greater economic and social justice and are both following a policy of national independence. In the final analysis, we must express our determination to cooperate in our bilateral relations.

FIRST PARTY CELL INSTALLED IN ALGERIAN INSURANCE COMPANY

[Article by R. S.]

[Text] In keeping with the recommendations of the Fourth Congress of the party, political and administrative officials in the district of Bab-El-Oued proceeded yesterday morning to install the first party cell in the banking and financial sector. The ceremony took place at the headquarters of the general directorate of the Algerian Insurance Company (SAA).

Attended by local officials, the general director of the company, representatives of mass organizations and members of the workers assembly of the enterprise, the ceremony provided officials with an opportunity to review the scope of this undertaking, which will serve to heighten the degree of political awareness of workers in this sector of services and prepare them to face the new requirements of the national development plan.

For the coordinator of the FLN kasma in Bab-El-Oued, this party cell in the SAA will be an ideal framework in which members and workers will forge their destiny and mobilize all their energies to give the company the right image while accelerating the process of settling cases submitted by the insured.

For his part, the general director emphasized the role played by the party cell, while stressing the close cooperation of members with all workers in carrying out the mission assigned to the insurance sector.

Ensuring the political role, the insurance sector remains an indispensable tool in preserving our economy from obstacles to its development.

In conclusion, the company official formulated the hope that he would see the installation of the cell further strengthen the ranks of company workers in order to fulfill all objectives set forth by the revolution.

The last speaker, the coordinator of the Bab-El-Oued FLN Federation, outlined the true context of the installation, whose main purpose is the participation and effective involvement of workers in everything done in the country.

He then stressed the encouragement that will be given to the cell to act as its field of endeavors is broadened and as the basic laws of the revolution are carried out.

Through these installations of party cells in enterprises, the exercise of democracy is promoted and there is expanded reflection on the search for the most effective means to ensure that the institution will play its true role in participating in the vast and noble task of nation building at all levels and in all fields. The ceremony came to a close with the presentation of the council made up of 17 members and the appointment of the cell bureau.

PRIME MINISTER INSISTS ON LINK BETWEEN WAGES, PRODUCTIVITY

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 3 Sep 80 p 1

[Article]

[Text] Algiers (APS)--The debates on the social situation, begun Monday, continued yesterday in the interministerial council chaired by Mr Mohammed Banahmed Abdelghani, the prime minister.

Work relations between the different partners within the production units was the subject of special attention.

The participants stressed that the mechanisms for consultation and concertation set up in the framework of the GSE [Socialist Management of Businesses], and in a more general way the trade union organs, were conceived to create a climate of dialog and confidence in the work world.

In his remarks, the prime minister reiterated once again that the decisions announced by the president of the republic and secretary general of the FLN in December 1979, with a view to readjusting the wages of certain vocational categories, as also the measures linking wages and production ordered in May 1980, must imperatively be implemented and with the least possible delays.

As to protecting and improving the purchasing power of the workers as a whole, this constitutes a permanent priority objective of the political leadership.

This important matter will be submitted for review by the next council of ministers.

TLEMCEN TO HAVE INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 2 Sep 80 p 4

[Article]

[Text] Tlemcen (APS)--Starting on 1 November of this year, Tlemcen will be linked directly to France with the launching of air connections with Paris, in the first phase, and with Marseilles in the second phase.

The Tlemcen-Zenata airport, completely renovated and enlarged with the construction of a modern terminal endowed with all the appropriate equipment, will have a reception capacity equal to that of Oran-Es Senia.

The regional representative of Air Algeria said that the opening of the new airport to international air traffic will make possible an easing of the congestion at the Oran airport, toward which all travellers from western Algeria converge. With the inauguration of international flights originating from Tlemcen, beyond the advantage that will redound to the [local] populations thanks to this policy of decentralization, other voyagers from neighboring wilayas will transit through Tlemcen in order to go abroad.

Also, the touristic and historic attractions of Tlemcen should add to the flow of foreigners drawn by the remains to be found in the region. In this respect, the airplane turns out to be one of the most practical means of transport for traversing the Mediterranean.

However, putting this program in operation is not going to be without problems, notably those linked directly to infrastructure for Air Algeria, the national company. The only [ticket] agency operating in Tlemcen is no longer adequate to the ever-larger needs of the population. The very tiny premises can no longer hold the hundreds of people who form a long line every day in front of the doors of the agency.

With the establishment of the international program which will add to the normal quota of national flights and those leaving Oran for abroad, thrice-weekly guaranteed flights from Tlemcen to Algiers, the Air Algeria agency, which also houses the regional delegation (Tlemcen-Bel-Abbes) will no longer be able to cope with the situation.

Moreover, this situation is known to the local authorities, and their energetic efforts will clearly be required to make possible a rational utilization of air traffic starting from this region of the West.

SECURITY FORCES ACTIVE IN SKIKDA

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 28 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Rachid Souilah]

[Text] Launched several months ago throughout the country, the campaign of sanitation and struggle against social ills is continuing in an effective way in Skikda where the security services of the wilaya and of the Darak El-Watani are making proud efforts in this direction.

In effect, since the launching of this felicitous national operation which aims at assuring the security and tranquillity of the citizens, very good results have appeared.

These results, moreover, can be actually seen in the calmness and normalcy which has returned to the town of Skikda, once troubled by disorder and insecurity, once characterized by incidents and provocations on the part of "black sheep" who victimized innocent citizens.

The beneficent activity of the security services has thus borne fruit, if one considers that order, hygiene, and tranquillity reign everywhere, both within the city and on the coast, which is under permanent surveillance--both day and night--by units of the police and of the Darak El-Watani.

In the face of such efforts conducted in the public interests, there must be general satisfaction. It is, however, to be hoped that the sanitation operation will be permanent, for everyone knows that its objectives aim at the radical elimination of the social ills that constitute a very serious danger for society.

SETIF 1980 HARVEST SEASON ANALYZED

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 4, 5 Aug 80

[Article by Brahim Taouchichet: "A Harvest of Hope"]

[4 Aug 80, p 1-2]

[Text] A silver lining to the clouds. That is the characteristic of the harvesting-thrashing 1980 season. The growers who were pessimistic at the beginning of the year because of the lack of precipitation have regained their hope. Improvements of precipitation conditions in April and May eliminated the threat of a poor cereal crop harvest as had been the case in the preceding 3 years. Worse, "400,000 hectares in grain crops would have been lost."

In Setif Wilaya the spring rains accounted for a great deal of the enthusiasm of the farmers encouraged by the prospects of a good crop assessed at over two million quintals. The harvesting-thrashing campaign, which started on 15 June, is 80 percent completed. Preliminary estimates confirm the forecasts and call for an average of 10 quintals per hectare. In the central area of the wilaya and in the semimountainous north some varieties of cereal crops have yielded 30 quintals per hectare. In order to insure the best success of the harvesting and thrashing campaign material facilities were increased: 459 harvesting-thrashing machines are at work in the wilaya; mobile ONAMA [National Agricultural Equipment Office] workshops take care of equipment breakdowns.

Paradoxically, this year the harvest has created some problems. In addition to that of manpower which, today, has reached full size, an urgent problem of transportation has arisen. The inadequacy of the rolling stock of the OAIC (Algerian Interprofessional Cereal Crops Office) has been reduced by resorting to the services of the producers themselves, thus mobilizing a manpower which is far more needed for harvesting and thrashing.

Storage facilities as well have not matched the output. A major shortage has been revealed in this area. The DWA in Setif has pointed out that no investment has been made in the development of the infrastructure of storage facilities. This failure is not limited to the Setif Wilaya alone. On the national level there is a shortage of storage facilities for 6.5 million quintals. Yet, the projected output is 22 million quintals of cereal crops.

"In April we were quite worried by the poor growing of the wheat. Everyone was expecting a catastrophic harvest. However, improvements in precipitation eliminated this threat." This assessment of the development of the growth cycle of cereal crops was provided by Toufik Nait Dahamane, an agronomical engineer in charge of crop production for the agriculture office of Setif Wilaya. It sums up the entire period of apprehension and almost of discouragement experienced by the farmers in the area whose last harest was disastrous. The proof is that the yields in this area, reputed as the "granary of cereal crops" dropped to under three quintals per hectare. It did not exceed six quintals at best. Actually, this shortage of cereal crops did not affect the Setif Wilaya alone. Since 1976 the national output has been declining steadily. Weather conditions played a primary role in this decline. The harvest of the previous year was no more than 1.4 million quintals, a ridiculously low figure compared with domestic consumption needs. In comparison, the current harvest appears more promising. On 20 July last the initial crop estimates for 57 percent of the harvested areas (the total surface under cereal crops is 3.2 million hectares) called for 13.5 million quintals. At the same date last year 44 percent of the harvesting was over, whereas this year's estimate was 57 percent. This percentage, showing two substantially different rates, is, above all, an indication of the development of the current campaign, described as positive, particularly in terms of the speed of harvesting operations. Yet, "no new measure has been applied." Therefore, the reasons for such progress achieved in the 1980 harvesting campaign should be sought elsewhere.

The Producers' Enthusiasm

In Setif, Mr Zitouni, wilaya agriculture director (DWA) mentioned the enthusiasm of the growers. The latter are showing great motivation in their work "for," according to the director of the Merazga self-managed farm of the Ain-Oulmane Daira, "this year's output is good." He added that, "Last year the farmers were discouraged from the very beginning of the harvesting campaign by the very low output." Indeed, this is a determining factor for the results of the efforts of the fellah. Suffice it to walk through the huge cereal crop fields of the Setif Wilaya to see an unusual excitement in the wheat fields.

In the torrid heat and despite their fasting the peasants are methodically harvesting. Like giant ants, the harvesters are gobbling up the hectares in crops, followed by the tractors which pick up the wheat bags.

This operation is no less difficult. It is even more trying in the month of Ramadhan, bearing in mind the physical effort it requires. At a first glance, lifting a one quintal bag of wheat or barley may not seem difficult. However, it does become difficult when the operation is repeated several times daily. Thus, in Ras El Oued Daira, a fellah who was assigned the job was unable to withstand the effort and had to be urgently taken to the hospital. Despite such difficulties, however, the growers work conscientiously. Work begins very early in the morning, far before administrative offices or plants open their doors, and ends late in the evening. At dawn the farmers make the equipment ready by maintaining and lubricating the harvesters, and so on. No harvesting is possible in cool weather (the jaws of the harvester cannot grip moist wheat stalks). That is why the growers were forced to stay idle for 3 days at the beginning of July (because of the coolness). They start toward 1000 hours. Harvesting stops at 1800 hours, after which the night work begins: the gathering and hauling of the hay and the bags of grain.

The Setif DWA points out that "compared with the two previous years there is greater work motivation," adding that, "We are receiving a lesser number of claims even from private growers." In the fields this evaluation is quickly confirmed by the growers who give the impression of enjoying better working conditions. This remark applies to a number of farms in the Setif Wilaya. The frequent answer of the peasant to the question of what are the difficulties in the work is "no problem."

Anyone accustomed to seeing the grower facing a large number of all sorts of problems would consider such an answer unusual. Boukel, director of crop production at the Ministry of Agriculture and Agrarian Reform, claims that instructions were issued "so that the grower will not be left to cope by himself but will be given the necessary help." In accordance with a memorandum issued by the MARA [Ministry of Agriculture and Agrarian Revolution] a practical stipulation is being applied in Setif. The harvesters used in a specific area may be moved elsewhere only after having finished with the entire harvest in all farms, regardless of their status.

Original Features

Despite its geographic location which puts the Setif Wilaya behind, the rate at which the harvesting campaign is advancing has reached, according to initial estimates, 80 percent of the total. There are greater delays in the harvest in the semimountainous areas north of National Highway 5. This makes the use of machinery if not dangerous at least more difficult, therefore encouraging the use of traditional harvesting methods. This poses the problem of gathering data on the harvest in private farms.

"The organization of municipal offices," explains the official in charge of crop production in Setif, "should enable us to surmount this difficulty thanks to better cadres put at the disposal of the growers."

In Setif the harvesting campaign is developing on the basis of an organization which takes into consideration the specific features of the area. That is why the campaign was initiated in the Ras El Oued and Ain Oulmane dairas whose climate is hotter. Gradually, it was extended to the central area along National Highway 5, ending in the semimountainous northern part of the wilaya. Generally speaking, this year's output is considered "satisfactory." The average yield per hectare for barley, hard grain and soft grain ranges from 8 to 10 quintals. However, yields vary substantially from one zone to another. Whereas in Bougaa overall cereal crop yields do not exceed seven quintals per hectare, a different situation prevails in the other dairas. Thus, in Mahdia, in the Ras El Oued Daira, in Setif and in El Eulma, the average has been 27 quintals for barley, 22 quintals for soft wheat, and 17 quintals for hard wheat. Such yield differences among zones is caused by the different climate and soil structures which have a great impact on output, according to Lounes Hachemi, member of the National Institute for Major Crops in El Harrach. He has stated that "the Setif Wilaya has original features based on the existence of "spots" of rich crops and high yields, surrounded by poor and primitive crops." The same characteristics may be found in the Bougaa area. However, south of National Highway 5 the production of cereal crops is lower, with the exception of several farms which have averaged 10 quintals per hectare. Here, as a farm director in Ain Oulmane explained, "working the land is a vital factor. It insures one-half of the output." The accuracy of this statement becomes obvious by looking at the area south of the Setif Wilaya.

In addition to the natural poverty of the soils and the lack of water, both of which are not very helpful in terms of soil irrigation, extensive areas have been salinized and calcified. Land which only a few years ago was productive has been abandoned today because of lack of reclamation. Whereas the production of cereal crops is based on proper and properly balanced precipitation [part missing] is also largely determining. The example is provided by two self-managed farms in Ain Hadjar in the Ain Oulmane Daira: They have the same amount of land. One of them is straggling behind the other because of less experienced manpower.

A Basic Target: Obtaining Self-Sufficiency

In Setif the harvesting and thrashing campaign of 1980 brings with it hope, thanks to the April and May rains, as the farmers acknowledge. "Without the rains," emphasizes Lounes Hachemi, from the National Institute for Major Crops in El Harrach, "from 350,000 to 400,000 hectares in cereal crops would have been lost this year." The whims of the rain directly affect the growers. Discouraged by the results of the three preceding harvests, the latter were displaying an openly pessimistic attitude as to this year's output, particularly after the droughty period at the beginning of the year. The future of the plowing and sowing campaign was determined by the rains which fell from mid-April to the end of May. Their effect would have been null had they fallen after that time, as the growth cycle had been completed. The official in charge of crop production of the Setif DWA claims that several farmers surmounted their hesitation to sow their fields following the rains.

Today they are frenetically plunging into harvesting and threshing campaigns. They are also motivated by the concern for gathering the crops before the Aid El Fitr. The harvesting campaign is quite advanced in Setif. According to initial estimates, the cereal crop harvest should total 2,138,917 quintals, of which 1,017,372 quintals of hard grain and 620,860 quintals of barley. On the national level, the crop estimate is 22 million quintals, compared with 14 million last year. Rough assessments are more optimistic, calling for 30 million quintals. However, we must take into consideration a 7-8 percent loss due to the inadequate handling of machinery (tuning, etc.) and domestic consumption. The 16 million quintals allocated for consumption would barely meet one-half of overall domestic demand. This has led the director in charge of crop production of the MARA to state that even though this year the output will be good it will nevertheless be below target which calls for reaching self-sufficiency in terms of cereal crops. Algeria, in effect, remains dependent on wheat imports. It is within this perspective that the battle for production assumes its full importance. Success in the harvesting campaign is an element of this battle.

More harvesting-threshing machines have been supplied to the Setif Wilaya: 459 of them are in operation, 105 of which were received in June. "This year," claims a DWA official, "we received the machinery on time. It has already happened that harvesters may be sent to us at the end of the campaign." Even though the rate of one harvester per 300 hectares has not been reached as yet, the fleet of such agricultural machinery makes it possible to cover adequately the needs of the wilaya. This does not prevent some owners of harvesting machines to offer their services at the rate of 120 DA per hour. We know, however, that the CAPCS [Communal Multiservice Agriculture Cooperatives] lease such machinery for 70 DA per hour. The service for repairing machinery on the spot, in operation over the past several years, seems to be functioning properly.

The wilaya is crisscrossed by four mobile workshops of the ONAMA [National Agricultural Equipment Office] along with three cars belonging to the same organization for the purpose of repairing equipment on the spot. The most frequent breakdowns are due to broken transmission belts, which happens all too frequently. Some farms have taken the precaution of stockpiling spare parts. The intervention of cruising ONAMA teams has proved its effectiveness in cases of minor repairs. Whenever they are called by the presidents of farm enterprises, ONAMA technicians go to the place where the machine has broken down. It has been pointed out, however, that the rate of breakdowns has been reduced in the wilaya. Furthermore, the delivery of new harvesters has eliminated difficulties this season. It is worth noting, furthermore, that the training of the users of such machinery will make it possible, unquestionably, to extend the service life of the harvesters. It has been pointed out that improper handling and maintenance of such machinery is frequently the reason for breakdowns, the more so since the imported machinery is more sophisticated.

Lack of Manpower

Like the other wilayas, Setif Wilaya has not escaped a phenomenon which keeps repeating itself year after year on a large scale. Even though considered a lagging area in terms of harvesting and thrashing, because of its rugged topography, Setif Wilaya has shown an appreciable progress in crop growing. Nevertheless, this improvement cannot compensate for the strongly felt lack of manpower, regardless of an average level of mechanization (one harvester per 780 hectares). "The problem arises above all during peak periods," a grower said, adding that "we are forced to use retirees." Seasonal manpower is hard to recruit when the pay is 35 DA per day. Sixteen-year-old adolescents, high school students in particular, used during this exceptional period, may be available. However, they are handicapped by their inexperience for which they are silently blamed by their elders. Another grower has even pointed out with some bitterness that, "The young would rather swell the ranks of the unemployed or sell knick-knacks on the parallel market rather than work in the fields." However, the peasants are not caught short by this difficulty. They have organized themselves in order to complete the harvest on time. Occasionally they stop the harvesting and thrashing to haul the grain bags. Yet, this work is done by the rolling services of the Algerian Interprofessional Cereal Crop Office. Nevertheless, according to a grower, the office haulers do not risk going into the fields. The use of tractors, in addition to the fact that it requires additional manpower, is tiring and inefficient because slow.

On the other hand, there is the risk that, once hauled, the grain may not be fully stored under normal conditions of safety and hygiene. Whereas the crop has been assessed at two million quintals, storage capacities at the Setif Wilaya could accomodate no more than about 1.2 million quintals. Twelve storage units have been opened in Setif and nine in Bordj-Bou-Arreridj, whereas no such facilities are available at the Ain Oulmane, Ras El Oued and Bougaa dairas. The Ministry of Agriculture and Agrarian Revolution is considering some temporary means to remedy the shortage of storage facilities which, on the national scale, amounts to 6.5 million quintals. That is why open air storage is contemplated "under safe technical conditions."

The cereal-crop harvest of the 1980 season is considered encouraging. However, bearing in mind the already known results we already have a storage problem. What would happen should the output come closer to the targets?

The Problem of Overgrazing

Let us point out that the 1980 cereal-crop harvest is not exceptional in the least. Equally good harvests were recorded in 1972 and 1976. Even though the harvest benefitted from adequate precipitation, it was also the result of the work and the steady treatment of the soil. This should be intensified even further. The mastery of farming technology largely determines yields. This is exemplified by a variety of "Mexican wheat" introduced in a number of areas in the Setif Wilaya with poor results. This was due, on the one hand, to the difficulties in adapting this variety (which, in the best of cases, yields six quintals per hectare) and to the lack of follow-up work, as the official in charge of crop production of the Setif DWA explained. He also mentioned the need to instruct and inform the peasants. Following is one of numerous examples confirming the usefulness of this suggestion: Some growers continue to oppose the spreading of fertilizer from the air, believing that it was an error in the dosage of the fertilizers that resulted in the loss of serveral dozens of hectares. Others, nevertheless, recognize that this method yielded concluding results. Actually, the quality of output in areas where cultivation technology was applied is obvious. The contrast between it and crops to which lesser attention was paid is significant.

Within the framework of possibilities to improve the production of cereal crops, Mr Hachemi, from the National Institute for Major Crops in El Harrach, formulated the hypothesis of the development of a local variety. To accomplish this "experimental teams must be set up, for it takes 10 years to develop a local variety which could withstand the hard weather conditions and be adapted to the nature of the soil . . . The first experiment attempted in this area, said he, has begun to yield results only this year. "We must also struggle," he added firmly, "to have such innovations accepted." In accordance with weather and farming conditions, the natural reproduction of elements which would promote fertilizing of the soil is a feature which must be taken into consideration. However, this will be challenged by the moving of the flocks. The harvesting and thrashing will be followed by overgrazing. . . .

BRIEFS

NEW IMPETUS TO FISHING--(APS)--A meeting of cadres was held in the Office of the Secretary of State for Fishing yesterday morning, presided over by Benfreha Ahmed, member of the Central Committee and secretary of state for fishing. In remarks made on the occasion, Benfreha Ahmed recalled the recommendations of the Fourth Congress of the FLN and presidential guidelines, emphasized the strategic and economic importance of the fishing sector and outlined action to be taken to promote it within the framework of the 5-year plan. The secretary of state urged cadres to work in close cooperation with the nongovernmental sector with the single common objective of meeting the people's needs. "We must not only develop the state sector," he said, "but at the same time provide our aid to small fishermen because our goals are one: development of our 1,200-kilometer coast." Benfreha Ahmed emphasized the importance of effective decentralization and recommended the establishment and promotion of new fishing units in coastal governorates. "Our work must go beyond the bureaucratic compartmentalization and extend to the very field of production so as to make up for the lag allowed to accumulated in the sector for years," he added. KASMA COORDINATORS MEETING--Oran (APS)--The general situation of kasmas in the governorate was examined Thursday morning in Oran by kasma coordinators meeting under the gavel of Ali Riahi, deputy national commissioner of the party. In the course of the meeting, members of the assembly reviewed problems existing in the nine kasmas in the city of Oran and in the districts of Arzew and Mers El-Kebir. The major problems raised by the different coordinators had to do with social and cultural questions which citizens face. Among them are the drinking water supply, electrification, road repair, public hygiene and the limited number of cultural clubs. Members emphasized the predominant role which the APC [People's Communal Assembly] must play in settling these problems. In addition, dossiers will be prepared to take up the different points discussed so as to plan for the next meeting of the kasma-APC coordinating council. OPEN LETTER ACCUSES QOTBZADEH OF BETRAYING REVOLUTION

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 6 Sep 80 p 7

[Open letter by Hosseyn Talebi, computer specialist and member of the Islamic Association of the General Tire Company to Qotbzadeh]

[Text] At 11:00 pm of 2/6/59 [24 Aug 80], in a seemingly well-calculated TV program on channel 2, you (Mr Qotbzadeh), in a violently strong tone poured slander against popular and revolutionary elements. You, who with your well-tailored clothes and cleancut appearance, still smelling of French, British and American boutiques, and you, who once used to talk about the barefooted, are not perhaps aware that 70 percent of Iranians lacked the most elementary necessities of life, and some have not yet seen a pair of shoes or even ties. You are not perhaps yet aware that groups after groups of our peasants die because of lack of food and medicine, doctors and basic elementary health services.

Yes, had you looked at yourself in a mirror with your western clothes on, you would have never felt yourself to be so close to the Imam of the nation, who is a perfect example of the simple leader and supporter of the oppressed. You should have realized at the very beginning that your line and that of the Imam are 180 degrees apart. It seems as if you have not even seen the oppressed on a TV screen.

Unfortunately, we observed you on TV, how, with your innocent look, you tried to describe popular revolutionary institutions as being opposed to knowledge and specialization, even calling them reactionaries and sterile, while, at the same time, considering yourself to be as virtuous as Abazar, and the best, as a specialist. You described the action taken by the student followers of the Imam as nothing but show, claiming the hostage-taking had been condemned by all governments. To emphasize your point, you recounted an anecdote which indirectly slandered the students.

Mr Qotbzadeh--the man who is least concerned with people but supporting governments all the time--should be asked, was it not this revolutionary action by the militant moslem students which disgraced the criminal U.S. throughout the world? In addition to make the world hear the rightful cries of our innocent and oppressed people, the action made all the oppressed and innocent people and liberation organizations realize that the United States was not capable of doing a darn thing, and that the criminal superpowers could be resisted and brought to their knees through faith and clenched fists. Is the action taken by the militant students just a slogan? If so, why is the U.S. challenging us with all its might and why does it create events and incidents such as the unsuccessful air operation of Tabas and the recent abortive coup d'etat?

What is more important, Mr Qotbzadeh, views of governments which are dependent on the East or the West about the "spies" that you refer to them as hostages, or the opinion of oppressed nations and liberation movements? Which liberation movement has condemned the action of our militant student followers of the Imam? If you do not consider views of liberation movements as being important, then why is it that in connection with the breaking of diplomatic relations with Argentina, you reasoned that it did not occur because it had not been asked by the Argentine Liberation Movement?

Why is it that in matters that are not in the interest of the United States, you consider government views as important, and where the interest of the U.S. is involved (such as not breaking diplomatic relations with Argentina), views of liberation movements become important?

You are not even prepared, Mr Qotbzadeh, to call spies by their correct names and always refer to them as hostages.

Has not the Imam always supported these dear students and their action, Mr Qotbzadeh? If you are so close to the Imam as you claim to be, why are you challenging them (the students)?

Which institution and school of thought, Mr Qotbzadeh, has ever considered and claimed knowledge and specialization to be worthless? Even if they have, it is not the specialization that they condemn. It is the specialization of the likes of Amir-Entezams, Nazihs, Bakhtiars, the Savakis, the westernized and the conspiring aristocracy and supporters of committed governments. They most certainly do not have in mind the knowledge and specialization of such people as physicians who serve in rural areas and other honest and devoted individuals who strive in the direction of non-commitment, or the students who give their lives for their people, their Imam, and their ideology.

Mr Qotbzadeh, I am an educated specialist myself and must confess that I discovered my real worth after the revolution and through revolutionary and ideological institutions. It is true that this humble soul does not wear Yeves St. Laurent ties and Pierre Cardin clothes or shoes to match the color of my hair or tie, but I am capable of feeling the pains of a child who does not have clothes to wear or the cries of our sisters and brothers in the remote rural areas who are dying because of lack of medical attention. Under no circumstances can I tolerate the type of nonsense uttered by the likes of you, aimed at smearing all these actions.

Why don't you, Mr Qotbzadeh, leave this long-oppressed nation and those who enjoy popularity among them, alone? Why don't you heed the Imam's words, urging the support of the ideology, Islam and the revolutionary institutions?

You, Mr Qotbzadeh, who now insult the radio and the TV, perhaps remember that when you were running them, you used to appear on TV at least a few hours every week so that people could see you. You used to take part in radio debates often and said all you wanted to say. During the presidential elections, too, your photographs adorned the streets all over while you were making speeches about yourself at every occasion. Why don't you look back at your presidential election record? Why don't you admit that because of your thinking, your approach, behavior and your views on foreign policy, you have no bais among the masses. Why do you continue to spread so much poison, brother?

Your Aims

As an analytic viewer of your recent interview on channel 2, let me tell you bluntly, Mr Qotbzadeh, that these are your aims?

1. Attacking and weakening of individuals and institutions that enjoy popular support by slander and charges that they deny value of knowledge and specialization, thus depicting them as reactionary and simpleminded. (Nowhere have I read or heard that revolutionary institutions and responsible individuals have denied the value of knowledge and specialization, except from American, Israeli and London radios, and sometimes from local aristocrats.

2. To defend your nonideological foreign policy which caused our revolution remain unknown outside the country and consequently isolating Iran and preventing exportation of our revolution.

3. To convince people that hostage taking was condemned by all governments and, as a result, open the way for the release of the spies

4. To demonstrate that the fate of the Islamic Republic depended on the Imam, meaning that after the Imam was no more our revolution will face certain defeat and that people should pin their hopes on you and follow your line and obey you (while the Imam, in all his speeches, tries to create hope and confidence in people, and thus punches in the face of those coveting our revolution).

5. To discourage people who, in spite of the poisonous propaganda, join demonstrations and marches by the million, defending Islamic ideology and revolution, and prepare the way for intervention by superpowers.

6. To change the direction of attack on the U.S. and, as a result, help make the number one enemy and the great satan be forgotten through untimely and unusual attacks on the Soviet Union (while, in all his speeches, the Imam has always called the U.S. the principal enemy, and as long as Soviet intervention is not proven, it should not be attacked. This, of course, does not mean that we should lean to the East. As we observed, the Imam's response to the message of sympathy sent by Brezhnev in connection with Gachsaran tragic incident).

In conclusion, I would like to know why the responsible officials of channel 2 TV allow the airing of such unfair and well-planned programs? Is this freedom or a plot? If this was freedom, then why the revolutionary organ that were slandered were not allowed to be present during the same program so they could defend themselves?

BACKGROUND OF NEW PRIME MINISTER EXPLORED

Tehran JAVANAN-E EMRUZ in Persian 18 Aug 80 pp 6-7

[Text] Who Will Be in the Future Cabinet--Iran's First Post-Revolution Legal Government?

Where Does Raja'i Come From? How Old Is He? Where Was He Educated? What Were His Struggles? What Services Has He Rendered?

What Does the Man on the Street Say About Raja'i and What Are His Expectations from Raja'i's Government?

After a lot of tug of war and long drawn-out debates and suggesting many names as nominees for prime minister, finally Mr Raja'i was appointed Prime Minister upon the President's proposal and on the approval of the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Majles). Although Raja'i has been recognized as the Acting Minister of Education after the revolution, yet he is not quite known to the entire population and not a familiar face to the public. This [obscurity] is attributed to his piety, lack of hypocrisy and unpretentiousness. With a view to the importance of the momentus duty he is to be charged with as Prime Minister, we decided to present to our readers a glimpse of his life so that our dear readers may get better acquainted with him.

Born in Qazvin city region (shahrestan) in the Year 1312 of the Solar Hegira Calendar [21 Mar 1933 - 20 Apr 1934], Mohammad Ali Raja'i completed his primary education in his birthplace and received his six-year primary education completion certificate there. In 1327 [21 Mar 1948 - 20 Apr 1949] he left Qazvin for Tehran. In 1328 [21 Mar 1949 - 20 Apr 1950] he entered the Air Force and served there for five years, during which period he pursued his study in night classes until he received his high school graduation diploma. At the age of 21 he left the Air Force and enrolled at the Teachers Training College to obtain his Bachelor of Art degree. Upon completion of his study in 1339 [21 Mar 1961 - 20 Apr 1961] he was employed by the Ministry of Culture (Education). In 1342 [21 Mar 1963 - 20 Apr 1964] Mohammad Ali Raja'i became a member of the Freedom Movement of Iran (Nahzat-e Azadi) and became intensely involved in political activities. He was arrested and imprisoned the same year. After his prison term he taught at Kamal, Refah and Tarbiat schools. In 1353 [21 Mar 1974 - 20 Apr 1975] he was arrested for his link with the Sazeman-e Mojahedin-e Khalq and was turned over to the so-called Anti-Subversion Joint Committee. He was subjected to the longest interrogations and tortures in the solitary cells of the Committee prison for about 2-1/2 years. In 1354 [21 Mar 1975 - 20 Apr 1976] he dissociated himself from the Mojahedin-e Khalq while they were in the process of embracing Marxism. He started struggling against the Mojahedin for their "borrowed" ideology. Finally, at the crescendo of the Islamic Revolution of Iran in 1357 [21 Mar 1978 - 20 Apr 1979] he was released from prison and joined the tumultous sea of the resurgent people of Iran.

After his release from prison, Raja'i took up struggle again and in Mehr 1357 [23 Sep 1978 - 22 Oct 1979] he succeeded in officially creating the first underground Islamic teachers organization called the "Iranian Teachers Islamic Association." During the Revolution the Association played a major part in multiplying and distributing the Imam's statements as well those calling on educators to strike. Upon the Imam's return to Iran, he had the honor of playing host to the Imam at Refah School. In 1358 [21 Mar 1979 - 20 Apr 1980] Raja'i was appointed Acting Education Minister. A noteworthy feature of his incumbency was that he succeeded in making all schools public and uniform. Thus he took a step in the direction of equitable distribution of educational resources throughout the country. Of course, this policy met the opposition of some people at the time and even Mr Yadollah Sahabi, Minister of State in Bazargan's government--now a member of the Majles--issued a statement to call his action "the firming up of the footing of communism in Iran!" Another point of interest about him is that during the rule of the provisional government, the Revolutionary Council was receptive to the idea of appointing him Education Minister for his revolutionary stature. However, Mr Bazargan was against this promotion and the plan was not translated into practice; he remained Acting Minister of Education.

Finally, Mr Raja'i ran in the elections to the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Majles) and got elected as deputy from Tehran. Mr Raja'i is characterized by his fondness of Dr Shari'ati and of children to whom he takes quickly.

Concerning the formation of the cabinet, Mr Raja'i has said that whoever is to become a member of the cabinet should be a follower of the Imam. In this effort [for appointing the cabinet ministers] he will enlist the assistance and cooperation of all the revolutionary institutions. He relies particularly heavily on the Revolutionary Guards Corps and on the Reconstruction Campaign Organization. He says if he finds a suitable person there he [that person] shall be appointed minister. This is a very positive and hope-inspiring point, one which is indicative of the fact that he abides by the statement of the Imam and intends to appoint young, faithful revolutionaries. It shows that he pays attention to the young people who have proved their revolutionary sincerity afield, in the arena of martyrdom, in the farthest villages of Iran.

Of course, there is a lot of talk making the rounds. But one of the persons named as a most likely candidate for membership in Raja'i's cabinet is Dr Assadi, an old friend of Raja'i's over the past 15 years. Dr Assadi himself has spent a long time in prison. It is narrated about him that when he heard the news of the arrest of his daughter, he took it most stoically, so much so that the only effect on his normal daily routine was that he missed his morning exercise on that day. From among other likely members of Raja'i's cabinet mention can be made of Dr Sorush, currently the Minister of Energy; mention is also made of Musa Kalantari. It is said that Jalaleddin Farsi is slated to become the Minister of Foreign Affairs or of National Defense in the cabinet--but this is not highly (because the President is against it). Others named as likely candidates are Shams Ardakani, currently Iran's Ambassador to Kuwait, for Foreign Minister, Mirsalim for filling the position of Interior Minister, and Chamran for Defense Minister and Zali for Agriculture Minister.

The President's View

The selection of the Prime Minister was concomitant with some differences of views which made the process very difficult. But agreement was arrived at over this problem in the long haul. It is in place at this juncture to air the opinion of President Bani-Sadr of Mr Raja'i. In his letter to the Majles about Mr Raja'i, he has described Mr Raja'i's characteristics as such: ". . . As far as his adherence to the Islamic ideology, sincerity and integrity are concerned I accept him and rate him even more highly than the other candidates. But Mr Raja'i is the kind of person to whom you expound what you want him to do and he may even acknowledge his acceptance, but when he leaves the meeting he pursues his original thoughts. Secondly, his knowledge of national affairs is scant. Therefore, his administration is bound to be weak."

However, as it has been reported in the news that the misunderstandings that existed between Bani-Sadr and Raja'i were removed after a meeting they held.

Opinion of Tehran Prayer Leader

The Prayer Leader of Tehran, Mr Khamene'i, on the Fetr Festivity, had the following to say about Mr Raja'i: "He is fortunately a decisive, devout and zealous person. I do not forget the tortures and hardships he suffered over months on end in the horrid prisons and torture chambers of the previous regime. After the Islamic Republic was established--thank God--he has been engaged in tasks, services and activities."

Hashemi-Rafsanjani's View

One of the key problems, after the formation of the government, is the harmony required between the government and the Majles. But Mr Hashemi Rafsanjani, the Speaker of the Majles spoke about this matter in an interview and said that with the uniform mood governing the majority of the Majles deputies and Mr Raja'i, the progress of the matters would be facilitated.

What Do the People Say?

We asked a number of people their views on Mr Raja'i's Prime Ministry. The following are their views:

Mr Khodai, Primary School Teacher:

[Question] What is your view about Mr Raja'i as Prime Minister?

[Answer] Well, I believe that I cannot find in Mr Raja'i's person the good and competent prime minister I want. He is a revolutionary individual but he is not as incisive in foreign affairs as he should be. Dr Peyman would have been a better choice.

[Question] What Do You Expect From Him?

[Answer] Security and welfare must be ensured. Primarily the security and secondly the livelihood of the workers, farmers, merchants and, categorically, all strata should be ensured.

[Question] Which persons should in your opinion be selected for membership in the cabinet?

[Answer] Persons who are devoted to the Revolution; people who can preserve freedom in the country.

Hamid Reza Tayyebi, Student:

[Question] What is your view about Mr Raja'i as Prime Minister?

[Answer] Were there to be so many differences about the appointment of Mr Raja'i, it would have been better to nominate Mr Jalaloddin Farsi. Mr Raja'i is a good person but I am not so confident that he will achieve anything. All the same I hope he can choose good ministers.

[Question] What do you expect from him?

[Answer] The most critical problem which has been a cause of worry for the people is the difference between the Majles, the government and the President. I believe that the first thing he should do is to create the needed harmony.

[Question] Which persons should in your opinion be selected for membership in the cabinet?

[Answer] Mostly from among revolutionary youths. For instance it would be really excellent if they were the same type of persons as the students following the line of the Imam.

Mr Mahmud Reza Najafian, Office Worker

[Question] What is your view about Mr Raja'i's Prime Ministry?

[Answer] Raja'i is a known person. But does Mr Bani-Sadr accept him or is he forced on Mr Bani-Sadr as his prime minister? They can work together only if their relationship is good. Otherwise, there will be filibustering. I feel uneasy about such a possibility.

[Question] What do you expect from him?

[Answer] First and foremost, the nation's security takes precedence over all other considerations. So long as there is no security in the country things will be done half-baked. Another issue of importance is unity, accord and harmony. If there do not prevail, nothing gets done. Even if the statements of various groups vary they should be integrated.

Civil Servant (prefers anonymity)

[Question] What is your view about Mr Raja'i's premiership?

[Answer] Raja'i's selection means Bani-Sadr has been defeated. I do not think this is in the interest of the people. To be Islamic and religious is not enough. It is also important to be capable to run the affairs of the country.

[Question] What do you expect from him?

[Answer] I do not believe he can put any plan into effect because there is a conflict between the Majles, the Prime Minister and the President.

[Question] Which persons should, in your opinion, be selected for membership in the cabinet?

[Answer] The cabinet should be effective, efficient and pursuant.

Mr Mohsen Zabih, Bank Employee

[Question] What is your view of Mr Raja'i's premiership?

[Answer] I think that he is a good person and a proper choice for this position.

[Question] What do you expect from him?

[Answer] He must treat the path of true Islam. He should tend to the conditions of agriculture and economy. He should also put an end to the incoordination among various groups.

[Question] Which persons should, in your opinion, be selected for membership in the cabinet?

[Answer] Persons who apprehend the grievances of the workers and tend to them.

Ms Fatemi, Student

[Question] What is your opinion of Mr Raja'i as Prime Minister?

[Answer] When Mr Raja'i was Minister of Education, apart from a number of things that he did right, his performance was in most cases not correct. I do not think he is fit for the position of Prime Minister.

[Question] What do you expect from him?

[Answer] To provide jobs for the jobless. To curb price hikes. To lower housing costs. Briefly, to solve the problems people face in their day-to-day living.

[Question] In your opinion, which persons should be selected as members of the cabinet?

[Answer] People-oriented persons who listen to others, who substantiate their opinions, who can drive home their message.

Mr Abdolkhaleq Paki, Jobless High School Graduate, now vending cigarettes.

[Question] What is your opinion of Mr Raja'i's premiership?

[Answer] Mr Raja'i is very suitable for prime ministry because he is in the line of the Imam and of the Revolution.

[Question] What do you expect from him?

[Answer] To eradicate unemployment, later on to bring about security; to do away with the high costs of living.

[Question] Which persons, in your opinion, should be selected for being on the cabinet?

[Answer] Persons who are competent and in the Imam's line.

Mr Abbas Najafpur (an old man who says he has been a peddler for 40 years).

Sir, what can I say? What is it to me who is whose prime minister? They appoint whoever they want. I mind my own business here and win my bread. Why should I care who becomes the prime minister? And who makes him one? I have been leading this very life style for 40 years. So many prime ministers came and went. What did they do for me? Only promises. All gave but promises. So many prime ministers were appointed and dismissed. Which one of them ever worked for the good of the deprived class? Which one of them paid any heed to my plea for help? This one will be one of the same run. There was Mr Bazargan who put us in the lurch with his step-by-step policy. What has changed for us? Mohammad Reza's statue has been pulled down but its pedestal is standing. They have left the doors of the banks open so that the rich can send the monies out; these are the monies of this poor nation. Why? If the prime minister wants to be effective he must work for the benefit of the people, for the benefit of the lower class, lower income people. He must exterminate the species of the traitorous big shots. Otherwise nothing will work.

The voice of the old man rings in one's ears. As if his cries echo the wishes and hopes of the people. Yes, Mr Raja'i! So many prime ministers have come and gone that the nation has become indifferent to their coming and to their going alike. The people seek something else in you. They want you to be revolutionary and capable. After years of agony and suffering, our people want to regain, under the aegis of Islam, a decent life befitting the dignity of man. Therefore, no step-by-step policies! No compromise! We should act in a revolutionary manner. We should cast aside differences. That is what pains our people. As the Imam put it, "Is it your father's legacy for which you are wrangling?" You should shed the quarrels and heed the problems of the people. As our worldly wise old man said, "The generation of the traitors and of the big shots must be exterminated. Each minute of our time after the revolution counts as valuable as years. To waste even one minute of it would be ingratitude and a waste. It is throwing to the wind the hopes of the followers of the faith. We wish you good luck in the great mission that you have undertaken. We hope that you will succeed in your efforts in the path of God and in following the Imam of the Moslems.

EFFORTS TO PACIFY FARS PROVINCE UNDERWAY

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 30 Aug 80 p 11

[Article: "There Is No Difference Between Khans and Robbers, and Their Slightest Move Will Be Put Down. The Activities of Khans and Highway Robbers Are Not To Be Confused With the Tribesmen--The Governor of Fars"]

The tribes and other oppressed classes of Fars do not condone the disruption of security in this province.

Eighty percent of the province's construction budget has been allocated to the villages.

[Text] Shiraz--The night before last several armed thieves fired upon and damaged a highway patrol car of the "Baba Hajji" pass on the Shiraz-Kovar road. The highway patrol personnel reported the incident to the Gendarmerie and the Revolutionary Guards so that the guard and the military could go to the area immediately and take steps to clean up the aforesaid pass and road. Reports arriving from Shiraz indicate that the Gendarmerie and the Revolutionary Guards are now pursuing the lawless armed attackers and that the sentries have been reinforced at Kovar, and people have been sent to help. An officer of the Shiraz Gendarmerie regiment, while confirming this news, announced: During this holdup the thieves stripped the passengers of one of the automobiles.

Highway Robbers Are Not To Be Confused With the People

In a press interview, Mohammad Bani-Habibi, Governor of Fars, also commented on the adventures of a handful of feudalist servants and people out to get more than their share on the province's roads. Mr. Habibi spoke first concerning the current year's construction programs in the province of Fars: Eighty percent of the Fars construction budget is allocated to the villages. In some areas, such as Lorestan, up to 85 percent of the construction budget is allocated to districts and villages.

In answer to a question concerning plans afoot in Firuzabad to stage a showing of activity in the area, the governor said: We are not optimistic about those who have surrounded themselves with riflemen, but until they make a move of some kind we will merely observe them.

We will respond decisively, however, to the slightest move against the sovereignty of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The only thing we are trying to do is make a distinction between highway robbers and common tribesmen, so that if the necessity should arise for military action, the government will not actually take these steps against tribesmen, but against those who are doing things aimed at destroying security. We advise our brother tribesmen that opposition to the Islamic government and blocking the roads is really opposition to the Imam and Islam, and the people of Fars. Military and law enforcement authorities will not permit such aggression.

There Is No Difference Between Khans and Highway Robbers

Concerning recent road robberies in the vicinities of main roads, the governor of Fars said: Highway robbery in the Province of Fars did not begin during the period of Islamic rule. Existing files show that highway robbery has been going on for years. We have seen no clear relationship between recent road robberies and the tribal khans, but in any case our view is that there is no difference between tribal khans and highway robbers. According to the governor of Fars, a decision has been made in the province security council to confront all kinds of highway robbery, whether related to the khans or not, with measures that have already been planned.

The governor of Fars asked the people to help government officials identify thieves in areas where these robberies are likely to take place. In another portion of his remarks, the governor of Fars commented on the unseasonal movements of some tribesmen: The unseasonal movement and the kinds of rumors circulating among tribesmen cannot be unrelated to persons who, in the name of khans, or on any other pretext have organizations and whose interests in the Islamic government have been threatened.

GUARDS ATTRIBUTE INTELLIGENCE NETWORK TO ADM MADANI

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 18 Aug 80 p 2

/Article: "Firuzabad, Army of Guards Commander: Madani Has Formed a Comprehensive Network of Tribal Chiefs in the South"/

/Text/ Dr Masha'ollah A'in, commander of the Firuzabad army of guards of the Islamic revolution,stated, in a conversation concerning the untimely migration of the Fars tribes," Following the disclosure documents on them, the tribal chiefs and spies have decided to form an overall system of chiefs in the southern region under the leadership of Seyyed Ahmad Madani, another American spy, and to foment trouble in this region."

Regarding the reason for the untimely migration of the tribes, he said, "the American spy-chieftains, that is, Khosrow, Naser and Abdollah Qashqa'i, following the disclosure of their espionage documents, have decided to set up a comprehensive system of chieftains in the southern region under the leadership of Seyyed Ahmad Madani, another American spy, and stir up disturbances in the souther, southwestern and southeastern area of Iran in the near future, thereby proving their devotion to their American masters. They have thus compelled the Moslem tribes to set out toward the warm areas directly and indirectly, by spreading rumors and creating an atmosphere of suppression and terror."

He added, "For example, they have spread the rumor 'if you stay along the borders the army of guards will bomb you.' They have also declared 'Anyone who stays along the borders and does not migrate to the warm areas is our enemy,' and in this manner the majority of the downtrodden masses of the tribes, in spite of their own desire, have been compelled to leave the borders a month and a half before the seasonal time and move their livestock and homes from the roadsides and their weapons from the hills toward the warm areas. The chieftains' agents falsely told them 'the army of guards has the intention of disarming you,' and have caused the tribes to move their arms from the hills or transfer them to the hills by means of these rumors."

Dr A'in added, "As a consequence, the suffering children and toiling women of the Moslem tribes are moving to the warm areas in the hot season, enduring heat and discomfort and bearing much suffering."

Responding to a question on the plans the government had for the welfare of the tribes, the commander of guards of Firuzabad said, "Because of the presence of the treasonous hireling agents who have been present in that region for the past 15 years, and probably are also there now, the government has unfortunately not yet done anything for the tribes, but now, with the approval of 200 million tomans in credits for the implementation of welfare, health and development plans for the tribes, if this money is spent in a revolutionary way plans can be drawn up for the welfare of the tribes. In this connection, we propose to the executive authorities of the province that they quickly spend these sums, with the participation of the committed young Moslems of the tribes, in order to eliminate deficiencies in the tribal areas and make roads, water, livestock fodder and welfare available to the tribes."

On where the tribal chiefs are now and what they are doing, Dr A'in, the Firuzabad guards commander, said, "At the present time the chieftain spies are ensconced in a mobilization area situated in the hills to the northwest of Firuzabad with about 180 armed people. They control an area covering a radius of 20 kilometers and recently even stopped holy war of reconstruction automobiles in that area."

When asked "in view of the atmosphere in the region, do you predict that incidents will occur in the region in the future or not?" Dr A'in replied, "If the American chieftains' centers of conspiracy are not crushed quickly, scattered disturbances will arise in the future. For this reason the recommendation of the Firuzabad army of guards to the honorable Moslem tribes is that they pay no heed to rumors from the hireling chiefs and that they continue their migration without fear of being disarmed. I give assurance that the Firuzabad army has absolutely no intention of disarming the downtrodden tribes, is always brothers with it, and will mobilize all its resources in order to help them."

On what the tribal chiefs' agitations in the region were, he said, "The chiefs are constantly making rumors and are trying to assemble greater forces by creating an atmosphere of oppression and fear so that they may perhaps be able to attain their evil designs. However, they are falling on deaf ears, because the Moslem tribes will never perform an act against Islam and the country. With the help of God the committed Moslem tribes themselves will dig these chiefs' grave."

Regarding the persons he considered responsible for the incidents in the region, he said "Khosrow, Naser, Abdollah, Malek Mansur, Daryush and Vereydun Qashqa'i and also Seyyed Ahmad Madani."

Responding to a question on the program he had for strengthening the army, the commander of the Firuzabad guards said, "Programs are being carried out which are at present secret but the mobilization of the tribes and the people themselves against these American mercenaries heads the list of our activities."

As to whether aid is given to the Qashqa'i chieftains in the form of arms, equipment and financial affairs, Dr A'in said, "A quantity of arms and equipment, including some heavy weapons, recently arrived from the southern ports for the chieftains, but their volume is not yet significant. The criminal America is intending to give aid in the form of money and weapons to the network of chieftains in the south; in this matter Seyyed Ahmad Madani, the American spy, is carrying out an important role."

Regarding the army's cooperation with the people, he said, "The people in the region, especially the tribes, are cooperating with us to the utmost and are even in the process of forming an army organized through the tribes themselves to crush the spy chieftains. They constantly visit us and state 'Give us arms and we ourselves will strip off the beards of these mercenaries in the area.'"

MAJLES MEMBER DENOUNCES FEUDAL LANDLORDS

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 18 Aug 80 p 3

/Article: "Most Arable Lands in Khodabandeh Are in the Hands of Big Feudalists"/

/Text/ After the views of the people's spokesmen in the Islamic Consultative Council were received regarding the presentation of their electoral districts' issues and problems and appropriate recommendations and solutions in this matter, Hojjatoleslam Mohsen Rahami, parliamentary representative of the District of Khodabandeh, who is a communications engineer in the microwave field, has studied in the Physics Department of the National University and is now a student in the Faculty of Law and Political Science of Tehran University, described the problems and demands of the people of his district in a conversation with KEYHAN'S correspondent.

At the outset, referring to the geographical location of this town he said, "Our area is one of the forgotten regions in the nation, to the point where and when I stated in the parliament that I was the representative of Khodabandeh, a group of people did not even know where Khodabandeh was. Ours is a deprived area surrounded by Abhar, Zanjan, Bijar, Qazvin, and Hamadan and has an area of more than 9,000 square kilometers, 400 villages, a town and a population of close to 200,000."

The representative of Khodabandeh then proceeded to describe the problems and needs of his electoral district and added, "The people of Khodabandeh and the villages around it derive their living from agriculture in a situation where the lands are in the hands of the feudalists and the so-to-speak heavies of the area. Since the Province of Zanjan is basically an area of descendants of tribal chiefs and feudalists, you cannot find a village where a tribal chief or feudalist does not have most of the fertile land at his disposal. On the other hand, since the people cannot live by other means and do not have an adequate amount of land or water, they are thus compelled to go to the towns and the capital to work in the factories and factory centers. Most times not only do these migrations not provide the wherewithal for their comfort and tranquility in the towns--to the contrary, as well as creating social problems, they cause the level of agricultural and livestock output to decline noticeably. I recommend that the government put the establishment of industrial centers in this region at the top of its future developmental measures."

The representative of Khodabandeh then continued, "There is not even one hospital or one hospital bed for the region's population of 200,000. If someone needs a doctor or on occasion an operation he must be taken by minibus to Zanjan and a basic problem existed and still exists even in this matter, and that is the lack of ambulances. There is just one ambulance for the entire area and that is in the central clinic of the town. Aside from this, one can also count the clinics themselves on one's fingers and, again, those that exist lack adequate health facilities. Of course, important and vital as the consequences of these deficiencies are, it is clear to everyone that problems are created for the people when there are not numerous clinics."

He then criticized the state of education in his region and pointed out that there is one secondary school in the entire area of Khodabandeh and most of the time even that is closed because it does not have a principal and a teaching staff. There are also four or five guidance schools in the region; again, because educational resources especially teachers and principals do not exist, they are always facing problems. The cultural level of the region is therefore very low and one can perhaps estimate the proportion of illiterates of between 95 and 100 percent. It is natural that as long as this problem, that is, illiteracy exists, subsequent issues and problems will not be solved either.

The representative of Khodabandeh then referred to other problems of his electoral district and stated "The problem of the lack of a suitable road for rural inhabitants is more or less similar in all the deprived areas of our country; in our area this problem unfortunately seems many times greater and more intense, to the point where it has caused many resources which could be available to the villagers from the centers of the province to remain lacking and excluded. Then the issue of water, electricity and health, are also, in their own place, individually among the basic problems of the region. The problem of the lack of potable water is one of the main issues and one of the highest priority demands of the people of the Khodabandeh region and the villages around it."

Continuing his statements, talking about a small portion of the measures of the holy war of reconstruction in the Khodabandeh area, he complained about this institution and said, "The holy war of reconstruction has not been as active as it should have been in our area. Except for three or four cases where superficial activities have been carried out, no other measures have taken place. Of course the budget allocated in this field is also a problem, since the credits which have been set aside for the area of Khodabandeh and outskirts are very minor in comparison with the needs and requirements of the people. If adequate credits are set aside for the region of Khodabandeh, the conditions and manpower for creating many agricultural and livestock complexes also exist in adequate amounts and I think that this is the best way to prevent rural inhabitants from leaving for the towns. Therefore we hope that investigation will also be made into this matter in the near future."

The representative of Khodabandeh then proceeded to describe the issue of security forces and the provision of security in his electoral district. Pointing out that few guards are engaged in carrying out their duties in the region as a whole, and that there is no sign of a committee, gendarmerie post or police in the area, he requested that the responsible authorities take immediate steps to strengthen the security and policy institutions and perforce the army of guards in this region. He pointed out "This matter possesses special importance since due to its special location Khodabandeh is at all times exposed to likely dangers of aggression and counterrevolutionary conspiracy. Of course I have mentioned this matter to the honorable minister of the interior, the revolutionary public prosecutor and the other relevant officials. On this accasion, the area is also faced with a problem in terms of judiciary courts. For example we in our region just have a district court, and the district court, in light of the judiciary laws of the past, cannot respond to the needs of the people. This region still does not have a revolutionary public prosecutor, an Islamic law judge or a Friday emam. Therefore matters related to law cases are referred to Abhar and since the revolutionary public prosecutor rarely goes to that town either big problems have always been and are being created for the people from this standpoint. Another problem which I consider it necessary to mention here is that of the telephone. In spite of the existence of a population whose statistics I already mentioned, Khodabandeh is deprived of an automatic telephone; the telephone which has been installed in the region is of the magneto variety and is usually out of order. So this is a problem which is added to the others, and so on."

In conclusion, expressing hope that the government and the parliament would devote priority in their plans to propounding and implementing construction and development plans in the rural areas, he said, "Certainly providing a living for the people, especially the rural inhabitants, goes along with Islamic justice, and the two complement one another. I believe that there is no possibility of establishing Islamic justice without providing a living for rural inhabitants; in such a situation, there is no justice and I will not consider the Islamic government to be more than a verbal state. We have promised people everywhere that what has happened so far, where justice has not been done, one should not consider the fault of Islam. God willing we will overcome the problems with the cooperation in the near future of the people and the Islamic Consultative Council."

ARMY UNDERTAKES PAY REFORM

Tehran KEYHAN in Persoan 3 Sep 80 p 16

[Article: "In An Exclusive Interview With KEYHAN, Brigadier General Fallahi Announced: "A Plan for Increasing Salaries and Redressing Inequalities in the Army"]

[Text] The salaries and benefits of retired and active duty armed forces personnel in the Islamic Republic of Iran are being increased in order to redress existing inequalities.

Brigadier General Valiollah Fallahi, acting chief of the Joint Army Staff of the Islamic Republic of Iran, said while announcing this news during a four-hour interview with KEYHAN: Bills concerning increases in salaries and benefits, and redressing inequality and discrimination among army personnel have been approved by Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, President of the Republic and Commander in Chief, and have been submitted to the Islamic Consultative Assembly by the Ministry of Defense for drafting and approval.

During the announcement of the salary increase for armed forces personnel in the Islamic Republic, Brigadier General Fallahi said: With studies that we have put into effect we have eliminated all forms of inequality. Concerning the amount of the salary increase for armed forces personnel, Brigadier General Fallahi said: The bill for increasing salaries of armed forces personnel is under careful study, as are all aspects of the Ministry of Defense. He said: Since this bill had already been prepared before the official beginning of Majles activities, the Revolutionary Council has submitted it to the Majles for drafting and approval. Fallahi added: The annual payroll increase for personnel in the Islamic Republic of Iran is about 12 billion tumans. Among retired people, the salaries of about 300 retired people will be increased by 30 percent, meaning they will collect about 80 percent of their active duty salaries. The acting chief of the Joint Army Staff of the Islamic Republic then added: The bill for salary increases will eliminate the only existing salary inequalities among armed forces personnel in the Islamic Republic. Fallahi said: In the new bill differences are only related to academic attainment or years of service. We have, however, taken a look at the value of academic credentials.

Salaries of personnel in the Islamic Republic will be increased on this basis. Fallahi added: Armed forces personnel drew various benefits. For example, technicians drew technical salaries, Air Force personnel had special privileges on the ground, the same as pilots or people working aboard warships. He said: All special privileges will be removed on the basis of the new bill. It will be left to the discretion of the army to distribute between 20 to 80 percent of salaries as technical, hardship, and hazardous occupation pay. In this way some of the inequalities will disappear. He added: Until this bill is approved, we have also submitted a number of other bills for eliminating inequalities. For example, after the triumph of the revolution we noticed that burial rights were unequal between non-commissioned officers, soldiers, and officers, meaning the officers drew the most, followed in succession by non coms and enlisted men. How bad it was that in the Islamic Republic of Iran, burial rights, which are a totally separate thing, and are absolutely religious and Islamic, should be unequal.

He also said: Allowances for food, quarters and clothing were also unequal between enlisted men, non coms, and officers. We also equalized these, and in order to redress all forms of discrimination and unequality, all officers' and NCO clubs have been consolidated. In another segment of his remarks Fallahi said concerning the changes that would be introduced into the army system by the new organization: Renovations by the new organization are from within, meaning it is a process that will guide the army closer toward a "divine" system. These renovations will place the army squarely on the side of the Imam, Islam, and the nation. If these basic changes of the new organization are completed, and we hope for that, and we must also strive to complete them, the army will not be so vulnerable. It will be an army that is not subject to influence, and a religious, Islamic, people's or in other words, a unified army, cohesive from within. An army that is cohesive from within will not take it as a major problem if its tools of war and weaponry are not in good condition. This is a problem when the army is not cohesive from within. If the organization renovation from within which has begun is completed, we will then be able to change the nature of war, meaning we will be able to carry on irregular activities, and we could fight in that way for months or years. In the army we want to form, if it is formed, it will have characteristics that are not outdated. The closer we come to war, and beyond war, the army will be more revolutionary and more aggressive. Meaning if the equipment deteriorates its spirit will not deteriorate. Such an army is a people's army, a well-established and enduring army. The army will not die. Such an army is within the nation, of the same color as the nation. Such an army can back the nation, and conversely the nation can support such an army. Such an army can begin reconstruction, and when such an army is founded it will be possible to sever dependence entirely. Otherwise, an army with ties on the outside can never completely sever dependence and it will not be an army that can change the nature of war. An army that is cohesive from within can be a military university for the nation, and within such an army the nation can learn. Solidarity between the army and the nation in such circumstances will be a true and spiritual solidarity, and this is the result of such organizational renovation.

FORMER SUPERVISOR DENOUNCES DECISION ON CLOSING UNIVERSITIES

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 20 Aug 80 p 6

/Article by Dr Mohammad Malaki: "Open Letter to the Revolutionary Cultural Council: Special Characteristics of Islamic University from the Doctrinal Viewpoint"/

/Text/ When schools were started up in Iran through the efforts of the Great Amir and others, so that sciences such as physics and chemistry could be taught in these schools, what did they do, brother, when they resorted to the weight of religion to impose a class stamp on education and a faction rose to combat this activity and propagandized among the religious masses which had been able to put their children in school, stating "People, why are you staying quiet? They want to turn your children into irreligious polytheists, they are talking about chemistry, physics, sulphuric acid and similar matters in the schools, these ideas came from the West, and do you know what sulphuric acid means? It means that there is no God." The result of this pre-arranged plan was that most of the children of grocers and the like pursued their fathers' jobs lest they become irreligious, and the children of the top brass and the kings and politicians filled up the new schools and became doctors, engineers, specialists and politicians, seizing all the affairs of the country in their own hands, dealing in such a way with religion, the country and the people for about 100 years that people still feel the pain of their yoke on their backs. Today nobody is saying, "Look, chemistry and sulphuric acid did not come from the West and do not mean the negation of God but are rather the proof of God." The father of the science of chemistry, Jahir ibn Hayyan, was a Moslem scholar and, at a time when the Moslems considered the quest of knowledge, understanding, and the search for science to be an Islamic obligation, even if that was in the remotest corner of the world ("seek knowledge even if it is in China"), at a time when the leader of our creed, Emam Ja'far Sadeq, established the first Islamic university and established the bases of free discussion and the confrontation of ideas for us, and at a time when scholars like Jabir ibn Hayyan (to whose name the world of science still gives reverence) transformed society, no scholar in the West had the right to think except within the confines of the sacred book established by the church, and people burned free thinking scholars and intellectuals alive. What did they do, brother, when, after the passage of several centuries, the situation changed to the point where, with the arrival of Western spies at the Safavid court, influence at the court, and the transformation of Alawite Shiism to Safavid Shiism, the scholars were the only persons who studied religion, and even that within the religion limited to the Safavid Schiism, and renunciation, threats and legal slaughter took the place of free discussion and the confrontation of ideas--to the point where the meaning of sulphuric acid became the denial of the existence of God? When pelple saw that they were compelled to open universities and higher institutes, even in this country, whether they liked it or not, all their efforts went to endowing the universities with two special characteristics, Western orientation and a class character. During the more than 40 years which have passed since the establishment of Iran's first university (the University of Tehran), the satanic regime, exploiting various techniques, tried to keep the universities from belonging to the people and stinted no form of treason to this end. But can one stop the movement of history? It was no longer the children of the prominent who occupied the universities--rather, the number of students who rose from the heart of the society increased year by year, to the point where almost all the students consisted of children of the middle and lower classes and the satanic government, subservient to imperialism and capitalism, prohibited any kind of radical structural change which would prevent the universities from being dependent on the West and would allow the universities to return "to themselves." It created a university whose job became to waste students' time on subjects which for the most part were not useful in meeting the needs of society and to give degrees whose recipients had no other distinction than to sit behind administrative desks.

The mistake of the political figures following the triumph of the revolution: The people rebelled against the satanic regime and were victorious. The imperial regime should have been replaced by the Islamic regime, which would only have been possible through a basic change. The temporary government came into office and the prime minister, before starting work with the University of Tehran, presented his statements to the people. He was not an unknown person; everyone knew what his thoughts and ideas were. The sentence "my ignorant brother, come and be free" indicated his policy and thinking in the government.

In those days no one objected or stated that the revolution would get nowhere with this conduct. I do not intend to defend anyone, since when Eng Bazargan was in power I myself made the most intense criticisms of him, but today, now that every party is subjecting him to attack, I consider it my moral, human and Islamic duty to state the facts. To those who today are apparently preparing a court to try the revolutionary government /I say/ are Bazargan and the temporary government alone responsible for the mistakes of the past? Why were you silent about the people who were running the country behind the scenes? If treason was committed, many indeed participated in it. Eng Bazargan's big sin was to say, from the first day, "This is what I am," and never claim to be revolutionary. As if you performed much revolutionary activity after the resignation of the temporary government! Brothers, seek council with yourselves awhile and consider that God is the witness and the supervisor of your acts. I will now leave this question to its proper place, where I have statements to make in this regard. In any event, following the triumph of the revolution, we did not make much haste to open every place up and return work to its ordinary state, and not much insistence was placed on keeping the university open. At that time, benefiting from the revolutionary spirit of the people, we could have closed the doors of the university for a few months, sent professors, students and employees to rural areas and towns on such jobs as roadbuilding--something which other revolutionary countries have done--and organized a plan to transfer the university into an Islamic university during that period, so that, after about 16 months of the revolution had elapsed, the emam would not have cried out that "the universities must be unified," "the universities must be for us ourselves" and "the universities must become Islamic." The universities were kept open while there was no possibility of continuing the previous situation any longer; we began as many efforts toward structural changes in the universities as possible and, in spite of all obstacles, took steps in this direction to which reference will be made later.

What Have You Done To Islamize the Universities So Far?

Through a revolutionary act, they decided to close the doors of the universities and higher institutes, in accordance with a plan previously drawn up. It was their decision that this act would take place in May. The president intervened and, at a meeting which the university people did not attend, it was decided that the universities would be shut down on 5 June. No matter how much we cried out that they should not do this, that they should close the universities a month later at the most so that a large number of students could graduate and go to work for the country and not go about in a daze, they not only paid attention to our words but also laid the charge of traitor, counterrevolutionary, anti-emam and so forth against us.

Brothers Come, for the sake of God, out of friendship for the people, for those hundreds of thousands of families who have become vexed by the fact that the universities and higher institutes are closed today, and explain whether the act of closing the universities was a revolutionary act along the path of the revolution or a political factional act for private objectives. I, as a teacher, who for about 20 years in Tehran University has had active participation in all the occurrences which have taken place in that center, am ready to prove that the shutdown of universities like the University of Tehran will only turn out to the benefit of the counterrevolution, and that not only will it not solve problems in the future but the fact that these scientific institutions are closed will add to the burden of problems with every day. What steps has the Cultural Revolution Staff taken so far to Islamize the universities? Except that you sent a questionnaire to the teaching staff, which was not expected of the revolutionary staff, moreover a staff selected by the emam of the nation, after this period after about 2 months had passed? Would it not have been better, instead of asking questions about matters which are all reflected in the teaching staff's file and instead of wasting a number of people's time in studying the response to the questionnaires, to have referred to the individuals' files, so that it could be known what the investigations on everyone was, what educational and other work they have performed so far, and what use is being made of these persons in current revolutionary conditions, then to have given a judgment on everyone, according to his type of specialization so that some action might be taken to advance the revolution? Would it not for example have been better had they asked me, whose specialization is nutrition, "now that the university is closed and your presence in the university cannot be benefited from now, go to Sistan and Baluchestan, to the factories, schools, mosques and so forth, and teach people what they should do to avoid food poisoning or how they should keep their water and food so it does not become rotten and polluted."

Would it not have been better, during this period, for you at least to determine the special characteristics of the Islamic university so that people could start planning for all those whose hearts beat for Islam and the revolution? To what extent do you know the people who are participating in the commissions? Let them not be smart people who have made 180 degree turns and who are the same as those up to yesterday who participated in sessions investigating the problems of the white revolution and today are planning in meetings for educational revolution and creating Islamic universities. Why instead of a dialogue of the deaf don't you raise these questions with the people? The fact that the universities and higher institutions are closed is not a small matter. It is linked to the lives of about a million families. Why don't you act in a revolutionary way? In your opinion is closing and destroying or building and opening more revolutionary? Come first determine the objective, then overturn the obstacles to reaching the goal, and build and pave the way to arrive at it.

What Class Suffers from the Fact That the Universities Are Closed?

I do not think that anyone would doubt that ours is still a society of classes. The downtrodden remain downtrodden and the haughty remain haughty. The regretful palaces and the regretful huts are still in place. The several-thousand-square-meter houses and the several-million-square-meter palaces are many and the shacks and damp rooms in the process of collapsing which are homes to families of many people are abundant. If you stand for a few minutes to get a bus along Mosaddegh Avenue or Dr Shari'ati Avenue, not a few, but dozens of luxury cars, costing thousands of tomans, will pass by you. While most people hope for 2 sirs of frozen meat, groups of people provide fresh meat, meat without gristle, for their dogs and cats. In an environment where the biggest entertainment and recreation for a large segment of the people of Tehran is to go to the parks, pass along Mosaddegh Avenue and go under the grees of Behesht-e Zahra by pickup or truck, factory owners, big landowners and honorable merchants travel several times a year to California, Los Angeles, Paris, London and so forth to visit gentelemen and examine money and banking affairs in monstrous airplanes which prevent the water in their bellies from being shaken. It is natural, in a class society, that it is obvious what classes have suffered from the fact that the universities are closed: classes which have the ability to send their darling beloved children to well known universities in America and Europe to continue their studies, or people who are not even able to fill their children's stomachs? Don't think that the matter has ended yet, or that these things are unheard of in the Islamic Republic. A year and a half after the triumph of the revolution, cast a glance at notices in the newspapers and many matters will become clear to you. I will just refer to one example. On page 3 of KEYHAN, issue 11,067, of 13 August 1978, a short notice: "Spain, Austria, pension, language classes, university and other services, language preparation classes, telephone such and such." Now tell me, do those million families which are disturbed over the closing of the universities belong to the downtrodden or the haughty? To dependents of the 60,000 martyrs and the 100,000 wounded, or the princes, courtiers, capitalists and owners of gold and coercion? Downtrodden sister and brother, beware; do not let it happen today that they will be able to make the haughty dominate you with the slogan that sulphuric acid means there is no God, that they close the door to science and knowledge in your face by closing the universities so that you will once again pursue your father's work and they will follow their fathers'.

Distinguishing Features of the Islamic University through the Doctrinal Viewpoint

"The goal of government is to nurture people in movement toward the divine system (Valiollah ol-Masir). For the sake of the appearance and development of capabilities in order that the manifestation of the dimensions of the divine nature of man may be provided ("be formed in God's morality"), which can be possible only under the aegis of the active and extensive participation of all elements of society in the process of the transformation of the society," /About one line missing./ From the introduction to the constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, we realize that from the doctrinal viewpoint everything is a means to one goal in an Islamic society, and that is the "divine nature" of man and the creation of people who are fit to "represent God" on earth. Thus what is at issue is the selection of the proper means and the approach to that. It is clear that one of these means is "to know--to know how one must proceed from "being" to "becoming." When we see that Islam relies on knowledge, science and knowing, to the point where it swears by the pen and, in the first message of the revelation, declares "he taught man what he did not know," we see that it raises this question in evaluating knowledge:

"Are people who know the equal of those who do not know?" They never have been. Islam's prophet considered the learned men of his nation to be his successors and stated, "pursue knowledge, even if that is in the rembtest part of the world." He gave such importance to understanding that he told "heathen slaves" in the hands of the Moslems "if you teach Moslems how to read and write, you will be free." It is because of this that, in the words of those who wrote the constitution, "the groundwork for the appearance and development of capabilities in order that the manifestation of the dimensions of the divine nature of man may be provided." Now, in order to continue this course, is it possible that one may ignore the role of the universities as a means? Not at all. So how can we create a university which will be Islamic and aimed at "the goal?" What are the distinguishing features of this university? What university can be a better model and form for us than the one which the leader of our creed, Emam Ja'far Sadeq, established?

What we have learned from the body of the writings and the sayings of the scholars of religion, clerics and learned men of Islam is that in order to make the universities Islamic one must first carry out three fundamental principles:

1. Purification and cleansing of the universities. They should be purged, in accordance with Emam Khomeyni's command, of the corrupt elements and servants and obedient followers of the previous regime, and the dependents and devotees of foreigners should have no access to them, so that the educational environment may be a center for the creation of model men who are divine in nature.

2. Freedom of thinking and expressing opinions, since man does not grow and cannot follow the road toward divine nature except through the intermisture of ideas. We learned this from the conduct of Emam Sadeq (on whom be God's peace), since his university was a center for the commingling of ideas.

3. In order to provide an Islamic nature and to have all members of society take part in all stages of decisionmaking, it is necessary that all the affairs of the universities take place through consultation, since in the opinion of those who wrote the constitution "the divine nature of man can be possible only under the aegis of the active and extensive participation of all the elements of society in the process of the transformation of society."

If these three fundamental principles (purification, free discussion and consultation) are carried out within our universities, that will be a big step toward their Islamization; otherwise we sill have just contented ourselves with changing the name of the imperial universities to Islamic universities. After acceptance of these three principles, planning for the sake of putting higher education at the service of the masses in a manner responding to the requirements of the revolutionary society will be easy.

Brother Members of the Council of the Cultural Revolution:

Some people are of the opinion that you, as an institution which must be "revolutionary" have not succeeded in your work in this period, which has lasted more than 2 months. Certainly you pursue discussions of this matter at your meetings. I do not know what conclusions you have reached, but, as I have said many times, in our opinion, until we make it known what economic, social, political and other characteristics our Islamic society will possess, we will not be successful in planning, including planning for the universities. You have the experience of a year and a half of revolution before you. Why have plans been so unsuccessful and the emam's cry has become so loud?

Let us learn from the past that means are necessary to reach the goal of "the divine nature of man." Until we realize what these means are and use them, we will not draw close to the goal, but will be remote from it.

Brothers: to attain the demands of the people, which they have been crying out for--that is, "the freedom and independence of the Islamic Republic--we are badly in need of devout, self-sacrificing scholars and specialists. What have you done to this end so far? do you think that sending out certain circulars and forming some commissions is enough? During the time you are making decisions, all the universities remain shut down for at least one term and you have no plans for absorbing people's powers. To whose benefit is the bewilderment of tens of thousands of students, professors and employees? Come, before it is late, and set the problems of the job truthfully before the emam and the nation, for, if you do not do so today, tomorrow, God forbid, may be late.

Peace be upon you.

GOODS DISTRIBUTION CENTERS TO SPUR ECONOMY

Tehran JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI in Persian 21 Aug 80 p 13

[Article: "The Role of Centers for Procurement and Distribution of Merchandise in Economic Reconstruction']

[Text] Foreign trade under the former regime was based as much as possible imports, the daily expansion of a culture of brokers and middlemen, the replacement of domestic production with imports, and putting forth as much as possible the profit motive over the work ethic. Since foreign trade yielded ever increasing enormous profits, most people were awed by this, fell all over themselves in droves to go the way of capitalism, and sought to obtain trade licenses. Getting a trade license was a sure way to multiply one's wealth several times over in a short time. For the same reason there was no longer any incentive to establish production units, and every day the number of people going into foreign trade increased. Unfortunately we were also faced with an increase in foreign trade on the part of profiteers (increasing imports, of course, and not exports) because besides assuring a huge, legal profit (!), this was a way to make huge illegal profits by introducing fraudulent factors, in which the price of goods was inflated. As a result, the way was opened for smuggling and other operations.

With the ratification of the constitution and the insertion of Article 44 based on nationalizing foreign trade, a great change was set in motion in the history of our country's foreign trade, and the full implementation of this article can be a useful and lively step in the country's economic reconstruction.

The Ministry of Commerce, after several months of study and deliberation, has finally gotten the executive regulations of this plan approved by the Revolutionary Council, and has decided to put this article into force by establishing 16 merchandise procurement and distribution centers. About three months ago it set up three of these 16 centers, the metals center, the paper and wood center, and the textile and fabrics center, bringing the importation of such goods directly under its own control. Although there are still importers working in these fields, they are totally under the control of these centers. According to the Ministry of Commerce, during this period the established centers have had noticeable success, and they have been able to bring about 30 percent of the volume of the country's imports under their own mantle. The Ministry of Commerce has expressed the hope of setting up all 16 of the aforesaid centers by the end of this year and to take control of all imports. We also hope that this article will be fully implemented before the end of this year, because, for the same reasons that the Ministry of Commerce has given, the claims of numerous difficulties and the lack of specialized knowledge do not establish the need for more time for the implementation of this article so that we allow a great many of these merchants to carry on their plundering for several more months. These centers must be conclusively established as soon as possible in order to put a stop to the abuses of numerous profiteers. Here we will summarize the effects of nationalizing foreign trade on the country's economy.

Control of Imports

Before now every private importer, without any form of control, ordered every kind of merchandise in whatever quantities he wished. How often the different merchants ordered so much of one good that prices went way down because of oversupply, to the point that it was no longer economical and they would even abandon them to customs. This problem caused the accumulation of merchandise in customs warehouses, and also the waste of a great amount of the national wealth. On the other hand, because of the lack of individual control, sometimes many different varieties of one type of good were imported from different countries, all of them satisfying only one need. For this reason the variety of imports has now exceeded 24,000 kinds. With the full establishment of the basis for nationalizing foreign trade, the centers for procurement and distribution of merchandise can at least economize both from the point of view of the quantity of orders and from the point of view of reducing the variety of imported merchandise and of ordering necessary goods and not sumptuous, deluxe goods to be bought with savings.

Protection of Domestic Products

With the full implementation of this article, by not importing items whose equivalents are produced inside the country, and by assuring higher prices for imports, these centers can protect domestic products and bring about factors that will encourage domestic producers. In this way traders also, with cutbacks on other profits, with no incentives to remain in this business, will undertake to set up production units and the amount of domestic production will increase. Then the dependence on imports, which now make up about 70 percent of consumer goods, will decrease.

Obstacles to Implementation

The nationalization of foreign trade endangers and will endanger the interests of many. The implementation of this article will be confronted on the one hand by the protests of many domestic merchants, whose enormous profits that they have put in their own pockets until now, will be stopped. On the other hand there are the foreign companies, brokers, and middlemen, who received commissions from both domestic producers and traders before the appearance of this article. According to reports from the managing directors of these established centers, these foreign companies' attacks on Iran have begun, especially since a number of them have been drawn to the brink of bankruptcy. They are trying to prevent producing companies from seling merchandise directly to Iran, in order to force Iran to import goods through these brokers in the old decadent way. The only way to fight these foreign brokers is to resist as much as possible in order to force them out of the picture. Domestic insiders who work in this field, however, also number about 23,000. They can either set up cooperative distribution and consumer companies, or they can set up production units. Considering the fact that setting up cooperatives will not be that profitable, it is better for them to go with industrial and production units than to both make more money and pay the price of the largely random production that faces the country and which they have either not been aware of until now or else have repressed, thinking they were fulfilling their moral and human responsibility by engaging in business.

IRAQI AMBASSADOR AMASH NEW DEAN OF HELSINKI DIPLOMATIC CORPS

Helsinki UUSI SUOMI in Finnish 2 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by Vesa Haapala: "Amash To Become Dean of Diplomatic Corps Next Winter"]

[Text] The ascendency of the Iraqi Ambassador, General Saleh Mehdi Amash, to the position of senior foreign diplomat in Helsinki's diplomatic corps is causing concern and confusion in diplomatic circles.

The Israeli Embassy is experiencing particular uneasiness since as countries Israel and Iraq are officially in a state of war. In his diplomatic duties in Helsinki in the latter part of the 1970's General Amash has not been shy about presenting stands condemning Israel and Zionism. Frequently these two issues have been combined in the same stands.

The duties of the dean of the diplomatic corps will be transferred to General Amash in the early part of winter. At that time the present dean, Dutch Ambassador C. G. Verdonck-Huffnagel, will be leaving his post in Helsinki. He has unofficially announced that he will leave Helsinki at the end of next February.

The duties of the dean of the diplomatic corps include the management of the joint interests of the diplomatic community and the presenting of expectations with resepct to the host country. At receptions and state visits the dean frequently represents all the diplomats accredited to the country. The duties of the dean also include the arrangement of receptions for departing as well as arriving ambassadors.

Embassy Secretary Gad Cohen of the Israeli Embassy states that they intend to proceed from the fact that no proplems will appear in the future. Cohen considers that there might be a possible problem between General Amash and the Finnish Foreign Ministry.

"We hope that there will be no difficulties," says Gad Cohen.

Outside Conditions

Indeed the representatives of Chile and the Vatican have been accredited to Helsinki longer than General Amash, but since the Ambassador of Chile is in Stockholm and Papal Nuncio resides in Copenhagen, General Amash must accept the duties of the dean of the diplomatic corps next winter.

Outwardly, at least, good conditions exist for this since the palatial Iraqi Embassy completed on Kulosaari will be in full use at that time. The collosal, eastern style embassy, which was built with great speed on Vahaniityntie on Kulosaari, will receive its baptism by fire on the 16th of this month when a large group of invited guests will come to celebrate Iraqi national day.

Indeed this national day is actually on 14 July, but the French Bastille Day also falls on the same day. The French will celebrate their national day on the actual date. It is presumed that the Iraqis feared a loss of guests inasmuch as the celebrations would have come on the same day and many might have placed greater value on the French invitation.

The general who searched for Jews and Zionists hiding in Finnish corporations in the early spring now intends to establish roots in Finland. In addition to the climate, the general is also attracted to a piece of land in Kirkkonummi.

Recently horses were brought there to be raised. The came from the same place the general does, Iraq.

NATION'S MANY SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS LAUDED

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 17 Jul 80 pp 8, 9

/Article: "Iraq on the Road to Comprehensive Development"/

[Excerpt] Women's Takeoff

The Iraqi revolution has devoted conspicuous attention to women, who were neglected and lived on the sidelines before the revolution occurred. This concern arose from women's weight and importance in building a new society and dozens of laws have been codified on their behalf so that they may assume their full role in the process of development and construction. Women, by virtue of the application of this law, have become teachers, oil engineers, policewomen, operators of gas pumps, officers and pilots.

Among the most important things women have achieved is the Personal Status Law, which has given all Iraqi women reaching legal age the right to request a divorce and to reject forced marriage. They have also received the right to be electoral candidates and be elected to the National Assembly, as actually occurred about 3 weeks ago when for the first time Iraqi women took part in the first elections held in Iraq for about a quarter century. These resulted in the victory of 16 women--the highest figure to be found among Arab parliaments.

Working women in Iraq have enjoyed the achievement of numerous gains and accomplishments. Legislation embraces everything which uplifts the status of women in general and provides the wherewithal for their liberation, their resurgence and their exercise of roles in society which are as worthy and competent as those of their brother men.

The Labor Law for the year 1970 is to be considered a true mirror of revolution's intellectual orientation toward women's issues. It underlines the need to incorporate women in labor and give them the scope to engage in work while providing all legal guarantees and caring for their special circumstances and their role in society as mothers and workers.

This law allotted a special chapter to regulating the jobs of working women. This contains legal sections which stipulate that one may not employ women in industry on night jobs except for administrative work or work related to special technical or social activities, with permission from the competent bodies, in places where health and recreation facilities are available to them.

The Labor Law prohibits the employment of women in harsh, difficult circumstances and makes it obligatory to give working women a rest period of no less than 11 consecutive hours per day in addition to a vacation of 1 month from the date they give birth, with confirmation by a medical certificate from medical bodies. It prohibits their employment in night or overtime work, or work which is harsh and detrimental to their health and the health of their fetuses during periods of pregnancy. It also sets work hours for pregnant women at 7 hours per day.

Upbringing of Youth

A mass organization, the Iraq General Federation of Youth, is in charge of preparing and bringing up young people in Iraq. This consists of three organizations: the first, the Vanguard Organization, is concerned with small children ranging from 9 to 14 years of age; there is the Youth Organization which deals with the 15- to 19-year-old group; and there is the Young Person's Organization dealing with youths who are 20 years old and above.

In Iraq there are 87 youth centers and 11 youth homes dealing with matters of art and literature, 78 sporting clubs, and five educational care centers which are all concerned with various youth activities. The Ministry of Youth supervises these.

Technology and Planning

In constructing a new economy, Iraq relies on the programmed planning system. It prepares annual 5-year plans to absorb financial revenues, which increased after it nationalized oil in 1972. Allocations to the 5-year plan for the years 1965-69 came to 631 million dinars, and the 1970-75 national development plan for 1970-75 to 3,008,000,000 dinars. Total allocation for the years 1976-79 were 9,903,600,000 dinars.

The new 5-year plan for 1981-85 consists of balanced development of the various economic sectors. It devotes special attention to rural development and is based on the premise of coordination and economic integration among Arab countries.

From this premise, that of constructing a strong national economy, officials in Iraq consider that planning assumes central importance in building the economy and all its branches and in developing it in accordance with current and future national and domestic requirements. It also considers that the process of socialist construction is inevitable and necessary.

National Income

What has been achieved in this context may be attributed to national income, which came to 9,792,000,000 dinars last year, as compared with 850 million in 1969 or an annual growth rate of 27.7 percent. Per capita income rose from 92.3 to 763.8 million dinars, or an annual rate of growth of 23.5 percent.

Wages paid to employees and workers increased by great rates over their pre-revolution level. Out of concern for the application of socialism, these increases were concentrated in a manner covering the main classes of society, such as workers, low-level employees and people with limited incomes, and the minimum wage rose by 122 percent.

Investments

The figure on investments allocated to the annual plan in the current year comes to 5.24 billion dinars, or an increase of 176 percent over total investments allocated to all plans set out before the 17 July 1968 revolution.

Concomitant with the program which officials in Iraq are following, the government has offered Arab investors the requisite facilities, they number about 400 investors in various sectors, and their total investments come to about $7 million.

Continuing in the development sphere, we can point out that work has recently been increasing in the General Building Authority, which is carrying out 721 development projects at a total cost of about 1.3 billion dinars. The costs of projects contained in the plan for the current year comes to about 768.49 million dinars, while annual allocations came to 334.5 million, an increase of 200 percent over last year's allocations.

Of these projects, 343 have attained a high rate of completion; these consist of various facilities spread over all areas of the country.

Among the most prominent projects to be carried out in the current year are the technological institutes which will prepare intermediate and technical staffs in the Provinces of Maysan, Irbil, al-Ta'mim, Nineveh, Babil and Basrah, at a total cost of 62,374,000 dinars, and teachers' training institutes in the Provinces of Baghdad, Nineveh and Maysan at a cost of 32.19 million dinars.

Work is on the verge of completion on all the projects for industrial schools, a number of which were recently delivered throughout all governorates at a cost of 45 million dinars.

The General Building Organization will start preparing studies and designs for the construction of soccer fields in the governorates of Babil, al-Qadisiyah and Nineveh.

Work is also continuing on the construction of a number of socialist sector building projects, most prominent of which are the planning agency complex, the Council of Ministers, the General Motion Picture and Stage Organization, the site of the Economic Commission for West Asia with a special housing complex, buildings and machinery for AL-THAWRAH newspaper, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Baghdad University.

Development of Telephone Services

The National Development Plan for the Years 1976-80 has given great attention to telephone projects in rural areas, in order to provide modern services and eliminate differences between urban and rural areas.

Iraq's Ministry of Transport and Communications plan is aimed at connecting Iraq's districts with a reliable automatic system consisting of telephone and cable services as part of a project containing exchanges with capacities ranging from 1,000 to 5,000 lines.

The project also includes the construction of 97 microwave stations spread about over all areas of the country. This will be characterized by the use of mobile air conditioned vehicles until completion of the communications complexes which will accommodate installed exchanges with capacities based on actual need.

These vehicles, with their equipment, will be moved to subdistrict seats to cover most rural areas in the country with their services. The project will be outfitted with central supervisory and control equipment to keep close supervision on activity in the vehicles.

The project will help stop migration from rural to urban areas by providing all the requirements for living in rural areas which exist in the towns, such as health, telephone, electric, and clean water services and other important services; in addition it will help regulate the marketing process by accelerating communications among cooperatives and crop gathering centers of various types.

Road and Bridge Projects

In the context of roads and bridges, the General Construction Contracting Company at the present time is carrying out a number of road, bridge and pier projects at a cost of 260 million dinars distributed among the provinces. These include the al-Qa'im-'Akashat-al--Ramliyah road, the al-Qa'im-Akashat railway and stations and birdges belonging to that, the airfield tunnel, the barrier for the town of al-Sa'diyah, the Kirkuk-Fathah bridge, the road connected to it, and 10 strategic piers at Umm Qasr.

The Umm Qasr pier project will cover an area of 900,000 square meters on the west bank of Umm Qasr. Its total cost will come to 95 million dinars and it will consist of 10 commercial piers and a special track on which 26 large cargo unloading cranes will operate.

In another area, the General Agency for Constructing Southern Roads built 285 kilometers of roads and three pontoons last month at a cost of 10 million dinars. These are distributed among the Provinces of Basrah, Dhi Qar, Maysan, al-Muthanna and al-Qadisiyah. The agency is now continuing the construction of 961 kilometers of roads in these provinces at a cost of 49.34 million dinars.

Social Affairs

The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs' Plan for the years 1985-86 consists of effecting a major qualitative shift in the context of the social services the ministry's agency provides, in light of the requisite volume of change and development and the demands of objective reality, as well as construction materials whose effects are not isolated from field conceptions.

As regards disabled persons, the relevant body supervising these people has decided to establish a special town in every province for them. The area of each town will be 65,000 square meters. Special designs have been made for them at a cost of 93 million dinars preparatory to startup of construction early next year.

It should be added that every town will include a nursery, kindergarten, primary school for deaf and dumb and retarded children, and shops for practical training in sewing, carpentry, ironwork, ceramics, drawing and weaving.

It will also contain a boarding area for children afflicted with numerous disabilities, a center for disability diagnosis 2,000 square meters in area conforming to the most modern developments, a large common hall for activities in various departments, and all other services relating to food, movies, sports and daily activities.

Five million dinars have been allocated to the board, which is headed by the minister of labor and social affairs, Mr Bakr Mahmud Rasul, to provide all necessary equipment and facilities for the disabled.

The sum of 450,000 dinars has been allotted to renovating the al-Amal institute for the deaf and dumb and increasing the serivces it provides; in addition, the board has received 30 buses, will soon receive another 20, and then will get another 100 to provide transportation for the disabled who are covered by the new Employment Law.

The board recently opened new institutes for the retarded in the town of al-Thawrah, a ceramic shop in al-Waziriyah, and an institute for the mentally retarded in the al-Harithiyah area, as well as transferring some social development centers to centers to serve the retarded.

In the course of the past 6 months the board opened 26 projects to serve the retarded and is continuing its work of preparing the curricula which they will operate in the coming school year. Among these projects are 10 institutes for the retarded in Baghdad, three in Basrah, two each in the Provinces of al-Najaf, Karba'a', and Irbil, and the expansion of spaces in existing institutes.

Special Child's Care

Among the types of care which officials are providing for all citizens, there is special care for children, the generations of tomorrow. As of last year,85 mother and child care centers had been established in the country, including 16 in Baghdad, to perform health and guidance care for the pregnant in order to eliminate deviations and moral disturbances. Thus there is a concentration on child care and the provision of a suitable climate for balanced growth. In the light of experiences in actual practice the health boards have recommended the establishment of 25 new centers and the performance of a comprehensive study to cover Iraq's needs according to geographic and population distribution.

The government has given great care and attention to nurseries and kindergartens and the specifications and conditions on the basis of which these types of educational and service organizations are constructed are recorded. The number of kindergartens in Iraq total 43, ranging from national government organizations to mass organizations and benevolent societies. The Iraq General Federation of Women is prominent in this vital educational and service sphere, and it has established a prominent prsence in directing experience in it as regards the construction of children's kindergartens. Sixteen schools are being opened with a capacity of 200 children each.

On behalf of children, also, a decree has been issued on compulsory free education, meals in schools, institutes and schools devoted to the affairs of disabled children, and coverage of free time by providing a healthy cultural and recreational atmosphere and providing sports, art and games to develop talents, children's playgrounds, publication of a children's paper and children's museums, and stage, movie and television activities devoted to children's psychological and pedagogical affairs.

The Social Care Law

Officials have been directing these vital affairs for about 3 weeks with the issuance of the Social Care Law, in which a stipend is allotted to every family whose monthly income is below the minimum wage for unskilled workers, if it consists of five or more persons below 70 percent of this wage if it consists of four persons, /below/ 70 percent if it consists of three persons, /below/ 66 percent if it consists of two persons, or /below/ 33 percent if it consists of one person.

Every widow, every divorced woman who has a minor child living with her, every minor orphan and every person totally disabled by sickness or old age will be entitled to the family care stipend in accordance with the law.

The law allots a monthly stipend of 13 dinars to heads of households, 9 dinars 100 fils to wives, and 5 dinars 200 fils to children.

In its first part, the law describes the general objective it has in mind. Amont these are:

Article One. Social solidarity is the primary basis of society and its intent is that every citizen should perform his obligations toward society in full and that society should guarantee the citizen all his rights.

Article Two. The government will strive to provide social care for all citizens while they are alive and for their families after their death.

Article Three. Work is a right whose provision the government guarantees for every citizen and a duty for everyone who is able to perform it. It is required by the need to participate in the construction, protection, development and prosperity of society. The government has the goal of providing social insurance for all citizens in cases of disability or old age.

Article Four. Government support for families with low or non-existent incomes is a tentative obligation which will decrease the more the country progresses on the way to socialist construction. The need for this support will lessen when a society of progress and welfare is achieved, providing work for everyone who is able to work and providing social insurance for all members of the population.

Article Five. The basic objective of family insurance is to maintain human dignity, eliminate negative effects on the family and children in the present and future, and put the family in a position where it can help to create a new society with awareness and sincerity.

Article Six. Children are the future of the nation. Therefore, the government looks after the stage of childhood by various means, among them establishment of government homes.

Article Seven. The government is trying to reduce the phenomenon of disability in society, to look after the physically and mentally disabled by strengthening them, qualifying them and encouraging them to work in accordance with their abilities preparatory to assimilating them into society, and to look after those who are totally unable to work from all material, health, social and psychological standpoints.

Article Eight. The social care of the physically and mentally disabled is aimed at realizing the duty of the government and the society toward citizens who are partially able to work or wholly unable to do so, by qualifying them and providing social, medical, psychological, educational, vocational, and cultural services to enable them to overcome the effects which have arisen from their disability.

In its third part, the law talks about children and child care, as follows:

Article 29. First, government houses have the objective of looking after children who suffer from states of family fragmentation or the loss of one or both parents, providing a sound atmosphere for them compensate for the family warmth they have lost, and warding off anything which might make them feel that they have no one to care for them.

Second, the government will provide all housing, clothing and food requirements and pocket expenses for children, young people and youths in accordance with the instructions issued by the chief of the General Social Care Organization.

Article 30. the Department of Social Services of the General Social Care Organization will establish and manage government homes in various parts of the country and will provide all accessories and an adequate number of employees and workers for them.

In the fourth part, the new law discusses the care of disabled persons and declares:

Article 45. Every disabled person has the right to accreditation and care, and the government will perform these services free of charge in accordance with the following principles:

First, accrediting disabled persons and returning them to the activities and professions they engaged in before their disability or qualifying them for other activities and professions which are in keeping with the abilities they still possess and require modern scientific, technical and educational vocational, health, social and intellectual equipment, so that they may play their part in building a socialist society.

Second, qualifying persons with severe disabilities who are partially able to work and orienting them toward protected workshops, productive cooperative societies or any other work places which are compatible with their actual abilities.

Third, care for people who are totally unable to work (the severely disabled or the aged) by establishing social, medical and psychological care centers in which all services are integrated in a manner guaranteeing that a calm dignified life is provided.

Article 46. Every disabled person will have the right to use vocational qualification services by belonging to a vocational qualification unit conforming to the nature of his disability.

The causes justifying the promulgation of this new law declare that, with advancement along the road to socialist construction, the citizen's bonds with society and the government will become firmer, his relations with others will become based on firm, objective foundations, new relations will take the place of tribal, feudal and capitalist ones, raising the status of the individual and the family, giving the trade union, vocational and cooperative organizations in the rural areas and the towns the key role in rearranging social relations, assimilating the individual into the new society gradually and creating a common life in which socialist notions and values will constantly grow and flourish.

While the regulation of material and moral production impose specific tasks upon individuals and groups who are capable of working, the society, as represented by the government, is in turn compelled to provide adequate care, primarily for families with low or nonexistent incomes, children, and the mentally, physically and psychologically disabled and to help them keep abreast of and join the caravan by qualifying them and encouraging them to join in the productive process and exploit the powers they possess.

This law has come about in order to cover classes which are in the most intense need for care, indeed whose inclusion under this care will give the caravan further socialist import and will elevate its status. With progress in the building of socialism, no individuals or groups lacking the social care they deserve will remain in the future.

Health Care

Officials in Iraq devote great attention to health affairs. The most modern hospitals have been established and spread about, along with various clinics and dispensaries, in various areas of the country to provide comprehensive free care to all citizens in accordance with the most modern pharmaceuticals medicine has developed and specialized human staffs.

The last 10 years have witnessed great attention to health care for citizens, especially in rural and poor ordinary areas. The number of hospitals in 1976 totalled 194, comprising 23,324 beds, and the number of other health institutions, aside from hospitals, came to 2,047, that is, an increase of 19 percent over the figure for 1968. In addition, officials prepared the necessary staffs of doctors, dentists and practitioners of health vocations, and their numbers rose at rates of 58, 61 and 164 percent respectively in 1976 in comparison with the figures prior to the revolution. Thus the ratio of doctors to the population now is one to 2,200 as compared with one to 4,200 in 1968. The ratio of practioners of health vocations totals one per eight hundred inhabitants now as compared with one to 1,700 before the revolution. The necessary requirements have been provided to offer the best services to citizens, and the revolution has given special attention to mother and child care, especially in the rural and ordinary areas of the country.

Iraq has striven to provide medical and treatment services to citizens free of charge or at token fees with the goal of reducing the burden on the poor classes, especially in villages and rural areas.

An Integrated Medical Complex

In addition to the massive medical city in the capital, and other modern institutions in Iraq, the coming year will witness the start of construction of the medical complex buildings in the city of Mosul, covering an area of 250,000 square meters.

The health projects which the General Building Organization is carrying out are now receiving exceptional attention from the organization's technical staffs so that they may be completed by the specified date.

The organization is now building five public hospitals with a capacity of 400 beds each, distributed among the Provinces of Baghdad, Salah-al-Din, Dhi Qar, Irbil, and al-Najaf at a cost of 57.5 dinars.

It is hoped that these hospitals, on which work was started last October, will be completed by the start of 1982.

This month startup on the construction of six other hospitals, also with a capacity of 400 beds, apportioned to the Provinces of Baghdad, al-Anbar, al-Muthanna, al-Qadisiyah, al-Ta'mim and Wasit, will be announced.

Improvement in Education

The educational stage and institutions have passed through a major process of improvement on the qualitative and quantitative levels. Among the most prominent of these achievements has been the decree making education free at all levels and applying compulsory education to provide all citizens with opportunities for education. Higher and vocational education have received the care and attention which will place them at the service of constructing the new man and strong comprehensive development.

Investments allotted to the education sector have increased from 78 million dinars in the 1970-75 plan to about 726 million in the 1976-80 plan--that is, by 831 percent.

Students in all educational stages in Iraq in the 1979-80 year totalled 3,752,250, of which 70,418 were children in kindergartens, 2,608,933 were pupils in the primary stage, 897,700 were students in the secondary stage, 54,026 were students in vocational education, and 22,761 were in homes and institutes train male and female teachers. University students totalled about 100,000, distributed among six universities in various areas of Iraq. The number of students in higher studies came to about 2,200. Preparations are being made to construct the al-Rashid University in Baghdad and the Islamic University in al-Najaf.

As regards al-Rashid University, the startup of work on advanced designs will begin soon. Invitations have been sent to a number of specialized international consulting firms to offer preliminary design ideas to choose one of these international firms to participate with the National Center to carry out advanced designs which respond to scientific and traditional developments for this university and to introduce the best construction systems and service layouts to it, as well as making the Arab and Islamic nature of the building complex and its distribution stand out.

This university will be distinguished from other Iraqi universities in that it will accept 15,000 male and female students and may be expanded and enlarged to accommodate 20,000, including higher studies.

38,000 in Universities and Institutes

In the coming academic year, 1980-81, 38,160 male and female students will enter the universities, the technical institutes organization and the higher institutes of health.

In the Ministry of Higher Education and Scientific Research plan for the coming academic year, which was recently approved by the Council of Ministers, consideration has been given to the indices of the Ministry of Education up to academic year 1983-84 and the Ministry of Planning on the national development plan requirements for qualified staffs up to 1985.

In other university areas, the Higher Committee for Attention to Arabic Language Affairs recently approved the final formats for admission of students into Arabic language departments in Iraqi universities, starting with the coming academic year.

The committee determined that linguistic ability, talent and desire would be the bases for preference among students applying to these departments, in order to guarantee that a strong base will be provided for training Arabic language instructors and language leaders capable of seriously participating in improving language performance among students.

The committee also approved the opening of special language courses in government organizations to raise the capability of people employed in them, especially as regards composition of official letters and the avoidance of mistakes in their places of work.

In Iraq's celebrations of the 17 July revolution these days, the inauguration of the Technological Institute and the boarding areas attached to it is taking place in the Province of Nineveh; this cost 11,236,000 dinars.

The project comprises 26 main buildings, including administration buildings, an auditorium, and classroom buildings, in addition to rooms for professors, department heads, laboratories, a modern library, a movie room, a stage and many other installations.

Eradication of Illiteracy

In the sphere of elimination of backwardness and the upsurge of national development, Iraq has decided to eliminate and eradicate illiteracy. On 1 December 1978, the organization of a broad compulsory anti-illiteracy campaign was begun. The government consecrated all its attention to making it succeed. This campaign is aimed at abolishing illiteracy among 2,212,630 Iraqi citizens, accounting for 19.3 percent of the total population. Peasants and workers make up a large percent of them.

The campaign is 36 months long. Students join it in two shifts, each of which is of two sessions, in which the students receive lessons in reading, arithmetic, and general culture, including lessons which will help them implant the skills which they have acquired. At present there are 26,726 centers in which all the necessary ingredients for making the plan a success are present. Almost all those who have been enrolled in the plan have graduated and will enter ordinary schools at the fourth grade primary level. This cultural experiment has been studied by researchers at Baghdad University and it has become a prominent one, by the acknowledgment of Unesco, which gave Iraq a badge of appreciation in this field last year.

Allocations allotted to the plan came to 66,951,000 dinars, along with annual allocations of 1,695,000 dinars, or from 26 to 260 dinars per student.

The first of the comprehensive compulsory anti-illiteracy campaign stages has ended, represented by the base and complementary stages, and the second and final stage, the ordinary school or cultural education stage, for which Iraq is distintuished, will begin.

In the ordinary school plan provision has been made for a 22-month period in which instruction will be in three stages: the fourth grade stage, followed by the complementary stage, 7 months long, then the fifth grade stage, also 7 months long, and the sixth grade stage 8 months long, within a special curriculum for each of these stages.

The ordinary schools have the objective of achieving five main points:

1. Establishing basic reading, writing and computation skills in a manner guaranteeing that they are adopted as a means to develop personality and vocation.

2. Strengthening the self-confidence of the citizen and his confidence in his abilities, implanting national, domestic and socialist notions in work and life.

3. Enabling citizens to grow inwardly in a manner enabling them to continue to learn, develop their skills, abilities and tendencies, and use this to build society.

4. Forming new values, customs and practices among citizens in a manner harmonious with the goals of the revolution.

5. Achieving a total marriage between knowledge, skills and the requirements of the vocation.

The number of people enrolled in the ordinary schools, which began officially on 1 March 1980,was estimated by the end of March at about 1.7 million male and female students, including people included under followup programs, and there are about 76,000 male and female teachers attending the centers and ordinary schools in all areas of the country.

A Dwelling for Every Citizen

In the context of the other numerous services which the government provides for its citizens, planning is being made to have every Iraqi have a clean dwelling. Among the new actions in this sphere, citizens in Baghdad and other provinces of Iraq will receive 8,000 housing units which are now being constructed by the General Housing Organization, along with public service projects for these residential sections, by the end of this year.

Construction of these housing units is taking place within integrated service districts which include paving, water, sewers, electricity, parks, open areas, shops, health centers, schools of various stages, telephones, and so forth; this is taking place as part of the provision of suitable housing for citizens in various areas of the country.

Mr Muhammad Fadl Husayn, Iraqi minister of housing and construction, states that the exceptional concern for the housing sector is being realized through the adoption and authorization of scientific programmed planning which has the objective of providing suitable housing for every citizen, so that he may take effective part in implanting society, and offering him and his family happiness and confidence. This goal is the cornerstone of housing policy.

He adds, "The amount of work we are anticipating is represented by the construction of approximately 3.38 million new housing units of various types, in addition to improving and maintaining about 255,000 housing units existing now, in the next 20 years, while preserving the existing housing stock, considering that a national resource which must be preserved and developed."

The total housing units to be constructed this year, as listed in the General Housing Organization plan, come to 34,756 housing units with a total cost of 450 million dinars, including services.

Among these units, distributed among all the provinces, there are 546 housing units being built by prefabricated methods. The services which will accompany the construction of the housing units are inner and outer road systems, large waterworks, electricity, schools of different types, central markets, kindergartens, health centers, mosques, green areas, and children's playgrounds.

Recently 22,497 housing plots were set out in the province of Babil, preparatory to the distribution of deeds for them to citizens in stages during the current year.

NATION'S MASSIVE DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS REVIEWED

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 17 Jul 80 p 10

/Article: "Big Industrial Projects Are Turning Iraq into an Advanced Country"/

/Text/ In this industrial era, which is raising the developing countries to the ranks of the advanced ones, Iraq is trying to establish an industrial base which it will be able to rely on in building a strong national economy, where production and exports will be diversified for the sake of strengthening economic independence, responding to the needs of development, and providing the maximum possible manufactured goods for production and consumption purposes in all sectors.

Thus Iraq entered the sphere of strategic heavy industries, and the current development plan (1976-80) is aimed at developing transformation industries supplied with technology, and reducing dependence on crude oil from about 88 percent in 1976 to 79.8 percent in 1980.

Total allocations to the industrial sector in the investment program for the year 1977 came to about 966 million dinars and the value of industrial output in 1978 came to a total of 851.63 million dinars, 234.6 million dinars of which were for the private sector.

Numerous strategic industrial projects were carried out in the last two years, including the chemical fertilizer (urea) project with a capacity of 1 million tons per year;

The petrochemical complex, with a capacity of 150,000 tons of plastics per year;

The iron and steel complex, with a capacity of 1.2 million tons of sponge iron and 400,000 tons of steel products per year;

And, in addition, numerous projects in the sphere of the oil, textile, and other transformational industries.

Massive Projects Transform Iraq into an Advanced Country

The coming 5-year plan (1981-85) represents a qualitative transformation in Iraqi industry, as it will primarily be based on a policy of industrialization and the avoidance of assembly in the industrial process.

Mr Tahir Tawfiq, minister of industry and mines, states that this plan includes a number of giant strategic projects in addition to expansions in a number of existing projects, as imposed by the country's pressing needs and the dimensions of the current national development plan in general.

Implementation of the coming 5-year plan projects will be apportioned within a time ceiling to be specified in accordance with their importance and the objective circumstances which Iraq and the Arab nation are going through and in harmonious balance with the basic needs of the Iraqi people. In addition, the orientation within the industrial situation, in the context of this plan, will attempt to create some heavy industries such as automobile and tractor manufacture, implant the technology of this industry, and train personnel who will absorb and develop this technology.

In addition, transformational industries will witness great development and expansion in the production of chemical, phosphate, and compound nitrogenous fertilizers which will help develop the agricultural sector. The petrochemical (plastics) industries and industries related to them will occupy an important aspect of development during the coming 5-year plan and the establishment of projects related to machine manufacturing industries, which will contribute to the process of technology transfer and implantation.

In the sphere of electric power generation, Iraqi rural electrification and the provision of electrical requirements for purposes of industrial and household consumption throughout the country is progressing toward completion.

Development of Old Industries

The minister points out that the ministry has determined to develop some old industries and upgrade their type of output to a level which will realize /the country's/ ambitions, in view of the accumulation of a good amount of expertise and knowledge regarding their output, marketing and durability, such as the textile and foodstuffs industries.

This, in general, concerns the projects for the coming years. Their status in the national development plan proceeds in principle from the development ideology in the country, which is focused on the establishment of a firm industrial base, creation of a developed, multifaceted economy, and the reduction of dependence on oil; as a consequence, the industrial projects will possess importance in the national development plan.

As regards the industrial status of the nation of Iraq, relative to the Arab countries and the developing countries, Mr Tahir Tawfiq stated that this matter is determined in terms of the criteria of comparison. From the standpoint of the volume of industrial investments, manpower employment, and value added, Iraq is to be considered advanced, and on the international level Iraq will shorten the time gap in the coming plan and will be transformed from a developing country to an advanced one as a result of the international growth rates which the coming plan will exclusively enjoy, in view of the giant strategic projects it contains.

The Coming Plan Is an Extension of the Past One

Concerning industrial achievements in the current 5-year plan, which is on the verge of being completed, the minister said that this plan was a historic extension of and complement to the plan that preceded it, but is distinguished by qualitative changes from the standpoint of content and execution. Its reliance has basically been on the general developmental trend, which proceeds from the economic and social changes created by the increase in revenues available for development following the act of the nationalization of Iraqi oil and the increases which have occurred in oil prices through the current five-year plan. With a comparative glance at previous plans, it is clear that there has been growth in investments and in the value of production.

We can define the rate of development in the value of production between 1976-80 and 1980 (planned, not actual) as follows: textile industries, 0.016, food industries, 0.0210, construction industries, 0.0276, chemical industries, 0.047, extraction industries, 0.0117, electric industries, 0.0428, total rate of development, 0.0201.

The figures in general seem to us to be acceptable, since progress has been realized in the basic industries, those which are considered the core and basic focus of industrial development, such as electric power generation, machinery industries, and extraction and construction industries.

The bases and ingredients the ministry has relied on for the industrialization process in the current 5-year plan have concentrated on all aspects of the national economy through scientific planning programmed through the execution of plan projects in a manner which will ensure their success and the construction of an industrial base in the country within the framework of a versatile economy.

In addition, attention is being focused on development of the industrial sector and the elimination of all obstacles facing it, in order to bring the quality of production up to the level of the ambitions contained in the current plan, in accordance with new formulas, with the goal of increasing the productivity of labor and investment.

New Industries

Among the important strategic industries which are being carried out now, there is the 'Akashat project, which consists of two main sections, first the phosphate mine project and road leading to it, where the percentage completion up to the end of last year came to 78 percent, and second the project of the chemical complex in al-Qa'im, where the percentage of completion at the end of that period came to 46 percent. The Ministry of Industry is also constructing two integrated residential towns to house people belonging to the project at the site of the mine in 'Akashat and the site of the complex in al-Qa'im; the rate of completion is 5 percent.

The petrochemical complex project is important strategic; the completion rate in that totalled 91 percent by the end of last February. Operation has started on the service units to produce industrial water, nitrogen gas and so forth. Operation started on the main unit last month and it is hoped that that will be completed in final form and put into commercial operation at the end of this year. As regards the paper mill in Maysan, the project has been completed and is in the preliminary stages involving test operation.

There is the project on the iron and steel complex, which is considered the firm base of heavy industry in Iraq. This includes:

The semi-integrated iron project; test operation has started successfully on all sections of this text. That is in the preliminary production stage, and its annual design capacity totals 400,000 tons of round reinforcement rods, (al-Rasitah) iron, angles and water wheels.

The sponge iron project, which includes the small unit with a capacity of 440,000 tons per year; this will be the primary material for the semi-integrated iron project, and test startup began at the end of last March.

Regarding the major unit, whose design capacity totals 750,000 tons of sponge iron per year, most of the work is on the verge of completion and it is hoped that its test operation will begin at the end of this year after some technical problems are overcome in coordination with the contracting company.

Progress in Oil

Oil production gradually increased from 1,465,000,000 barrels (75 million tons) per year in the year of nationalization (1972) to 3.45 billion barrels (175 million tons) last year , 1979. Proved reserves increased several times since nationalization as a consequence of the exploration and development activities pursued by national agencies relying on Iraqi staffs.

Control over oil production is now subject to considerations of national development requirements, first, and the requirements of fraternal Arab countries, friendly countries and those in the developing world in particular.

Iraq is now striving to make radical changes in its economic structure, to transform it from a one-sided economy depending on oil as a basic source of financing to an economy with diverse revenues and a firm industrial and agricultural base, by following a policy of linking oil production and revenues to development needs on the one hand and creating new sources which are by nature long-lasting.

At the start of last month, Iraq celebrated the anniversary of the nationalization of oil and transfer of ownership of Iraq Petroleum Company to the state, making Iraq the first third world country to dominate its oil resources in full, giving other oil countries scope to emulate its experiences in the realm of oil production and marketing beneficially.

After some months of deprivation, during which Iraqi management proved great skill in oil production and marketing, Iraq began to reap the fruits of its great victory, since the oil sector became inforporated into the overall domestic economy, greatly helping development plans which turned Iraq into a broad workshop, in addition to the massive financial aid which it offered Arab countries and third world countries.

Iraq, through the Iraq Foreign Development Fund, which provides facilities, loans and aid to developing countries and through bilateral agreements, has offered more than $1.5 billion in 1 year, in addition to effective contributions to numerous joint development funds such as the Special OPEC Fund and others.

Iraq has also committed itself to implementing its special proposal to aid developing countries unilaterally during the past 7 months of the past year, offering countries contracting to buy oil from it $254 million in discounts off from official surcharge adjustments introduced into prices of Iraqi oil during this period. This means that the increase in Iraqi oil prices has not added to the burden of the developing countries, because it is continuing to make strides in its programs to aid these countries.

New Projects

The General Agency for Oil Construction in Iraq has begun to carry out a group of oil projects whose costs come to 20 million dinars.

The new projects include five massive oil tanks in the areas of al-Mushahidah, Hamam al-'Alil, Kirkuk, al-Karkh and al-Rusafah, development of the al-Mishrif oilfield at South Rumaila, a central garage in al-Mada'in, and the laying of a broad oil pipeline system in Basra and al-Bayji.

Next year work will begin on construction of an important strategic petrochemical project in Nineveh Province.

Next September Petrochemical Complex Number One in the Province of Basra will offer its new petrochemical product output for the first time. The first sections in the complex have started primary operation and these were followed 3 months later by the productive units, preparatory to full operation.

The complex has been planned in accordance with the most modern international designs to produce 150,000 tons of plastic products per year, broken down into 60,000 tons of ABS, 30,000 tons of high density polyethylene, 60,000 tons of low density polyethylene, and 42,000 tons of caustic soda.

The complex's new products will meet Iraq's requirements for materials involved in the construction of plastic pipe, electric cables and household equipment and appliances.

Development of Oilfields

It was recently decided to form a Supreme Technical Committee under the chairmanship of Mr Tayih 'Abd-al-Karim, minister of oil, to take charge of adopting the measures necessary to study, design and implement projects to develop the al-Halfayah, Majnun, Nahran 'Umar, West al-Qurnah, and East Baghdad oilfields of the National Oil Company in the quickest, most appropriate possible ways.

The decree stipulates that all the fields the committee develops or supervises under the provisions of the Major Projects Implementation Law No 157 for the Year 1973 are to be developed and will enjoy all the privileges and exemptions listed in Article Six of the law. The committee may exempt some projects it does not consider essential from application of this law.

The committee includes, as members, the undersecretary of oil for organization affairs, the president of the National Oil Company, the chairman of the General Southern Oil Organization, the chairman of the General Northern Oil Organization, and one or more persons possessing expertise or specialized background in financing, law and engineering.

The decree also stipulates the formation of a projects department within the organizations of the National Oil Company headquarters which will take charge of performing general supervision over the various necessary works and activities for the implementation of development projects, coordinating with the executive organizations and departments, assigning the Planning Council powers stipulated in the instructions and powers bearing on implementation of the annual plan for 1980 and the powers of the board of directors of the Iraq National Oil Company, and assigning any organization or department belonging to the Ministry of Oil to implement any activity in projects to develop fields.

In addition, Iraq National Oil Company recently signed a contract with an Italian company to develop an important new oilfield in the country.

The contract is aimed at developing the field in integrated fashion to exploit its oil and gas reserves simultaneously in short time frames.

The two parties will cooperate intensively in carrying out reservoir and engineering studies and determining rates of field crude oil and gas production and the size and volume of surface installations preparatory to inviting international engineering firms to supply the equipment and carry out installation activities.

Development of the field lies within a carefully studied plan, and a group of matters have been considered within it, such as the proximity of fields currently producing, their processing facilities, pipelines, tanks, pump stations and loading docks, in order to make use of them and merge crude oil and gas production from the new field into the production of operating fields in accordance with principles which are being relied on for the first time in the country.

The field development process will rely on the technique of secondary recovery from the anticlines by injecting water into the formations to remove the crude oil and increase its flow into the wells, starting with the initial production stages, in order to extend the life of the oil trap.

Agriculture Is Permanent Oil

In addition to industry and oil, agriculture receives great attention in Iraq. Since the July revolution, the volume of agricultural investments, especially after the oil nationalization act of 1972, has increased: the agricultural sector's share in1977 alone totalled 389,877,000 dinars while the sum of 366 million dinars was allotted to the sector during the years of the 5-year plan (1970-1974).

Agriculture in Iraq is dominated by the mode of cooperative production, collective farms, and state farms, in addition to the private sector. The number of peasant cooperative societies came to 1,987 last year and the number of collective farms to 79 in 1978.

Expansion has occurred in the use of mechanization in the agricultural production process. The standard of living of inhabitants of rural areas has risen noticeably, which has led to a reduction in the difference between them and those in the towns.

In the field of irrigation, modern technology in the transmission and use of water and preservation of water quality has expanded and the application of sprinkler and drip irrigation has been applied in many government agricultural projects. There is a tendency to apply the automatic operation of irrigation projects generally, and in the 5-year plan for 1981-85 work will start on reclamation of 2,054,000 donums of agricultural land and construction of irrigation and drainage systems for other projects. Massive dams will be built, such as the Mosul, Hadithah, and Hamrin dams, the latter of which will be inaugurated this month.

Recently sources in the Ministry of Agriculture and Agrarian Reform announced that the reclaimed areas the ministry has completed and on which it is expected to complete construction activities at the end of the current year come to about 900,000 donums.

The source stated that of these lands an area of 540,000 donums will be delivered; they will be distributed among a number of agricultural projects so they may be exploited in agricultural production activities in the coming production plan.

They mentioned that the remaining area of this group of land, totalling 360,000 donums, is now in the stage of leaching, planting and other supplementary activities.

University Research To Evaluate Agricultural Projects

The Ministry of Agriculture recently formed a committee to supervise and coordinate activity with university teams so they would continue their research activity bearing on the subdivision of agricultural projects.

The university has requested all agricultural organizations, installations and committees to address themselves to the committee on all problems and obstacles requiring study, with the objective of coordinating with the university teams to remedy them and establish the necessary criteria for them.

The ministry will give compensation for the accomplishments these teams make in the context of their study of remedying the work obstacles and development of productive processes in agricultural projects.

The Plan To Develop Fruit Production In the Next 5 Years

The plan includes the establishment of orchards over 96,000 donums, 75 percent of which will be peasant cooperative society and private sector lands; the rest of the area will be distributed to the lands of agricultural agencies state farms, the General Orchard Committee, the General Forest Committee and the Kirkuk Irrigation Project.

By virtue of the new plan, the irrigated orchard area in 1985 will rise to 780,000 donums from 688,000, and the area of unirrigated orchards that year to 50,000 donums from 46,000.

The plan has stressed the production of 24.9 million deciduous fruit tree seedlings, 2.6 million olive seedlings, 7 million citrus seedlings, 200,000 trees citrus origin, and 15 million trees deciduous fruit origin.

In another area, 300 greenhouses are to be built in a number of agricultural projects, schools and institutes in the province to grow vegetables.

The number of technical institutes in Iraq in the coming academic year will rise to 24, now that the Technical Institute Organization opened five new agricultural and technical institutes this year.

$990 Million for Irrigation Projects

In the context of irrigation, the ministry is preparing detailed studies and necessary designs and surveys for the construction of 22 small storage and dam projects on the Tigris River and tributaries and watercourses in the autonomous region.

The government has allocated $990 million to the construction of irrigation projects and land reclamation projects this year.

The plan this year included the construction of the Mosul Dam in northern Iraq, with a storage capacity of up to 12.8 million cubic meters of water per year, and completion of the Bukhmah dam with a capacity of 8.3 million cubic meters of water per year.

POLL EVALUATES PUBLIC SUPPORT FOR MINISTERS

TA011250 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 1 Oct 80 p 19

[Fourth in a series entitled "Election Forecast" by pollster Hanokh Smith: "The Ministers Received a Lower 'Rating' Than the Coalition; Hammer Leads With 57 Percent, Hurvitz Dropped But is Still Popular"]

[Text] The president of the state, Yitzhaq Navon, is above everyday politics in Israel, but he is also above everyone else in terms of his personal popularity. Our poll, conducted between August and September, indicated that 93 percent of those polled believe he is either good or very good as president, and 80 percent think he is very good. This is a unique achievement in our political life.

The prime minister is the ruling personality in the Israeli government, but the auxiliary team of ministers also plays a part in shaping the public's view of the government's overall functioning.

The "Smith Research Center" polls asked the public to periodically evaluate the performance of certain ministers. One must, however, be careful in interpreting these ratings--which are very limited--particularly on the professional plain. The public does not normally have close contact with the ministers, nor is it in a position which would enable it to objectively assess that rating. The public sees the ministers mainly through the eyes of the media or through a much lower level of contact with the government ministers. This, also, has to do with what happens to the ministers and the public in reality in view of cabinet resolutions. The public's rating of the ministers is thus a function of their overall rating as part of the government's performance and that is why one should not attach too much significance to these evaluations. A minister who does his job properly and quietly might--perhaps because he does not make the headlines--receive a rating lower than a minister who is always subject to public scrutiny and who does not adequately perform his job.

The best way to evaluate ministers could perhaps be to examine to what extent their reputation is higher or lower than the number of votes the government coalition received in the poll in question. First let us review the areas of defense and foreign policy, which have traditionally been the fields deeply involving the prime minister.

No doubt the prime minister has lost allies by the resignation of Moshe Dayan and 'Ezer Weizman. It appears that Yitzhaq Shamir has not yet gained wide public support. The following is the percentage marked in four polls:

The Reputation of the Foreign Ministers and the Defense Minister

[Figures in Percentages]

	Dayan as Foreign Minister	Shamir as Foreign Minister	Weizman as Defense Minister
May 1979	67	--	79
Sep 1979	55	--	76
Feb-Mar 1980	--	--	64
Aug-Sep 1980	--	20	--

Both Dayan and Weizman received good ratings by a large share of the opposition and the undecideds alike. Prior to their resignation, both were involved in an argument or some sort of dispute that cost them some loss of public support even before they resigned. However, the findings indicate that Shamir has not won over the public and that some portion of the loss of confidence in the government regarding its handling of foreign affairs and its security policy should be attributed to the resignation of these two popular ministers.

Whereas the Begin government lost public support when Dayan and Weizman resigned, it gained--at least temporarily--from Yiga'el Hurvitz' joining it.

The role of finance minister is usually the most unpopular in Israel. When Pinhas Sapir was finance minister, he was always the least popular among the front-line ministers. Even during the days of Golda Me'ir only 32 to 42 percent evaluated him as a good finance minister. The fate of his predecessors was much worse. Yehoshu'a Rabinowitz, Rabin's finance minister, was assessed in 1977 as being a good finance minister by only 12 to 15 percent, whereas Simha Ehrlich received even less than that in 1979. The finance minister has always occupied the lowest rung on the ladder of cabinet ministers' rating.

Yiga'el Hurvitz changed all this. His energetic approach first gained remarkable public agreement. The February-March poll was conducted almost 5 months after he took office. He may have been over the peak of his support by then, but he was still very popular. To the question of "Do you believe Yiga'el Hurvitz' economic plan could curb inflation?" about 18 percent replied that he would clearly succeed and 32 percent thought that he would at least have partial success. All in all, 50 percent of the population thought that he would be at least somewhat successful. His personal rating was, considering that he is finance minister, still very high: 44 percent thought he was doing a good job.

Now, 6 months later, the enthusiasm is gone. Replying to the same question now, only 10 percent replied in the affirmative and another 25 percent thought that he will have some success. Compared with the rate of 50 percent of the population believing that he will at least have some success as per the February-March poll, only a little more than one-third of the public currently believes he will succeed even partially.

His personal rating, too, went down, although not as much. It declined to 36 percent, which is still a high rating for a finance minister. The poll's findings even show that his personal popularity exceeds the success of his policy. At the same time, the two are interconnected. The loss of confidence in the economic policy certainly strengthened the process of the decline of the "Likud's" popularity in the public opinion polls and the 4-percent decline--from 18 to 14--in the percentage of those who thought the government's economic policy was successful.

Yiga'el Hurvitz' diminished popularity between the February-March and the August-September polls was coupled with a steep decline in the popularity of housing, construction and absorption minister David Levi, who enjoyed sympathy from the ranks of people who did not support the coalition as well. The February-March support indicated that 47 percent of the people interviewed thought he was doing a good job. In the last poll, that figure declined by 11 percent, reaching 36 percent.

All the other Likud and DMC [as published] ministers whose status was polled received a relatively low rating. Here are some of the results:

The Prestige of Other Cabinet Ministers

The Minister	The Date of the Poll	Percentage of Those Who Believe He Is A Good Minister
Likud:
Ehrlich--Finance	May 1979	10
Pat--Commerce, Tourism and Industry	Feb-Mar 1980	15
Moda'i--Energy and Infrastructure	Aug-Sep 1980	22
Sharon--Agriculture	Feb-Mar 1980	26
DMC:
Yadin--Deputy Prime Minister	Sep 1979	27
Katz--Labor and Welfare	Mar 1979	24
NRP:
Burg--Interior	Sep 1979	27
Hammer--Education and Culture	Aug-Sep 1980	57

In general, both the Likud and the DMC ministers received a much lower rating than the percentage of people who would vote for a coalition party. Of special interest is Yiga'el Yadin. Whereas 26 percent of all those polled in the September 1979 poll thought he was doing his job well, only 3 percent of those who voted for the DMC in 1977 held that view. Yisra'el Katz' situation was slightly better.

Again, the religious ministers fared better. In September 1979, Yosef Burg received 38 percent whereas, in the last poll, 57 percent expressed their view that Zvulun Hammer was doing a good job as education minister. Thus, according to the last poll, he was the minister who received the highest rating vis-a-vis his performance.

The results of the above poll might hint that the Israeli public has recently been particularly harsh toward the political leaders. However, Hammer's high rating could contradict this. Moreover, even now it is possible to attain such high ratings as Golda Me'ir did prior to the Yom Kippur war.

When we look at the ruling ministerial team, Prime Minister Begin stands out from among the Likud ministers as the one who arouses relative satisfaction with respect to the fulfillment of his job. The disappearance of Dayan and Weizman from the defense and foreign affairs fields was not countered by the emergence of anyone popular. The greatest reinforcement in the last year was Yiga'el Hurvitz, who first received a large measure of public support but, according to the latest poll, seems to receive waning public backing. The other relatively popular minister from among those listed, David Levi, suffered a steep decline in public support over the last few months. None of the Likud or DMC ministers seem to attract wide support.

One can, of course, argue that these polls merely exemplify the assessment of ministers at a certain time whereas more extensive polls could provide different results. This is undoubtedly true, but such an exercise might overrate the significance of the personal factor. The above examples indeed give a valid picture of how the public reacts to prominent ministers.

In the last article I wrote that the percentages of people who thought that the government was generally successful or largely successful went down from 25 to 17 percent in 12 months whereas the part of those who would not vote for a coalition government decreased, over the same period, from 35 to 30 percent. Most of the ministers assessed vis-a-vis the performance of their jobs received ratings lower than the coalition as a whole. This certainly does not mean that they are the cause of the decrease, but it indicates that they are not likely to contribute in the way of overturning the trends as the election time approaches. Few ministers of public support could help the prime minister in the difficult task of obtaining massive support again at the 1981 election.

SHARON PREFERRED AS DEFENSE MINISTER IN ISRAELI POLL

TA011232 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 1 Oct 80 p 10

[Pori public opinion poll: "Sharon--the Preferred Candidate for the Defense Minister's Post"]

[Text] Ari'el Sharon is the preferred candidate for defense minister, much more than all other candidates. This is the finding of the nationwide public opinion poll conducted by the Pori Institute and commissioned by HA'ARETZ.

On the question, "In your opinion, who should be defense minister," Ari'el Sharon received 30.2 percent of the vote. A distant second is 'Ezer Weizman with 19.4 percent. The prime minister's candidates for this post, Professor Arens and Foreign Minister Shamir, received a very small number of votes. Arens received 3.5 percent and Shamir only 0.8 percent.

Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori, who demands the defense portfolio, received only 1.7 percent. Moshe Dayan is still enjoying some popularity and 4.5 percent want him as defense minister.

Other personalities chosen by those polled were Yitzhaq Rabin (3.1 percent), Shim'on Peres (1.4 percent) and Hayim Bar-lev (1.1 percent). Chief of staff Refa'el Eytan, Yiga'el Yadin, Hayim Herzog, Mordekhay Gur and Matityahu Peled received less than 1 percent each.

Prime Minister Begin, who holds the defense portfolio, is viewed as suitable for this job by only 1.7 percent.

An analysis of the findings according to Likud and Alignment voters indicates that 47.6 percent of the Likud voters support Sharon for defense minister, in contrast with only 12 percent who support Weizman; while 26.8 percent of the Alignment voters back Weizman, as compared with 24.7 percent who back Sharon.

An analysis of the findings according to social strata indicates that support for Sharon is especially strong among young people who were born in Israel and people with less education or of Asian and African origin; whereas support for Weizman is particularly strong among women, middle aged people, veterans and people with higher education or people of U.S. and European origin.

COMMANDER COMMENTS ON ARMY SIZE

TA011229 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 1 Oct 80 pp 11, 14

[Interview granted by Israeli commander of the southern command, Maj Gen Dan Shomron with military correspondent Ze'ev Schiff; date and place not given]

[Excerpts] Question: Do you not think that we can reduce the size of the regular army?

Answer: I am in favor of reducing the size of the career army but against reducing the fighting power of the regular army. I will explain what I mean. One must not cut down the regular army when we are faced with a situation where the opposite side has such large regular armies. The regular army plays a central role in any kind of a surprise war. Any other solution may paralyze a large economic potential due to the need for reserve forces on a permanent basis. In addition, the security policy is mainly intended to deter--to prevent war. The smaller the regular force, the more the danger that this deterrance will be impaired. Nevertheless, since IDF is mainly a reserve army we have many regular army commands--commands without forces with stockpiles--so that a very large part commands stockpiles and lacks power.

Question: Will a cut in the number of commands lead to dismissals in the career army?

Answer: In my opinion, yes, of course. The size of the career army grows yearly. I accept what Minister Sharon says on the issue of cutting back on the number of career army personnel.

Question: Do you favor the view that standards of manpower will not be set in the IDF but will be dictated to the army as in the United States?

Answer: I am seriously inclined to think so. I will accept this if this is carried out with negotiations, explanations and bargaining. A country that allots such a large budget for security may demand to know how this budget is spent.

Question: From your remarks one can understand that the general headquarters has, over time outgrown the desirable proportions. Is this true?

Answer: Yes, and unnecessarily. I was told that it was not only the general headquarters but the army as well that has grown. This is true but one had better take a look at the increase in the number of officers and their ranks. When the units grow larger most of the officers should be on the lieutenant and captain levels since this is the major section. It seems however, that since 1973 the number of captains has become seven times as great while the number of brigadier generals has increased by about 100 percent. I am not at all referring to the addition of personnel over and above the manpower standards. The standards themselves manifest terrible irregularities and they are unrealistic. In my opinion there is no connection between the rise in the size of the army and that of the general headquarters just as one should not enlarge the brigade or the battalion command when another company joins the brigade. One should then add a company commander.

Question: In other words, you are for a reduction in the number of the career army officers.

Answer: Not only the officers. The career army has many master sergeants as well as many officials and drivers. If you ask me about the technical level, here too cuts can be introduced as a great many of the emergency stockpile units are being turned over to the ground forces stockpiling system.

DEBATE ON JORDANIAN OPTION IGNORES PLO ROLE

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 15 Aug 80 p 14

[Article by Yehudah Litani: "On the Road of All the Terrible Stations; Anyone Who Thinks Settlements in the West Bank Can Be Removed by Words, Threats, or Even by Military Force, Ignores the Mood in Those Settlements; Those Who Are Endlessly Repeating the Magic Words 'Jordanian Option' Must Accept the New Reality Which Means Cooperation With the PLO"]

[Text] In the debate which took place on Wednesday at the Van Leer Institute on the subject "Israeli Policy in the Territories--Past and Future," Yehoshua Porat of the Hebrew University said that, in his opinion, a correct understanding of the situation should have impelled Israel to avoid succumbing to the temptation of conquering the West Bank. According to Porat, the conquest of the West Bank has halted the Jordanization process, a positive process from Israel's standpoint, in that it took out the sting of the Palestinian problem through a natural process. If we had been aware of this important process which was taking place among the Palestinians on both sides of the Jordan, in that the refugee camps in Amman and in the West Bank's cities were becoming an integral part of the cities, and that Palestinians were becoming progressively integrated in Jordan, we would have not been tempted to conquer the West Bank. He said that we had known about it, and that the British ambassador to Jordan spoke of it publicly until the war broke out.

So much for the past. As for the future, all the participants in the debate agreed, each in his own way, that Israel's most desirable option is the Jordanian.

Prof Amnon Cohen of the Hebrew University said in the debate that Israel should not "play into the hands" of Jordan. Jordan must not be shown that it is the only option. It should be made to see that there are other options. Menahem, also of the Hebrew University, said that Israel must reward the more pragmatic leaders in the territories, those who are willing to cooperate with Israel on the Jordanian option and territorial concessions, and give nothing to or even impose sanctions on those leaders who refuse to recognize Israel's existence. He spoke for direct involvement of Israel in the territories by way of supporting pragmatic leaders, thus helping them disassociate themselves from the PLO.

Prof Amnon Cohen spoke against this approach and said that "artificial leaders cannot be cultivated in the long run." Tzvi Alpeleg of Tel Aviv University argued in the debate against Israel's seesaw policy in the territories--now in favor of Jordan and now against it, now assisting the PLO and now punishing its supporters. He said that he accepted the Jordanian option. Professor Porat argued that Israel had worked consistently against the Jordanian option and against the pro-Jordanians in the territories since 1967, and quoted retired Maj Gen Rifa'el Vardi, former operations coordinator in the territories and commander of the West Bank.

The organizers of the debate did not include in the panel anyone who advocates other options on both sides of the Jordanian option--the Palestinian or PLO option and the Israeli option which favors annexation of the West Bank and Gaza by Israel. The panelists expressed opinions before an audience which is well versed in the subject as if the year were 1970 rather than 1980, 10 years later. During those 10 years many facts have changed. There are no longer few settlements in the Jordan Valley and in the Etzion Bloc, but rather settlements of varying sizes in different parts of the West Bank and, to a lesser extent, in the Gaza Strip. Although the number of Israeli settlers in the territories is not impressive (11-12 thousand in the West Band), the new reality in the area is a stumbling block to any serious attempt to negotiate with Jordan, with the Palestinians, or--the most likely possibility--with both.

Permanent Construction

With the idea that this is the last year of the Likud government, Minister of Agriculture Ariq Sharon is working diligently to increase the number of settlements, to expand the permanent construction, to add hundreds of dunhams to settlements on the West Bank. All of which, in his words, is designed to foil any plan of returning any part of the land of Israel to any outsider and prevent the establishment of a Palestinian state.

This month hundreds of dunams (400) were expropriated from residents of the villages of Dir Al Hatib near Alon Moreh to pave a bypass road to the settlement. The road is already being built. The first settlement established in Samaria, Kadumin (alias Kadum, or Alon Moreh; to avoid confusion it should be pointed that the settlers of Alon Moreh lived first in Kadum, moved to Alon Moreh on the lands of the village of Rujayb, and after they were evacuated were forced to relocate to Mount Kabir. The settlement there is now called Alon Moreh, and is the only Alon Moreh), is now adding a new, permanent construction section, on an area of 100 dunams which were recently given to the settlement (by the committee for examining the status of lands in the settlements, headed by Minister Sharon).

The Shave Shomron settlement is also adding a new permanent section. In Alon Moreh on Mount Kabir, land is being cleared for industial plants. In the Shiloh settlement where the settlers first came as an "archeological expedition," the settlers are getting ready to build permanent structures instead of the "do it yourself" type. Only to mention a few examples.

On the other side of the fence, in recent years the prestige of the leaders who support the PLO has gone up in the territories, and it can be said that it has skyrocketed. Anyone who saw the royal treatment which was accorded Bassam Shak'a, the wounded mayor of Nablus, when he came to East Jerusalem (to visit the relatives of the Nafha jail prisoners who are striking at the Red Cross in the eastern part of the city), could understand the status of this leadership. Even Shaykh Ali Jabri was not welcomed in this manner in his own town, Hebron, at the zenith of his power. The more Israel curtails the activities of the PLO in the territories, the higher its prestige will go up. Last week, restraint orders were issued against seven members of the "National Steering Committee." [Committee for National Direction] Their pictures were flashed across all East Jerusalem's newspapers and their prestige went up dramatically. What more can Israel do which it has not done already? According to the mayors, the military government monitors all their incoming and outgoing telephone calls, and in recent months the mayors in the West Bank have not been able to leave their towns without explicit permission from the military government.

At the same time, the prestige of the pro-Jordanian leaders is going down constantly. Not only have some of them grown old without finding replacements (Shaykh Jabri has passed away; former Nablus Mayor Haj Ma'zuz al Misri and his relative Hikmat al Misri, former chairman of the Jordanian parliament are over 70; Gaza Mayor Rashid al-Shawwa, is 70; younger men are the two Jerusalem Anwars--Anwar Nusayba and Anwar Al Hatib, both 65. The youngest pro-Jordanian leader is Elias Freij, who is 60), but also their position has been weakened in face of the growing public sympathy for the members of the "National Steering Committee." The real power of Jordan in the West Bank and Gaza is not reflected in the status of the leaders who support it in the territories. The power of Jordan is much greater, and has a great potential.

The "Jordanian option" as it is seen now, is bound by the close ties which have been formed in recent years between Jordan and the mainstream of the PLO. Anyone who speaks today about the Jordanian option must know that at this stage of the game King Hussein does not want to rid himself of his ties to Al Fatah, his former enemies. In the territories, too, the supporters of the PLO and of Jordan say that any negotiations between Israel and Jordan will involve--indirectly--the PLO, or at least Al Fatah.

Thus, the debate which took place this week at the Van Leer Institute (in which were present the former ministers Israel Galili and Mordekhai Bentov, senior officers past and present, professors and many students), focused on the Jordanian optionn without Al Fatah and the PLO on the one hand, and the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza on the other.

The maze we have found ourselves caught in, in the territories, has reached the point that we no longer seem to have control over it, and holding up this option or the other which was a good 10 or 5 years ago is of no use now, especially after 3 years of Likud rule which has stressed the difference between itself and the Alignment by establishing more and more settlements.

Anyone who believes or hopes that it will be possible to evacuate the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza by using words, threats, or even the army, ignores the mood in those settlements. Its residents feel that every new house, every physical item in the area is permanent, and cannot be removed. Anyone who knows the feelings of the settlers understands that at least some of them would rather fight than leave. They know that the threat of civil war will make those who want to give up parts of this land shy away from doing so.

A Tough Partner

Those who keep repeating the magic words "Jordanian option" must take into account the new reality and understand that a Jordanian option means the inclusion of Al Fatah. It is an option which will demand many concessions from Israel, and which will focus on the question of East Jerusalem. Even if Hussein agrees to rid himself of Al Fatah (under the present circumstances this would be most difficult), he will be a tough partner in the negotiations, according to the king's men in the West Bank and East Jerusalem.

In his poem "Half of the People in the World," Yehuda Amihay says:

> ...and to go out on the roads
> Made only for return
> All the terrible stations--
> The sand, stick, fire, water, butcher,
> The kid, and the angel of death?...

I recalled those lines this week as I considered the future difficulties of the Alignment--if it wins the next elections--in initiating talks with Jordan, viz, debates during the election campaign with the Likud, the Tehiyah, and the MAFDAL; internal disagreements on the substance of the negotiations with Jordan and on withdrawal from the territories; disagreements with the settlers; disagreement with the MAFDAL, its coalition partner; American pressures; divisions between Jordan and the PLO; ferment among PLO supporters in the territories; and finally, differences which are bound to surface between Jordan and Israel. Indeed, a torturous road

ISRAEL SEEN FAILING TO UNDERSTAND ARAB REALITY

Tel Aviv AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 8 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by Kassim Zaid: "Needed: Change of Concept; Israel's Arabs' Red Line" (Part Three)]

[Text] "The Arab intelligentsia is bankrupt--it is undergoing a grave psychological and ideological crisis. The old guard has failed. The traditional leadership is also bankrupt, including the political leadership. The establishment leaders have failed worst of all." These are the words of Dr Dami Mar'i, director of the Institute for the Advancement of Arab Education in Haifa University.

His is one of the various opinions voiced by different leaders who disagree politically--which will be quoted later on--though it seems that there is a meeting of the minds among the various segments of the Arab population in Israel.

Dr Sami Mar'i is full of complaints and he states them sharply. He sees the condition of Israel's Arabs today, especially after the passing of the anti-democratic laws which are most detrimental to Arabs, as extremely bleak: "Israel's Arabs are at a crossroads. There is ferment in Arab society. Various forces are in conflict, various currents which are the result of self-growth and political maturation." In his opinion, "Israel's Arabs, as an ethnic group, are split into groups which have severely suffered from internal and external struggle."

The State Pulls Out the Rug

Dr Mar'i does not see the logic in the state's position in regard to Israel's Arabs: "It actually pulls the rug from under them. We hear many statements, of which the most aggressive are Rabbi Kahane's. But there are other, contradictory statements, and contradictory plans. I feel that the majority does not recognize the Arabs of Israel. They are considered hitchhikers on the state wagon."

In his opinion, "The majority--the Jewish majority, that is--is more bankrupt than the minority. This can be seen in the attitude of the majority to Israel's Arabs. The Alignment is the first among those who have failed, since it is the only body which has tried to deal seriously with the problems of Israel's Arabs, and therefore it has failed more than the others. As a result, the trust of Arab intellectuals in the Alignment has reached an all-time low. The present administration competes with the Alignment on this issue in a fascist manner."

Who has not failed?

According to Dr Mar'i, the citizen who belongs to the silent majority has also failed. "Because he sees how the crime is being committed and remains silent. Thus, he is an accomplice. His responsibility is greater than that of the oppressor. The silent majority sees the Arab students being persecuted and even executed, and does nothing about it. In short, the majority should break its silence and show courage by standing up to the rising wave of extremism. It is political blindness which stands in its way."

A Maturing, Unifying Public

Dr Mar'i believes that RAKAH has been wiser than the rest of the parties in Israel. "It was aware of the others' bankruptcy--which gave rise to the idea of the Democratic Front for Peace, which has strengthened RAKAH's position. Israel's Arabs are a growing ethnic group which shows a high degree of solidarity. Its apptitudes are improving. Its self-confidence is growing. If the policy of observation posts, of neglect, injustice, and physical threat continues, the Arabs will start to believe the government is showing them the way in which they must follow."

Why didn't this happen in the past?

"Because the government is not aware of and does not wish to recognize the degree of maturation and self-awareness of Israel's Arabs. Even among the academicians, there are those who refuse to believe that all teachers in Arab schools are Arabs. They do not believe that there is a surplus of Arab physicians. The quality of the Arab is improving constantly, not because of the government's policy, but because of the ancient Arab civilization."

"Arabists and Political Stupidity"

In Dr Mar'i opinion, "the retaining of the Arabists (i.e., the heads of the various departments of Arab affairs) is political stupidity, precisely from the Jewish standpoint. From the Arab standpoint it is an incredibly underhanded policy. "Israel's Arabs as a nation--according to him--"are a power which creates itself. There are dominant forces among Israel's Arabs who can occupy positions on the international level. There are talents which the state must call upon to mould the image of Arab society.

"I am not willing to respect any government which maintains that Emanuel Koplowitz (director of the Arab Education Department in the ministry of education), for instance, is a genius, while at the same time considers us backward. I, for example, am asked to do planning in the Jewish educational system, while I am denied the right to do the same thing in the Arab system.

"The ministry of education has created an advisory council for Arab education, headed by Prof Menahem Milson, who did not attend any sessions. I met Milson and I asked him why he did not participate in the sessions. He told me, 'this is not my area of expertise and I know nothing about it.' He even authorized me to express his beliefs at the meeting in his name.

"The Ministry of Education appointed Nisim Dana, director of the Druse Department in the ministry of religion, in place of Professor Milson. When we, the members of the Arab council, asked for an Arab to lead the council, the director general of the ministry of education refused. Professor Milson has said that it is stupid to appoint a Jew as the head of the council for Arab education."

Not Only a Matter of Good Will

"Building good Arab-Jewish relations should not be predicated on good will only, as has been the case until now. If the relations are not based on equality--it will only be empty words. Where decisions are made there should be equal opportunity. There should be objective economic relations based on mutual interest.

"We are not trusted. We develop and improve our capabilities. But the more we do it, the more we are told to stay in our place.

"The Israelis cannot accept the fact that we are here to stay, since our presence foils the plan of a pure Jewish state. It does not square with their plan. Worse yet, our presence here creates tensions in the plan of the Jewish state. The Israelis are not even willing to deal with the problem."

An Existential Fear

According to Dr Mar'i, "this situation creates among us an existential fear. Why? Because we have no faith in the future. We are not allowed to plan and take care of our interest by ourselves. This is a real danger to our existence and to coexistence. I have tried all along to get Jewish lecturers to do smoething jointly with us for Jewish-Arab relations, but I have been turned down. 'Forget it!' Why do the distinguished lecturers act this way? Because they do not wish to go against the growing fascist trend."

In Dr Mar'i's opinion, "there is a difference between what is and what should be. Everyone is dreaming of what should be, but reality is different and much more painful than we can imagine."

Is there one body which works toward Jewish-Arab understanding?

"No, and yes. Shim'on Peres, for example, argues that he opposes the government's policy toward Israel's Arabs. If this is the case, why doesn't he convene the center of the Labor party and issue an official proclamation opposing this policy? If the Alignment opposes ideologically the government's policy why doesn't it make noise? We know that the Arab departments are headed by Alignment people, and that they are faithfully carrying out the Likud's policy."

"Extremism Is Slanderous"

Are Israel's Arabs truly extremists?

"This is slanderous. Israel's Arabs are excessively moderate. Even if all half million of Israel's Arabs demonstrate on Dizengoff Street against the crying injustice, in my opinion they will remain moderate. Israel's Arabs have not yet reacted as they should in light of their difficult situation.

"How can you imagine, for example, that half of the students in Um al-Fahm study in rented rooms in subhuman conditions? Even if the residents of this large village blocked the main road they would remain moderate. Since, after all, all they are asking for is parity with their Jewish fellow-citizens. Is this demand, which shows their good Israeli citizenship, considered extremism?"

Dr Mar'i does not hesitate to turn to such a sensitive topic as security. "What are Israel's Arabs doing against the security of the state which has been used as a sacred cow against the Arabs? We did not hear that the residents of Um al-Fahm attacked the bus in droves, or undermined the security of the state. The number of Jews opposing the state far exceeds the number of Arabs. What is the purpose of this panic which is being created among the population? What is this fear, if in one village or another there are some Sons of the Village members? Is this the end of the world?"

As a result of this blindness "they think that an Arab who demands his rights is a member of the PLO. The terms are totally confused. If we want to be Israelis in every way, are we extremists? Where is the logic? How incredible--the very thought of a discussion to open an Arab university in Nazareth is causing undue excitement. Member of Knesset Orah Namir demanded that Minister of Education Zevulun Hammer put a stop to the experiment. Even if you killed me, I wouldn't be able to understand why different Jewish groups can open universities because of the differences between secular and religious Jews, and we, as an ethnic group, are not allowed to. All we want to do is take advantage of our educational and cultural rights."

"The Solution--Participation in Decisionmaking"

We asked Dr Mar'i: What is the solution to this difficult dilemma?

"The only solution is the active participation of Arabs in the decision-making process, not only in matters which concern them, but also those which conern the entire country. A senior Arab minister should be appointed. This is the only way to insure the brainwashing of the extremists.

"The solution must come through a fundamental and drastic change in the Zionist approach to the Arabs in Israel. What kind of a solution is it, when Ariq Sharon continues with his observation posts policy. Such policy must be nipped in the bud. A conceptual change must take place in Zionist ideology, in order to reach a stage where it becomes clear that there is no contravention of Zionism in a Zionist state absorbing non-Jews."

Dr Mar'i reached the "red line" when he said: "If the current situation continues, I invite public opinion in Israel to prevent me from becoming a fascist. Can anyone offer advice on how this can be done?

"Just as the Middle East cannot be conceived without the state of Israel, so the state of Israel cannot be conceived without Arabs. The Israelis must recognize the imperative of cooperation with the Arabs, and extend us their arm and ask for our cooperation. We will then be able to extend our arm."

Regarding the idea of creating an "arab lobby," Dr Mar'i says: "Theoretically, it is a healthy idea. But the creation of such a lobby will not do much for Israel's Arabs, since such a lobby will not have power to put pressure on Israel to solve the problems of its Arabs. The solution is establishing an independent Arab party, which will recognize first and foremost the existence of the state of Israel and the existence of the Palestinian people."

WEST BANK RESIDENTS VIEW JORDANIAN OPTION

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 4 Aug 80 p 8

[Article by Dani Tzidkoni: "Jordanian Option Viewed by West Bank Residents"]

[Text] As in the motion picture Rashumoon, the opinions of the experts on territories in Israel are divided on what the residents of the territories want. These experts may be journalists, military government officials, or politicians, who believe--like the journalists--that the honest truth of what the residents of the territories want is what they were told in tete-a-tetes with residents who are important or not so important people. Not once was I taken by surprise when someone gave someone a version of his "true" political opinion different from the one he had previously expressed, in keeping with the rule of "truth and honesty."

This is why I have recently refrained from publishing a report I received from a senior official of the military government, according to which he had gotten the impression in his talks with Arab leaders in the territories, that if they were given the power to decide they would prefer the "Jordanian option" to that of the PLO. By this they do not mean the Peres proposal, but rather Israeli withdrawal from all the territories back to the 1967 borders, and a political solution in conjunction with Jordan. The senior official's impression is undoubtedly sincere. The question which is up in the air is, is what he was told true? In any case it is plausible, as can be seen in the fact that mayors and delegations from Gaza and the West Bank attended the funeral of the Jordanian prime minister. Consoling the mourners, as it is well known, is not the only reason for attending funerals.

Since I choose to believe that I am able to have honest conversations with residents of the territories, for, among other things, it is good for my ego, I tend to believe that others are also capable of--even after taking all critical and intellectual precautions--falling into this trap, which causes Israelis to argue among themselves about the wishes of the territories' residents. Sadly, as a result of Arab terror there are two channels of communication between the residents and Israel.

The official one maintains that any public statement follows the PLO party line. The unofficial one is where we hear about the leaning toward the Jordanian option in the West Bank and to some extent in Gaza, and toward the Egyptian option in the Gaza Strip. The upshot of all this is that it may be preferable for Israel to remain in the territories rather than establish a state headed by the PLO.

A Confusing Situation

My impression is that both the nationalistic aligning with and the fear of the PLO of a great many people in the territories are sincere. This refers to people to whom the PLO, as the standard-bearer of oppressed Palestinian national pride in the territories, is the focus of success and the rallying point. This, despite the fact that they are afraid that the PLO, as a band of terrorists, may very well plunge the Palestinian nation into a terrible bloodbath. I believe that whoever tells me this--and it has been told to me more than once--speaks honestly. But the yearnings and aspirations of the Palestinians, as well as their fears, do not form a basis in the present reality for bringing an end to the bloody conflict between the two nations. It is a pity that Mina Tzemah or the Pori Institute do not have an office in the territories--if indeed polls can be taken there--since public opinion polls in the West Bank and Gaza could help determine our political activity, and perhaps even create new concepts regarding our policies in the world's public opinion.

What is clear is that until we can employ democratic methods which will enable us to obtain an accurate picture of the residents' opinions, we will have to find out about their wishes from the open statements of their leaders, whose enthusiasm for the PLO can go up and down, but whose fear of the PLO is a constant. We can also base ourselves on conversations which cannot be publicized or which can only be reported "without giving the source" or "not to be quoted," in which the leaders of the territories will express their opinion before Israeli government and opposition leaders, officials of the military government, and Israeli and foreign journalists.

Prefer Strong Government

This, then, is the present state of affairs, confusing as it may be. The "Jordanian option" which has been reported lately is for the moment more of the Labor party's making than the residents'. It is possible that if Labor wins the elections, it will be able to impose this option on the residents more successfully than Begin is able to implement his autonomy plan. There is a real possibility that an Israeli "Jordanian option" may enjoy more support in the territories than the Likud's "people's autonomy" plan. It should be mentioned that the only one who has been able to deal successfully with the PLO is King Hussein. The silent majority in the territories prefers, in any case, a strong government. It will not fight the PLO, but it will certainly be willing to have Hussein fight it on its behalf.

What is clear is that the treatment of the residents cannot continue as before. If the autonomy plan fails Israel will have to find new and bold ways to solve the problem of the territories. The territories have presented a problem even before the Gush Emunim, simply because their residents are Arabs and we are Jews.

The "Jordanian option" is one of the possibilities, but to say that it is popular among the Arabs is inaccurate, just as it is inaccurate to say that they reject it.

BREAKDOWN OF AUTHORITY IN TERRITORIES ANALYZED

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 15 Aug 80 pp 15, 20

[Article by Dani Rubinstein: "Danger Lurks From Within; Deterioration of State Authority in Israel and Territories Should Not Be Underestimated"]

[Text] In Miha'el Bar Zohar's book on Isar Har'el and the Security Service (The Chief, Weidenfeld and Nicholson, Jerusalem, 1971), I found the following passage: "The first clash in the War of Independence took place between the nucleus of the nascent state and the undergrounds which refused to disband. In the second stage, the undergrounds which cropped up again within the state and attempted to destroy its government were eradicated. The adversaries of the state in the third stage were not only undergrounds. This time the struggle took place in the open, publicly, under the guise of a battle for justice and law.... The danger to the state stemmed from the seemingly new character of the struggle. Now, too, the main adversary of those who opposed the government was the Security Service. However, it was not prepared for a sophisticated public battle. The service was trained for a struggle against classic undergrounds and was not ready to deal with public storms. In order to stand up to the new methods employed by the adversary, it needed new tools, and it had to resort to action which aroused a great deal of criticism."

This passage is the opening paragraph of a chapter titled "Danger Lurks From Within," in which the Hastner Trial and the battle of the Security Service against the "Volunteers' File" and Attorney Elyakim Hatzni, the Olam Hazeh weekly, Shmu'el Tamir, Dr Israel Scheib (Eldad), and others is described, those who were then known as the adversaries of the government. In Isar Har'el's opinion those people had undermined the state's authority 25 years ago and therefore the Security Service was turned on them.

All of this happened many years ago, and Israel then is not Israel today. The political system has undergone shocks and crises. I assume that the Security Service has changed and has grown in size (back then there was a quarter of a million Arabs under Israeli rule, while today the number is quickly approaching two million). What has not changed is the target of the Security Service, which, according to Har'el are those who are a "danger to the government," who wish to "bring down the Israeli Government," and who "undermine the authority of the state."

When such activity is clandestine, certainly when it is violent, the entire Israeli security system is turned on it, full force. Things are clear and unequivocal when it is a terrorist activity by one of the arms of the PLO, or when it is a case of espionage or assistance to the enemy. Things become fuzzy when it is overt political activity, controversial and demonstrative. Who can decide what the difference is between dangerous "undermining" and open political struggle? On the periphery, the line between the two is hazy and the intervention of the security services is difficult to determine. On the periphery, we find the extreme left--such as the offshoot of Matzpen whose members were accused of espionage; nationalist Arab groups, like the Sons of the Village; and the Organization of Progressive Students. There are also groups of Jewish zealots who resport to violent and clandestine (?) action against Christian missions, and there is Rabbi Kahane's group.

As can be learned from reading the newspapers, the security authorities in the state follow a policy of strong measures when the activists of those marginal groups shift from words, proclamations and preaching to violent action and clandestine activities. But the haziness and the confusion grow when the undermining of authority reaches broader internal circles. From time to time someone suggests to outlaw RAKAH (the communist party), so that it may go underground and its members could be put under arrest. As far as I know the security system opposes it. It should be stressed that RAKAH's leaders keep insisting that they are Israeli patriots, more so than others, and that their activities are cautious and within the law. On the other side there are such groups as Gush Emunim who, because of their excessive patriotism, can be included in Har'el's definition of "those who" undermine the authority of the state," even when most of their activities are overt and public.

I am writing these lines against the backdrop of what correspondent David Halevi wrote in the Washington Star and the strong denial of the head of the Security Service of everything in the article. Official spokesmen refused in recent months to play up the possibility that it was Arabs who attacked the mayors in the West Bank, and this possibility is being carefully checked out. When the load of explosives left by the terrorists detonated recently in the Neve Ya'akov section of Jerusalem, it was announced immediately that it was the same kind of explosives which had been found in the mayor's cars, which indicates that it was the work of Arabs. Or, as was reported in the organ of the Jewish settlers in the territories: "The PLO people murder one another, which is old hat" (Nekudah, June 27, 1980). It seems to me that the possibility that it was done by Israelis is the most dangerous one for Israel, and is the one which should be investigated among those who had rejoiced when they heard about the attacks which took place on the thirtieth day of the murderous attack on the settlers of the of the Kiriat Arbah section of Hebron.

For a long time the activities of the settlers and of Gush Emunim on the West Bank have been an overt political demonstration. The establishment of makeshift settlements, secret settlement expeditions, secret invasion of the Hadassah building, innumerable clashes at the Cave of Mahpelah, breaking the rules of the military government, all of this has taken place as part of an aggressive political struggle, which the governments of Israel had to yield to. As Rabbi Levinger has said: "we show the mumbling government the right way." Back then, the settlers wanted to show the military government the right way to deal with the Arabs.

In 1967 the residents of Kiriat Arbah restored order during the disturbances in Hebron. Once they caught Shaykh Rajab al-Tamimi (who had since been expelled) and at the point of a gun forced him to remove a barrier which Arab youths had set up on the road. Later, they stopped Arabs and "taught them a lesson" with the help of a dog and with beatings. The police had to interfere when the settlers broke into Arab homes and caused damage, or when the suspicion arose that someone from Kiriat Arbah shot and killed an Arab boy and an Arab girl who demonstrated in Halhul (he was put on trial and was freed).

After the Begin government established the settlements in Ramallah and Nablus areas the clashes increased (it is correct to say that this government too had to yield to Gush Emunim after the scuffles of the 1977 patrol). The many instances of settlers engaging in acts of retaliation, shooting, searching, detaining suspects, etc, are known, and each person can draw his own conclusions. The settlers did not cease arguing that the military government and the security service abandoned them and forced them to resort to self-defense. Once they even put two Arab workers of the electric company in jail in Ofrah, after they came to collect debts from the settlement. In other incidents, the settlers refused to hand over their weapons to the representatives of the military government who ordered them to do so. In Ofrah and Kiriat Arbah the settlers even went so far as to establish their own security committees.

The next stage was unusual and interesting. Instead of combatting the vigilantism of the armed settlers, the latter were put under the law through a restraint order. Each reserve soldier among them was taken out of his regular army unit and placed in the "area defense" of the settlements which was established on the West Bank. The concept of area defense is an old one in the IDF. After the unsuccessful experience of the settlements in the Golan Heights in the Yom Kippur War it was decided by the defense system to improve it. In the past, the area defense of border settlements operated against enemies from across the border. The innovation in the Gush Emunim settlements is that now the area defense is used for internal security, to guard against the surrounding Arab settlements (as was the case in the War of Independence).

Consciously or unconsciously a situation was created in the West Bank similar to the pre-state days, in which settlers, civilian soldiers, fight Arab marauders, whether they are children throwing stones or terrorists using firearms (in those days there were called "gangs"). The area defense units in the Gush Emunim settlements are politically homogenous military units, which are integrated in the security activities of the border guard and the IDF in various sections.

The problem begins when the suspicion arises that members of the area defense units of Gush Emunim do not act exactly (an understatement) according to routine military orders and directives. Unfortunately, we do not know who attacked the mayors in the West Bank; we do not know who put explosives a few days ago at the marketplace in Hebron, who placed a bomb around the same time at the home of the head of the village of Surayf, and we do not know who had put a bomb a few days ago at the offices of the AL FAJR newspaper in East Jerusalem. When I asked official spokesmen, I was told that it could have been Jews or Arabs, or even secret agents of outside bodies active in the area. After all, the Gush Emunim people participate in the security of Ramallah and Nablus as part of the IDF, and only in one instance a suspicion arose as to their failing to do their duty.

It happened after unknown persons broke the windows of scores of Arab vehicles in Ramallah and Al Birah, during a few hours one night, destroyed stores and property. A border guard barrier discovered in the middle of the operation a vehicle from the Bet El Yeshiva on its way to Ramallah, carrying stones and a hammer.

The passengers of course belonged to the area defense of Ramallah and had the unit's army radio. The IDF checked to see whether they were on duty and who was on active reserve duty. It was not possible to find out what the purpose of their trip to Ramallah was. A police spokesman said that they were arrested but refused to cooperate with the investigators. Be it as it may, it is hard to put someone on trial because of intentions, and the case was closed.

To judge from this suspicion and from the fact that explosives were found in the attic of the Kotel Yeshiva in the old city (here two soldiers were accused of keeping explosives without permission, using military vehicles without permission, and passing for officers--since no evidence was found of any intentions to engage in terrorist activities), it seems that we are dealing here with a dangerous political subversion trend. It is most important to find out who is carrying out these acts of terrorism in the territories, especially when it could be Jews. Finding a legal angle is peripheral compared to discovering a militant and aggressive political trend which becomes subversion. The Security Service is making an effort to find out who had put the explosives in the mayor's cars, but Israeli governments, especially the present one, neglect the underpinnings of the undermining of the state's authority which started with Gush Emunim and which is growing both in Israel and in the territories.

BANK GOVERNOR OFFERS RECESSION CURE

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 12 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Arye Lavi, HA'ARETZ writer on economic affairs: "Negotiated Package To Make Shorter Restraints Possible"]

[Text] Negotiation of a package for freezing prices, wages and taxes will make it possible to shorten the period of restraints, the Governor of the Bank of Israel Mr Arnon Gafni said yesterday in an interview with HA'ARETZ.

If a negotiated package is not signed, and the prospects for achieving agreement are few because of the political situation in the country, restraints will be continued for a longer period; it will be necessary to cut the budget and credits even further. Mr Gafni stated that his position on this issue is known to the finance minister, but that he does not know whether he will support the idea of a freeze.

The governor believes that now is the right time for the economy for a negotiated package which will put an end to the inflationary spiral. In his view, it is desirable for the sides to reach agreement even if there can be no full agreement.

As to the allegation of the president of the Manufacturers Association Mr Avraham Shavit, that there is no place for a freeze agreement after the payment of wage increases of 70 percent, Mr Gafni said that the cost-of-living accord was signed by Mr Shavit and had he not been able to pay, he surely would not have signed such an agreement. Cost-of-living increments which have been paid are for the increases which have taken place already and now agreement should be reached which will prevent additional increases.

In the governor's opinion there have not been any realistic wage increases this year and all of the increases merely compensated for the cost-of-living advances which have taken place up to now. An orderly freeze of prices, taxes and wages would also bring about a reduction in the number of unemployed and make possible a renewal of economic growth.

The chairman of the Chambers of Commerce Association, Mr Avner Ben Yakar, yesterday expressed support for the governor's proposal. That is, on condition that the agreement include as well a freeze on the foreign exchange rates. He said that he had suggested the idea of a freeze to the governor, in a letter which he had sent to him more than a week ago.

FINANCES LIMIT POLICE ACTIVITY

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 15 Aug 80 p 13

[Editorial: "The Police Force--Not Projects Alone"]

[Text] Twelve billion Israel Pounds--that is the amount required, according to the national headquarters of the police, to rehabilitate and reorganize the Israel Police Force in the next five years. The force has a complement shortage of 5,000, its weapons are inadequate and obsolete, its motorized fleet suffers constant accidents as a result of a shortage of parts and poor maintenance. The Inspector General, Commander Herzl Shapir, told the press about the diminished physical fitness of the police officers and of his intentions to advance the retirement age of police personnel.

These are all important factors which explain the failure of the Israel police in its war against rising crime that is sweeping the country in an unprecedented manner--and we have already evaluated the crime situation in the country as severe.

Reporters who spoke with the finance minister following his visit to the national headquarters got the impression that Mr Hurvitz understood the need for infusing additional funds into the police force in light of its severe situation, despite the overall goal of cutting the budgets of governmental ministries.

It may thus be assumed that the multi-year plan of the police, Plan "New Wine," will be accepted by the government when it is brought up for approval in another 2 weeks. The new Inspector General, Commander Shapir, will be able to interpret that as a personal victory. Since taking up his duties on 1 January 1980, he has dealt primarily with the working out of the plan. The public has, without a doubt, gained thereby. It is possible that the citizen complaining about a break-in of his apartment will now have to wait less time for the investigators to arrive at his home, and that we shall see in the cities' streets more mobile police and more police officers--and perhaps even stronger police officers able to prevail over the hoodlums.

Yet it is difficult to escape the feeling that in Plan "New Wine"--or at least in what has been made public about it--and in the funds that will be invested in it, there is not enough to guarantee automatic success to the police department in its war against crime. The plan is designed, principally, to improve the operational capability of the police department. This is without a doubt an important goal, yet when crime is as organized and sophisticated as it is today physically fit officers and superior operational organization are not sufficient. No less important --and perhaps even more important--is the capability of the police department to investigate and solve sophisticated crimes with no less sophisticated means. What is required is: to enlarge the weight of the investigative arm within the police department, with a constant utilization of the police intelligence and operational activity to implement the findings of the investigation, as the last link in the chain.

These were the recommendations of the Shimron Commission, and it appears that they have remained within the realm of desire. The poisonous plague cannot be eliminated by night raids on settlements, and the gang wars these days cannot be overcome by night sweeps alone. Such operations will not bring about a solution for a single one of the 27 (of 51) murders which have been committed during the first half of this year and remain unsolved, the majority of which have been described as "the settling of accounts of the underworld." Operational capability, be it even the best, will aid but meagerly in the elimination of the branch of "contractors" for arson and bombings in the criminal world which has existed for years, and about which only recently it was reported in a secret report of the police department intelligence division.

It is to be assumed that the Inspector General, after he has been freed from his extended preoccupation with preparations for Plan "New Wine," will give his attention also to this aspect of the police department's organization.

HOUSING SHORTAGE SAID CAUSE OF RESENTMENT AMONG YOUNG

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 3 Aug 80 p 8

[Article by David Moshiev: "The Housing Shortage--A Time Bomb"]

[Text] The ongoing demonstrations by young married couples, and the incursions of apartments and buildings are indicative of the severity of the housing shortage in Israel. The precipitous rise in the price of apartments in the country above and beyond the cost-of-living increases which appear on the scale of the high price of construction--only aggravate the problem. Many people who formerly were able to acquire apartments on the free market are unable now to do this, because they were not born to millionaire parents or because they did not win millions in the lottery or in the sports pools.

The housing shortage exists not only in the urban sector, but in the depressed neighborhoods on the outskirts of the cities as well. There is a particularly acute housing shortage in the worker settlements, and especially in specific smallholders' cooperative settlements [moshavim]. There are many hundreds of people of moshav origin who reside in abandoned cattle sheds near the homes of their parents for lack of other housing. The problem in these moshavim is severe. The birth rate in them is high, above the national Israeli average; the returning sons are unable to build a "family nest" for they lack the housing and the government does not help.

The pathetic situation in which the country is immersed in the area of housing was caused by the Likud government which promised "to do well by the nation." Alignment governments (at all times and during all periods) were concerned about keeping government construction at a high level and maintaining a substantial inventory of apartments in the market, something which influenced the prices of apartments. In addition to that, bonuses were granted and savings plans were offered to all the citizenry so that they might achieve housing.

The Likud government upon its rise to rule, did away within a very short time with the inventory of apartments which were on hand in Israel and which had been constructed during the term of the Alignment, through fear of losses, thereby enriching the speculator elements, which were able to pay cash for the apartments offered them on relatively good terms. But this is not its only sin. In parallel to this activity, the Likud government most drastically limited government housing starts. Thus, the inventory of apartments in Israel is particularly meager. When we add to that the galloping inflation--with the compliments of the government--and the high price of apartments, we find that an apartment has become a commodity far removed from the capability of the average citizen in the market.

Only the most massive and expanded construction of housing units in various parts of the country, granting of convenient and reasonable terms to those lacking housing who are eligible for it, but who are unable to bear the payments of millions of pounds for acquisition of an apartment--can help in the solution of the crisis of the housing shortage in the country.

The Labor party should, even now, prepare a comprehensive and detailed plan for solution of the problem, which will answer all of the needs in the cities and in the villages. There will be the need for the implementation of such a plan immediately after the Israeli voter, on the day of elections, gives a mandate to the Alignment to make up the next Israeli government.

The Likud government failed seriously in the matter of housing in Israel, and demonstrated its total helplessness in this area. There is no salvation for Israel in this government, and the citizenry of the state will be unable to acquire apartments as long as it continues "to do well by the people."

ABSORPTION DIFFICULTIES IN THE NEW TOWNS

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 7 Aug 80 p 12

[Article by Shim'on Weiss: "To Stem the Exodus From the Development Towns"]

[Text] An insufficient number of the heads of local jurisdictions in the Galilee assembled recently in the community center in Safad, to confer and find solutions to the wave of emigrants which is now plaguing the development towns in the Galilee, and to the almost total freeze in the number of people being absorbed in the Galilee. Less than 10 heads of local councils assembled in Safad to listen, among other things to the gloomy forecast for next year, as it was presented by the manager of the Center for Direction to Development Towns, Zohar Gindel. "The period of the long summer vacation is the time for moving to new settlements by most of the citizenry and the Center for Direction, which year after year was flooded with hundreds of applicants and interested people, today stands before an empty trough. Although in the year 1978/79 an increase in the number of those coming to the Galilee was reported--I fear for the coming year. The situation is undoubtedly serious. There is a halt in the movement of settlers in the Galilee, and to the development towns generally. My forecase is that with the existing and foreseeable figures in the employment and housing market, there will be a drastic drop in the number of applicants and there will be almost no absorption of new settlers in the development towns."

According to Gindel, this kind of situation did not exist for many years in the Center for Direction to the Development Towns which is quartered in Tel Aviv but whose branches reach into all the development towns in the country. Citing the figures on the number abandoning the development towns in the north was sufficient to demonstrate the seriousness of the situation, and the gloomy future. According to data from the Central Statistics Office 14,080 residents left the Galilee in the year 1978/79 and informed sources point to an even larger number. Many of those abandoning the towns remain "residents of the development towns in theory," so as not to lose the privileges that they are afforded as such inhabitants.

A New Plan

The Center for Direction to the Development Towns recently completed a plan which will ease, possibly, the distress and find answers to a portion of the problems. "We must make cooperative efforts in 2 areas," says Gindel. "The one, strengthening the absorption system and preparing the settlers who have arrived in the development towns and the second--organization and action to prevent exodus." The proposal which was developed by the Center for Direction and which was brought to the meeting at Safad, discusses appointment of an absorption coordinator in each city and the setting up of local absorption committees, in which the community workers will participate in the relief bureaus. Gindel details the functions of the absorption coordinators and the committees: "Assembling data regarding the principal reasons why a family abandons, pinpointing the immediate factors requiring care for and aid to the new families, dealing with the problems of the children in the educational institutions, planning and help for the new families to take root in the community activity in the settlement, planning special activity for new families in the stages of their absorption, and creating personal contacts and ongoing follow up." The absorption coordinator, on the other hand, will be the one with overall responsibility and will match the implementation of the goals placed upon all the absorption factors in the settlement. According to the proposal, the mayor or the municipal council will head the absorption committees, and the Center for Director to the Development towns will direct the work of the committees from a professional standpoint.

The mayors and the council heads who participated in the conference in Safad accepted with appreciation the mobilization by the Center for Direction to deal with the difficult situation which had been created, but according to the expressed opinions of the participants, it is doubtful whether they see in the absorption committees and in the coordinators the most important thing. Menahem Ariav of Nazareth Ilit alleged that the government favors only a small number of settlements in the Galilee to which it grants the incentives and the funds, resulting in damage to all the others and to a distortion of the balance. As an example, Ariav cited Carmiel which, since its establishment in the mid-sixties, enjoyed intensified industrialization and various concesssions the result of which, it would appear, were not long in coming.

By contrast, Aharon Nahamias, mayor of the Municipality of Safad, was optimistic. According to him, despite the present data being discouraging there is at least one positive aspect and that is that in comparison to the first 5 years of the decade of the seventies there occurred in the second five years a steady increase--albeit moderate--in the number of people absorbed in the Galilee as compared with those abandoning it. With respect to the future, Nahamias does not hide his trepidation. "We hear of unemployment and housing shortages even in places considered strong and immunized such as Carmiel, and all this in addition to an almost total drop in the bonuses and the various loans which reach those arriving at the development towns. At one time there was free school tuition for the children of the development towns. Today--all must pay. Today everyone recoils from linked mortgages, so what's left? We must press and apply wherever necessary with a demand that the system of incentives in the development towns continue high relative to the rest of the country--and in that way only will they come to us."

Bennie Shalita, head of the local council at the moshava Menahemia, commented during the conference that if the settlements in the Galilee were included in the statistical categories of the development towns the numbers and the graphs would appear differently, far more positive. People in the Galilee are the evidence that 8 settlements in the Galilee are blooming today. Shalita argues that day after day tens of applications to be absorbed in the moshava which is in the Jordan Valley reach his desk and he is unable to respond to them positively since all the housing units are occupied "and all of this is taking place without publicity, without fanfare and without a Center for Direction--only with true quality of life and serenity." According to him, the root of the evil is in the governmental officialdom which prefers to equalize in every way the development towns remote from the middle of the country and from the large cities and thereby to cause itself fewer headaches. It is impossible for there to be equality of incentives between a dense Tel Aviv and the sparsely populated development towns and that everything be seen only through figures, merely because this is more convenient for the clerks in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. This is mockery to the poverty-stricken. Today, it is not enough to draw settlers by a mere call to come to 'quiet and to quality of life.' People want to know prices, too, and it is not possible for the municipality of Tel Aviv and me to be the same. We must cry out against this incredible equality."

In-Depth Survey

According to Amos Lutan, adapter of government activities in Galilee and himself a Safad resident, the solution lies not only in the setting up of absorption committees, with all the importance of those. "People are abandoning the Galilee today even after many years of living there and exaggerated bonuses. There must be an in-depth examination of the reasons for the abandonment, not merely a look at the dry figures. We're talking about level of life, about education, about society--these are the dominant factors that shape good absorption and by extension--the good life. Take Carmiel: it had been planned from the start with a proper base for absorption and today it is decisively altering the balance of abandonment of the Galilee, and making it more positive, at least from a statistical standpoint. All the other villages were hastily constructed so as to find refuge for immigrants who came during the fifties and needed a place, even a temporary one, to establish themselves. Aid during those years was for a short time, if at all. And afterwards all the immigrants were left to their own devices."

In Lutan's opinion it is easier today to stem the exodus than to build a complete absorption system, and that is why we must examine what is to be done in the cities themselves to improve the atmosphere and what is granted to the residents within the various limits. His suggestion to the head of the jurisdictions is to freeze the construction and housing budgets and transfer them to improving the quality of life in order to do right by the settlers who linked their fate with settlement in the Galilee. In this connection Lutan proposes to conduct a sweeping and fundamental survey of the factors for abandonment of the Galilee and to conduct a widely representative symposium in which all delegates of the factors related to the Galilee will take part. "This will at least increase the awareness among the public and the higher levels of the state of the issue of the Galilee," he says.

All were in agreement on at least one fact--that Carmiel is a good example of absorption. Despite the distresses of the present and the early signs of unemployment which exist in this city too, in recent years it has absorbed more than any other development town in the country. When Avi Orenstein, director of the absorption department in Carmiel, described the work which his department is doing and the results, his colleagues were only able to envy him and the residents of his city. Everything had been accomplished there in an official and approved manner; the absorption department in Carmiel has allocated to it a greater share of the budgets and the personnel. Most of them, incidentally, do their work as volunteers. The follow-up is already begun at the former place of residence of the new family and intensifies with the family's arrival at Carmiel and during its early period there. Four years after its arrival, the new family is still "under follow-up," which continues until everyone is convinced that absorption of the family has been concluded in the best possible light. It is not surprising therefore to hear Orenstein state: "Our fear is that we shall be unable to fulfill our mission, because week after week we receive over 200 applications to come and live in Carmiel."

Time will tell if, in the other development towns as well, the fear of a minority of arrivals will convert to a fear of the large number of arrivals.

BRIEFS

SPOKESMAN DENIES ISRAELI AID--The spokesman of the Kurdish Democratic Party today denied that Israel had supplied the Kurdish rebels with weapons when they were fighting against the Baghdad authorities. A few days ago Prime Minister Menahem Begin disclosed that Israel had helped the Kurdish rebellion in various ways. Today a Kurdish spokesman, in a conversation with our London correspondent, said that no such aid had ever been given and he accused Mr Begin of an attempt to disrupt the good relations between the Kurdish Party and Baghdad. IRAQI ACTION AGAINST IRAN 'RIGHTED A WRONG'

[Article by Ahmad al-Jarallah: "The Ability to Rectify Wrong Situations"]

[Excerpts] Iraq has done what Iran did, with the difference that Iraq has righted a wrong by force, whereas Iran obtained by force what was unjustly sought.

When the shah was strong and conceited he demanded what he wanted and in so doing he relied on his worldwide influence and good international relations. He also exploited Iraq's weakness when its foreign relations were strained and nobody wanted to cooperate with it because it was unstable, while Iran was stable and had close relations with the United States and good relations with Russia. The Soviet looked at him from a standpoint of "better to have an understanding enemy than an ignorant one." Japan and Europe supported the shah because they saw in him the future man of the region. The shah used his influence against Iraq--influence strong enough to force certain Arab countries to bring pressure on Iraq to be flexible even at the expense of its interests and national sovereignty. In fact, Iraq was told then: "Accept so as to win Iran over." This is what happened 5 years ago, but now Iraq has rectified the situation at a time when Baghdad is enjoying the same advantages which the previous Iranian regime enjoyed in the past. Baghdad now has good international relations with the Soviets and with the free world countries, which find in the Baghdad government a regime with which understanding can be reached.

Iraq has benefited from a favorable international situation in which Iran's relations with the two superpowers are strained, its relations with the free world are bitter, and its relations within the area are tense because of political mismanagement resulting from an abnormal revolution and a change in the regime that went beyond all calculations.

It is up to Iran now to show flexibility, something which it has not really lost, just as Iraq was flexible over something for which it paid with its national rights and which the time had come to recover.

SOVIET RELATIONS WITH LEBANESE FRONT EXAMINED

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 12 Jul 80 pp 12-13

[Article by Ibrahim Salamah: "From Kabul to Bikfayya"]

[Text] The Idea of the Lebanese Front Contacting Moscow Originated in al-Kaslik [locale designates major Maronite monastery near Juniyah]

Amin Al-Jumayyil: Our Relations with the Soviets Are Not Strong, Because They Are Our Adversaries' Allies

The Soviet Embassy's Staff in Beirut Met with Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, with Amin and Bashir al-Jumayyil, and with Dany Sham'un, First in Secret, Then in Public

Throughout the past 30 days, Lebanese-Soviet relations have developed in a surprising way. This was expected by few people concerned with international policy in the Middle East. Two Lebanese delegations arrived in Moscow, one after another, within a period of 20 days. The first was composed of Walid Jumblatt, head of the Progressive Socialist Party, and secretary general of the Lebanese National Movement. He was accompanied by Samir Franjiyah, nephew of former President Sulayman Franjiyah, and one of the prominent Maronite dignataries in northern Lebanon.

The second delegation represented the central committee of the Lebanese Communist Party, and was composed of Georges Hawi, the party's secretary general, along with a group of comrade members of the Lebanese Communist Party's political bureau. Two prominent members of the Soviet Communist Party's political bureau, Andrei Kirlinko, who is currently the number three man in the pyramid of Soviet power, and Boris Bonamaryov, who is the official responsible for Third World Liberation movements and who currently holds the post of secretary of the Soviet Communist Party's central committee, met with the two Lebanese delegations.

This was in Moscow. In Beirut, it was recently announced that the Soviet ambassador to Beirut, Soldatov, had three lengthy meetings with three of the most prominent leaders of the Lebanese Front, former President Camille Sham'un, Shaykh Amin al-Jumayyil, member of parliament for al-Matan, and his brother Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, leader of the "Lebanese Front."

Observers have dwelt extensively on analyzing the Soviet initiative in Lebanon. Some say that it is the beginning of Moscow's new policy in most Middle East areas, through which Moscow will attempt to return to the political scene in the Middle East, by means of renewing or reviving its old alliance (of Czarist days) with racial and sectarian minorities in the countries of the Arab East.

Others have not lent importance to the matter, viewing the Soviet initiative as certainly intended to counter the American and European initiatives in the Middle East.

However, the basic question remains: What motived the Lebanese Front leaders to get in touch with Moscow's representatives?

The answer to this question calls for caution, because both parties (Moscow and the Lebanese Front) are maintaining secrecy about the dialogue which has been held, and, so far, there has not been the slightest indication of any basic change in the two sides' positions.

From Paris, AL-MUSTAQBAL contacted Shyakh Amin al-Jumayyil, seeking an explanation. This information comes direct from the member of parliament for northern al-Matan and a prominent leader in the Lebanese Phalange Party: "Our relations with the Soviets are long-standing, beginning with the time of Sarfar Azimov, Moscow's ambassador to Beirut (before the war). At that time, the Soviet ambassador visited Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, head of the Phalangists, and extended an invitation to him to visit the Soviet Union as a member of a high-level Lebanese delegation, including such prominent members as former Premier 'Abdullah al-Yafi and Imam Musa al-Sadr. When Azimov was transferred from his post in Beirut, the invitation was not renewed. We contacted him and remonstrated. The outgoing ambassador thereupon gave a party in Shaykh Pierre's honor. The discussion with my father was kept under wraps at that time."

Shaykh Amin continued: "In that period, I met with Azimov, who invited me to visit the Soviet Union. I accepted the invitation, accompanied by two friends, Michel Edde and Fariq al-Taybi. The visit lasted 20 days. That visit could be considered the beginning of serious relations between us and Moscow."

[Question] What happend after that?

[Answer] Since Mr Soldatov's selection to represent the Soviet Union in Lebanon, it was clear that he was in favor of the Palestinian Resistance and its Lebanese allies who are known as the National Movement. Therefore, no meeting between us and the Soviet representative took place throughout the

2-year war. The first meeting occurred during the autumn of 1979, at the home of former Minister Farid Rufayil in the Hazamiyah district. Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil and Pierre Far'un, in his capacity as agent for Soviet commercial shipping lines, attended on the Lebanese side, apart from the host, former Minister Rufayil. On the Soviet side, there was Ambassador Soldatov, accompanied by the first secretary of the Soviet embassy in Beirut, Alexander Mosayef.

After this meeting, there were repeated meetings between us and Soviet representatives.

I met more than once in Beirut with the embassy's first secretary. In one of the meetings, we were joined by Dany Sham'un, President Camille Sham'un's eldest son. The meeting was held in the town of Faqra, in the mountains of Lebanon. Then I met again secretly with Soviet Ambassador Soldatov. After that, the Soviet ambassador met with Shaykh Bashir some months ago at Pierre Far'un's house in al-Ashrafiyah. Then there were the recent public meetings between Soldatov and President Sham'un and Shaykh Bashir.

[Question] In your estimation, what were the results of these meetings?

[Answer] So far, just good feelings, because the Soviets are linked with the National Movement as well as the Palestinian Resistance. We asked them on more than one occasion to free themselves from the "joint communique" signed on their part with Abu 'Ammar [Yasir 'Arafat], which unequivocally stipulates the Palestinians' right to fight using Lebanese territory as a starting point. Their answer was: "We do not interfere in Lebanese internal affairs."

In the opinion of [myself] Shaykh Amin, the Soviets began to get close to the front after they heard and read our critical remarks about America's policy on Lebanon in particiular, and on the Palestinian issue in general. So far, there is nothing serious between us and them. [end of answer]

This was a summary of the views of Shaykh Amin al-Jumayyil, a prominent official in the Phalange Party. Non-Phalangist Lebanese political circles look at the matter from another angle. Here is a summary of their views:

The Lebanese crisis has lasted longer than the most pessimistic persons expected. The reason for the situation remaining as it is is mutual international and Arab understanding, which Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil described, in his speech at the Yacht Club on 22 June, by saying: "Our desire is to take over all of Lebanon, along with every Lebanese fighting for Lebanon. The day we decide to take over the government in the eastern sector, we will give the Palestinian a present, so that he can take over the government in the western sector. This will be Lebanon's partition, and the Americans will be happy."

A new development in the chain of events of the Lebanese war is what could be described as a crisis of confidence between yesterday's allies. After Dany Sham'un's statement in L'ORIENT-LE JOUR, in which he expressed his

"disappointment with respect to the United States and Israel," Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil stated clearly, in comment on the crisis: "We felt as if we were being turned out of our own house. Our friends sold us out and conspired against us. Lebanon is not abandoned territory, nor is it an American or Soviet province." (Yacht Club speech--AL-NAHAR, dated 29 June 1980)

The state of Lebanon (the legitimate one) shares the view of the Lebanese Front leaders regarding the attitude of the West toward the Lebanese crisis. The Lebanese Government's relations with the French authorities are worse than lukewarm and are almost semi-severed. Three events confirm this crisis of lack of confidence.

The first is French President Giscard d'Estaing's refusal to visit Lebanon during his recent tour of most of the Arab capitals.

The second is Lebanese President Sarkis' receiving Mr George Marchet, the French communist leader. He is one of the leaders of the French opposition, that is, Giscard's opponents.

The third is Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus' statement, in which he declared: "Britain's position regarding the Lebanese crisis is more clear and better understood than the French Government's position."

There is an international diplomatic and media blockade of the Lebanese crisis. President Sham'un talked about this crisis when he stated, criticizing the regime's moves in international policy: "Minister Butrus and President Sarkis must be learning international policy from Abu 'Ammar." The interpretation of the former president's words is that the Lebanese Government must maintain ties or men bridges with all friendly and neutral international parties, in the hope of reaching a satisfactory solution which would restore peace and soveriegnty to Lebanon.

Following Sham'un's statement, the question arises: To what extent is it possible to develop the Lebanese-Soviet flirtation?

If the objective of this flirtation is to annoy Washi[illegible] as Shaykh Amin believes, then this tactic is fragile. But, if it turns into something of a strategy, then it means that Moscow's leaders are no longer betting on just one horse on the Lebanese racecourse as they did in the past, and that their new kind of struggle with Washington might force them to assist and flirt with the strong and active minorities in the Arab East.

The idea of contacting Moscow is not new on the Lebanese scene. At the height of the 2-year war, on the exact day Washington sent its representative, Dean Brown, to Beirut, some priests of al-Kaslik broached the idea of extending a hand [of reconciliation] to Moscow. The author of the idea was Abbot Qazi, who at one time headed the college of Lebanese monastic orders.

An eyewitness recounts the details of the conversation between Mr Brown and Abbot Qazi along the following lines: Abbot Qazi said: "Mr Dean, let us put the war aside. Is it in America's best interests to abandon the Christians of Lebanon, despite cultural and humanitarian aspects?" Mr Dean replied, "Excuse me, but I must make America's position very clear to you. In short (and he said this in English) Lebanon's Christians can go to hell. We are not fighting for Christians in the East, and you must understand that, for the last time."

Immediately after that meeting, the al-Kaslik group began to study ways of getting in touch with Moscow, on the basis of a theological, philosophical theory that the theory of dialectics, which is the backbone of the Soviet system, is the product of the industrial, Christian society. This theory cannot be widely disseminated in the Islamic, Arab World. Therefore, a time will come when Moscow will clash with the majority of Middle Eastern people. Moscow will not find anyone better able to understand it than the Chrisitians of Lebanon, and some other minorities. It was Abbot Qazi's belief that "there is nothing wrong with solidifying good relations with Moscow, if Moscow aids us, in deed and not words, in rescuing Lebanon from its ordeal."

It is obvious that the analysis of al-Kaslik, especially Abbot Qazi's, was not just a summer night's dream. Moscow was expelled from Egypt in an unseemly manner. Then, her relations with Somalia became strained, and it had to move its guns from the Somali port of Berbera to the Ethiopian port of Massawa. Finally, Moscow has been engaged for several months now in a difficult war in Afghanistan, opposed by the masses with strikes, insurrection and all kinds of weapons.

From Kabul to Bikfayya?

Why not?

There is no room for sentiment in politics, because common interests are eternal inducements for such reversals as these. Although, as some many think, the Phalange is a right-wing party and former Presdient Sham'un is no socialist, Moscow has in the past cooperated with and supported right-wing regimes and non-communist parties, led by the Arab Ba'th Party itself, which was created basically to stop the communist spread in countries of the Arab East.

A strategy or a tactic? That question has become somewhat secondary. With the passage of time, especially in the Arab World, tactics might turn into strategies. Let us wait and see, as the English say. Perhaps the Lebanese war, which began unexpectedly, will end in an unexpected way.

SOVIET RECONCILIATORY ROLE IN LEBANON ANALYZED

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 12 Jul 80 p 14

[Article by Ghassan Bayram: "Soviet Wood to Cook Lebanese Reconciliation Recipe! Moscow's Positive Neutrality Enters Phase of Practical Initiatives!"]

[Text] Moscow has let it be known that it is ready to offer its good offices for the achievement of Lebanese-Lebanese and Lebanese-Palestinian accord, on the basis of Soviet conviction that the situation in Lebanon must not remain unchanged, and that steps must be taken to correct it.

Informed political sources in the Lebanese capital couple this readiness to mediate with Moscow's current belief that the Lebanese situation, as it now stands, has begun to develop into a factor serving Camp David plans concerning the region.

The Soviet ambassador to Beirut, Mr Soldatov, was charged with conveying his country's readiness to Lebanese Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus during the meeting the two had a few days ago.

Informed Soviet sources in the Lebanese capital declined to clarify whether this Soviet readiness reflected a mere gesture of good will, or constituted a Soviet initiative on behalf of accord in Lebanon. At the same time, the Lebanese foreign minister chose to speak openly and in detail about his meeting with the Soviet ambassador regarding this matter. However, with regard to whether Ambassador Soldatov agreed with him on initiatives which would begin within a specific timeframe, Mr Butrus, in a private meeting, was content to say that the Soviet ambassador discussed the Lebanese situation with him in all its internal, Arab and international dimensions, and expressed his country's readiness to assist in achieving reconciliation.

Ever since the beginning of the crisis, or Lebanon's ordeal, the Soviet Union's public positions have remained limited to public expressions of support for Lebanon's unity and independence. This is the first time that Soviet statements have been made on readiness to participate in solving specific aspects of the Lebanese crisis, namely, Lebanese-Lebanese and Lebanese-Palestinian reconciliation in Lebanon.

One must refer at this point to the fact that this Soviet readiness was preceded by several meetings and dialogues between the Soviet ambassador to Beirut and the Lebanese Front, represented by both former President Camille Sham'un and Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, head of the war council of the Lebanese Phalange Party. As has become known, these dialogues dealt with the Maronite position in general, the Syrian role in Lebanon, the Palestinian presence in Lebanon, and what guarantees Moscow could give regarding the Syrian role and the future of the Palestinian presence.

Those who are knowledgeable about the Soviet contacts with the Lebanese Maronite front are aware that the dialogue which took place was conducted in a positive atmosphere. They emphasize that the readiness conveyed by Ambassador Soldatov to Minister Butrus was a result of the dialogue which Soldatov had with Camille Sham'un and Bashir al-Jumayyil. This dialogue represented moves started by Moscow to create the necessary atmosphere for a new political initiative. This time, it would be comprehensive in nature, not confined as before to the Palestinians and their leftist allies in the Lebanese National Movement.

The Soviets have not so far begun to translate their new readiness into practical steps and initiatives. The conviction which continues to be held by senior Lebanese officials, especially President Ilyas Sarkis, is that any practical Soviet assistance to Lebanon has to start with the Palestinians.

The simple explanation for this Lebanese belief is that Moscow, as a superpower, has by itself sufficient influence on the Palestinians to convince them of the need to carry out whatever would help Lebanon to regain its unity and accord among its people.

Some Lebanese officials believe that if this positive Soviet readiness is motivated by a desire to combat Camp David plans and pull the Lebanese situation out of the zone of pressure being applied by the Camp David parties, the results of this Soviet readiness would surely appear now and manifest themselves in facilitating the success of the efforts of Lebanese President Ilyas Sarkis to form a government of national reconciliation.

Efforts to form this reconciliatory government are apparently still at an impasse, and are awaiting the results of the continuous efforts of the Syrian Government to resolve the difficult problem of former President Sulayman Franjiyah. He still rejects the formation of and his participation in a cabinet of political activists, as long as it requires effective Phalange Party participation in it.

The outgoing prime minister, Dr Salim al-Huss, who has played an indirect advisory role in creating this conviction [in Soviet ability to influence the Palestinians], is the winner in this situation, especially following a meeting held between him and President Ilyas Sarkis. Right after the meeting, al-Huss told some of his political friends that the president had lost hope with respect to forming a government of political activists, and that he is now in the process of investigating alternatives.

A day or two before President Sarkis met with al-Huss, the presidential palace had not completely switched to this new frame of mind. But a close friend who has just visited the palace confirmed the feeling that President Sarkis has begun preparing to turn his attention away from a government of activists.

This politician friend asked the president to clarify this point, and put the following question to him: "In the event a government of reconciliation and political activists cannot be formed, to what extent would you say there is a possibility of forming a government like the one that has resigned, or at least re-establishing the outgoing government?"

President Sarkis replied, "We do not wish to talk just yet about alternatives to a government of activists. If we did so, we would weaken the idea of such a government and the climate in which it grew. And we would thereby turn the spotlight on matters of form at the expense of substance."

The President went on to say: "Therefore, I would not want to even talk about a different type of government, even though I have very little hope left of being able to form a government of activists. We must continue to devote our total attention to a government of national reconciliation, and all initiatives and contacts must be based on this idea."

The political friend returned from his visit to the palace completely convinced that the president is serious about pursuing the task of forming a government of reconciliation, and that he would not cease his efforts in this regard, even if it took the entire month of July. The President feels that if he became ultimately convinced that all doors are shut in the face of a government of activists, there would be no problem in forming a new government, like the one that resigned, with an hour or a very few days at the outside.

The issue, with regard to President Sarkis, is not a simple matter of winning or losing in this effort. The initiative to form a government of reconciliation began with and continues to stem from a deep-rooted conviction that a government of activists would provide the right solution [for the crisis]. At the same time, such a government represents a last opportunity for President Sarkis before the end of his term, of which only 2 years remain. It also represents a last opportunity for a united Lebanon whose single entity is still threatened with disintegration and extinction. Consequently, failure to form a government of reconciliation would mean a very great deal. Success would also mean a very great deal, because it would mean the beginning of the end [of the crisis] as President Sarkis says.

CORRUPTION OF MEMBERS OF PEOPLE'S COMMITTEES DISCLOSED

Tripoli AL-ZAHAF AL-AKHDAR in Arabic 30 Jun 80 pp 20-21

[Article: "Serious Facts Discovered by the People's Committees"]

[Text] Beware of the Danger of Foreign Companies.
Busts: A Study Presented by the People's Committees.
Arab Slaves or Jewish Capitalists?

As a result of the serious facts uncovered by the People's Committees on the basis of conclusive evidence, it has become evident to the revolutionary people that some of those who live among them pretend to be pure and honest, but in reality are filled with deadly poison. These elements want to ruin the people who took it upon themselves to protect the gains and capabilities brought about by the revolution of the conqueror.

The bad practices of the exploitative society, of those who have sick souls and petrified consciences, are enough evidence of betrayal by these people of their nation. The nation always paid a heavy price of blood and wealth for their sake in the hope that they would rise to relieve the nation of its heavy burdens. But through their ugly practices, of which the People's Committees are presenting samples, they wanted to harm their nation and to drag it into unwanted aimless imperialistic schemes.

The People's Committees are busting corrupt people wherever they are found. Without any desire to seek fame or praise, these committees are trying to make the corrupt drop their imperialistic masks behind which they always try to hide. They pretend that they want to help the developing countries through companies which hide poison in their fangs.

The People's Committees seek to warn the helpless nations and to request that they right wrongs and take measures to reform past imperialist corruption and thwart continued imperialist efforts to corrupt. These nations should learn from their mistakes to become immune to the deceptive practices of imperialism, its conspiracies and its hatred for the peoples who seek freedom.

Competition Between Money and Conscience

The secretary general of the People's Committee for al-Mukhtar (al-Amin?) sold his conscience for 420 [sic] DM to a German company in 1978-79, and deposited this amount in his private account in Zurich.

During a period of 2 years, 1976-1977, he received from the Yugoslavian Milyunoritsch company the sum of 14,000 dinars, and an additional sum of 20,000 dinars in the month of August 1979. He deposited all this money in his private account in Zurich. He also received a commission of £10,000 from a British company, and he deposited this amount in his account in London. He has accounts in America, in Germany and in Switzerland. In America he has $6,000; in England, he has $9,000 and £700; and in Switzerland he has 210,000 DM. In addition, he has received a total of 29,000 dinars in cash bribes and gifts.

This was all taken at the expense of the masses which put him in his position.

He spent 1.185 million DM in bars and nightclubs. He used foreigners who work in Libya to smuggle his money, such as an engineer in the Misrata Road Construction Company, and a contractor who owns a consulting firm in Tripoli and has a branch in Germany.

He purchased foreign currency equivalent to 1.782 million dinars. His bank account in Libya is only 300 dinars, but he owns the following:

A Mercedes 450 SAL costing 20,000 dinars,

A BMW 520 costing 7,000 dinars,

(Land Carriers?) costing 30,000 dinars,

A camper costing 3,700 dinars,

A Fiat 131 costing 700 dinars,

A house under construction in which he has so far invested 50,000 dinars,

A total of 7,000 dinars in cash in his house.

Withdrawals from his bank account totalled 339,736 dinars.

He employs 13 foreign male and female employees of various professions.

He used these employees to smuggle his money outside the country.

A False Statement for 4,000 Dinars

The president of the transportation union in Ghiryan and vice president of the union in Tripoli was able to take illegal cash bribes from certain contractors.

He received a bribe of 4,000 dinars in return for delaying the takeover of a quarry that belonged to someone else, and for issuing a false statement on the radio to the effect that the takeover had actually occurred. This was done without the knowledge of the responsible committee.

He also received 500 dinars for the purpose of purchasing furniture for the union. Instead, he kept the money.

He also received a Peugeot 504 from a road construction company and 7,000 dinars from a contractor.

He received a bribe of more than 4,000 dinars from the Five Continents Company.

In addition, he received a bribe of 3,000 dinars from al-Amal company. Another 3,000 dinars were given to him by a contractor in exchange for a letter allowing the contractor to bring workers from abroad.

Prefers the Zionists Over the Arabs

This man is an accountant in the general administration of the postal service. He is in charge of all accounts related to projects and contracts. Being the only employee responsible for these accounts, it became very easy for him to do anything he wished. He has been in this job for 8 years and has received bribes in the form of money from foreign companies in return for certain favors during the execution of their projects. He studies the bids of these companies and then draws up the financing of the proposed projects. He received a bribe of 14,300 dinars from the French (Tousson?) Company through the company of Bleu-Duron-Asmar. He also received a bribe of 1,500 dinars from the representative of that same company.

From the Japanese company, Linsbun, he took a bribe of 12,770 dinars through Aytu-Sada-Hamanka-Kujima company.

From an American communications company, he received, through the company's representative, Cordyred, the sum of 25,000 dinars. In addition to all these bribes, he received commissions and luxurious trips at the expense of foreign companies. In fact, these corrupt actions were committed at the expense of the Libyan treasury. The conscience of these people were bought at the expense of the Libyan people who trusted them, in return for this trust, the people received ingratitude.

As for the bank accounts of this postal service man in Arab and non-Arab banks, he has 14,200 dinars in the International Bank of London; 2,700 dinars in the Arab Bank in Amman; 1,400 dinars in al-Zarqa' Bank in Jordan; and 50 dinars in the main office of the National Commercial Bank in Libya.

Favors to Foreign Companies and Bribes from the Peoples' Money

A surveyor working as a supervisor in the department of highways received bribes totaling 28,920 dinars from foreign companies in exchange for certain favors.

He received a bribe of 8,870 dinars from a representative of a French company, and a bribe of 4,000 dinars from a representative of another French company called Coursac.

From the Japanese company, Nisbun, he received 6,550 dinars in addition to other cash bribes he received from individuals.

Bribes and Cars in Return for Favors

The commercial director of the National Company of Trade and Machinery received a total of 16,000 dinars in bribes from foreign companies.

He was expecting a bribe of $203,000 and a BMW car from a certain individual.

He received from the Belgian company, Holmz, 30,000 dinars directly; 30,600 dinars through a person in Switzerland; and 7,850 dinars through a person in Italy.

The sums of 15,000 dinars from a person called Sahandal, 118,000 dinars from the Conitho Caro company, and 15,000 from another person were on their way to him.

Favors from Libyan Banks and Foreign Accounts

Banking favors to a businessman and previously a contractor at the al-Wafa' Contracting and Trading Company totaled 760,000 dinars from al-Wahda Bank, 200,000 dinars from the National Commercial Bank and an additional 160,000 dinars from the same bank.

As for his foreign accounts, he has 25,000 dinars at the Deutche Bank in Germany. Also, he was able to smuggle 200,000 dinars to Alexandria in order to enrich the treasury of the defeated Sadat.

As for bribes, they were all in gold and silver with an estimated value of 2,800 dinars. This is in addition to the numerous properties he owns.

The estimated cost of buildings he owns is 210,000 dinars. In addition to that, he has 15,000 dinars worth of land, 900,000 dinars worth of machinery and agricultural equipment.

The Love of Money Twisted His Mind

The total value of bank transfers to foreign countries, for the secretary of the Mediterranean Hotel Company, reached 305,000 dinars. The transfers amounted to 286,000 dinars to the Agricultural Bank in Rome; 12,000 dinars to a bank in Lausanne, Switzerland; and an additional 3,500 dinars to this same account. From the owner of Juwandi Company, he received 4,000 dinars, in addition to other bribes. He took all this by virtue of the position he was trusted with by the people. The proverb says: "Beware of those to whom you have done good."

Computer Would Fail to Add Up the Wealth of One Person

The wealth of a contractor in Benghazi could be invested in productive projects which would be beneficial to the people. The glitter of money dazzles these individuals who rob the people and deposit their loot in foreign banks to be used for imperialist purposes.

Another example of such persons is a contractor who owns buildings on al-Fatih Street. The buildings which contain 40 apartments and 16 stores are valued at 450,000 dinars.

He owns a store for spare parts which has an estimated value of 160,000 dinars.

He has purchased a 100 donum farm for 100,000 dinars. On this farm he has what is worth 200,000 dinars in buildings.

He owns an asphalt making factory valued at 60,000 dinars and road machinery valued at 100,000 dinars.

He has other investments in some factories, such as the tile factory in which he has invested 17,000 dinars.

In addition, he owns a quarry valued at 50,000 dinars, a herd of 600 sheep, and gold valued at 10,000 dinars.

What this immoral person owns now is estimated at two million dinars.

Bribes, Smuggling and Punishment

The secretary of the National Committee for Trade and Equipment used his position to accumulate wealth at the expense of the people.

He received bribes totaling 162,100 dinars from foreign companies operating inside and outside the country. This was in return for importing construction materials for sale in Libya at exorbitant prices. He used his position to facilitate transactions for a businessman who smuggled 65,000 dinars to his son who fled to live in an enemy country.

Has a Monthly Salary of 550 Dinars and Receives Bribes!

In a very short time, a member of a certain peoples' committee was able to receive a 24,000 dinar bribe, 13,000 dinars in commissions and a trailer.

MILITARY SECURITY IN GULF NATIONS SURVEYED

Paris DEFENSE NATIONALE in French Aug-Sep 80 pp 53-72

[Article by Philippe Rondot]

[Text] The holding of the American hostages in Iran and the failure of the attempt made at liberating them, the occupation of the Great Mosque in Mecca in Saudi Arabia, exacerbation of the tension on the border between Iraq and Iran and the reinforcement of the American and Soviet fleets in the Indian Ocean, on the doorstep of the Straits of Hormuz, even while the Red Army tries to "normalize" Afghanistan, have only increased the chances of conflict in this zone of ultra-sensitivity for the industrialized world.

In a recent edition, August-September 1979, Admiral Henri Labrousse and Philippe Rondot focused their attention on the Gulf, already the subject of growing fears in the West since its Persian coast had become the theater for a revolution which it was feared would spread. Bringing his observations up to date on a region he has traversed from Dhofar to Shatt al-Arab, Philippe Rondot, deputy mission chief at the Center for Advanced Studies on modern Africa and Asia, today sketches, in broad strokes, the outline of this potential theater of operations.

An editorial in the newspaper TIMES OF INDIA published in 1899 ended with this somber prediction: "It is around the Persian Gulf that the political storms of the future are preparing [to be born], and it is there that the real battle for political domination will be fought." At the time, the British had just imposed their protectorate on Oman (1891) and Kuwait (1899), and had secured against [the danger of] pirates free circulation of commercial vessels. They were thinking only of their Indian empire. In 1980, the Emirates, independent now, are profusely wealthy from their oil; Great Britain withdrew, in 1971, to the west of Suez; the Iran of the Pahlavis, which had turned itself into the protector of the Gulf with the consent and assistance of the United States, has become an Islamic republic; the Soviet Union, with its army now in Afghanistan, could tomorrow sweep down on the Straits of Hormuz; the Americans, disabled, are trying to redeploy their military strength. The conclusion of the editorial in the TIMES OF INDIA could be that of the pages which follow.

Doubtless many of the fears that many feel at this time for preservation of peace in the Gulf are not new, since the oil crisis born out of the last Israeli-Arab war of October 1973 clearly demonstrated the West's energy dependence. They were considerably aggravated for several months, especially after the President of the United States, in his State of the Union message before Congress, in Washington, on 23 January, clearly stated that "any attempt by an external power to gain control of the Persian Gulf region would be considered as an attack against the vital interests of the United States and it would be resisted by all means including the use of armed force." (1)

The Gulf has thus become a potential theater of operations about which it would be good to understand the important political and military facts, in their national aspects and in their regional and international contexts, before examining the appropriate means of providing for its security.

A Tangle of Sensitive Points

A long (800 km) arm of the sea with a surface of about 250,000 km^2, the Gulf, whose steep Iranian shoreline contrasts with a flat and often marshy Arab shoreline, offers an exceptional concentration of sensitive points: social (populations), economic (oil installations), and strategic (communications); all these can be targets for political or military action. Their overlap among the states, most of whom at their young age must remain fragile, adds to their vulnerability.

Despite the fears expressed, the riverine Arab countries have not so far suffered the effects of the Shiite revolution on the opposite bank. President Saddam Husayn has made use of all arguments, including that of [the use of] force (2), to forestall an uprising of Iraqi Shi'ites (5.5 percent [of the Iraqi population]), who moreover differ rather significantly from their better organized and more politicized Iranian co-religionists. The threat, however, remains: in Kuwait (35 percent Shi'ite), in Bahrain especially (60 percent), in Saudi Arabia (about 5 percent), in the United Arab Emirates [UAE] (Dubai first of all), the vigilance shown by the authorities, accompanied on occasion by relatively severe repression, has contained an Islamic-populist effervescence which was expressed by various mob activities and inflamed speeches. This apparent calm should not generate any illusions: because of the role played by Islam, the impact of the Iranian revolution has been serious enough to affect not only Shi'ites, but also some Sunnites. The existence of a Shi'ite majority [sic] in Iraq, traditionally restive, concentrated mainly in the south part of the country and still imperfectly integrated into political life, like the presence of numerous Shi'ites (35 percent) among the oil workers in the eastern province of Saudi Arabia (the Qatif region), are potential centers of agitation (3).

The resurgence of nationalist feelings in the ethnic minorities constitutes another factor of instability. The Kurds of Iraq, who for long years successfully opposed the central government, are not all equally content with the implementation of the autonomy that was granted them in March 1974. Those in Iran, their weapons in their hands, show their discontent at not having obtained from the new leaders any more consideration for their rights than in the time of the shah's reign. They may be joined, in these autonomist demands, by the Azerbaijani Turks, the Turcomans, the Baluchis, the Pashtuns, and the Arabs of Khuzistan. A handful of irreducible Dhofari rebels is still resisting the army of Sultan Qabus of Oman. The exploitation of these regional particularisms which are still flourishing--the Kurds and Arabs by Iraq against Iran, the Baluchis by the Soviets against Pakistan, the Dhofaris by South Yemen against Oman--is no longer, in some cases, a mere hypothesis.

Another nationalism can be exploited with even more serious results: that of the Palestinians. There are 300,000 in Kuwait in a populace wherein the nationals (less than 45 percent) are already in the minority. There as elsewhere, their competence and dynamism have often placed them in positions of responsibility. Since Yasir Arafat, head of the PLO, threatened to send his commandos to block the Straits of Hormuz or blow up the oil wells (4), one is aware even more keenly of the influence wielded by this Palestinian community present everywhere in the Gulf, except in Oman, and which up to now has remained relatively peaceful.

Moreover, it is partly due to the influence of the Palestinians that the local leftist forces have obtained the establishment of some form of democracy. Kuwait first, then Bahrain in this way for several years benefited from their only parliamentary experience. If it was put to an end, in August 1975 in Bahrain and in August 1976 in Kuwait, in order to curb progressive pressures, the re-establishment of this practice is not excluded by the leaders. In Iraq, the Baas party in power has agreed to parliamentary elections, the first in 22 years (5). In Saudi Arabia, King Khalid decided in March 1980, that a consultative council of some 60 appointed members should exercise legislative powers (6).

Preoccupied by the awakening of these socio-political forces, the government is not always certain to present a united front. In Iran, the multiplicity of centers of power enfeebles the authority of the government. In Iraq, tensions within Baas maintain a dangerous climate of suspicion. In Saudi Arabia and in the Emirates, intra-dynastic rivalries, which show up in the apportionment of official conferments and in successions, require a continual effort at balancing of powers, often at the cost of efficiency.

To these concerns for internal order is added the persistence of border conflicts or territorial claims involving Iran (Iraq-Iran, Bahrain-Iran, UAE-Iran) and also the Arab states among themselves (Iraq-Kuwait, Qatar-Bahrain, Saudi Arabia-Oman-UAE, Saudi Arabia-Yemen). Reconciliations, even when translated into treaties, have a character all the more ephemeral because external threats are often brandished as a means of re-solidifying national cohesion.

This cohesion also suffers from the presence of a multitude of immigrant workers (55 percent in Kuwait, 60 percent in Qatar, 75 percent in the UAE, 20 percent in Saudi Arabia) who could play a swing role for forces thirsting for power (7). The fact that a large number are employed in the oil industry aggravates the vulnerability of these installations, which by their concentration are already quite vulnerable (8).

Finally, one last sensitive point, and not the least: the celebrated Straits of Hormuz through which pass, as we know, 80 super-tankers per day. Its two navigable channels, in a rough area strewn with islets and rocks, in shallow water (45 to 65 m), within artillery range of the two banks (35 km wide) can be controlled, indeed blockaded, with little difficulty. Soviet bombers starting from Afghanistan are in direct range of this vital artery.

Local Disparate Military Potential

The national armies of the Gulf were fashioned in accordance with the ambitions or concerns of the riverine states. These latter being diverse, even opposed, for reasons that are at once geographical, demographic, or political, no balance of forces exists. One constant, however, emerges: all the countries, except perhaps Oman, have the financial means necessary to create an effective instrument of defense (9).

In order to make his country the dominant power in the region, the shah of Iran wanted to make his army the finest in the East. His objectives--the augmentation of mobility, almost total mechanization, sophistication in armaments, the creation of special rapid intervention forces--were attained, with the help of the United States (10), even though he lost his throne, without even being able to use this formidable battle force to serve him (if it would) as an ultimate recourse. Even more than the land army, largely deployed in the south starting in the Seventies, the air force, whose strength in manpower grew eightfold between 1965 and 1976, benefited from this effort. As to the navy, whose development was equally impressive, based on new facilities built at Kharg, Bouchir, and Bandar-Abbas, it had a sphere of action extending far beyond the Gulf, to the configuration of which it was perfectly adapted (a flotilla of hovercraft), for extending beyond Hormuz into the Indian Ocean.

In passing from the traditional military authority to the poorly defined guardianship of the Islamic republic, the Iranian army lost much of its operational efficiency. Suspiciously viewed at first by the new regime which feared the emergence within it of a counter-revolutionary current, weakened by desertions (60 percent), next committed in the bloody repression of Kurdish separatism, it presently shows signs of malaise serious enough that the government is thinking of totally reorganizing it (11). Only the navy, perhaps, has been able partly to escape this disintegration. In any case, the air-naval maneuvers of May 1980 in the Straits of Hormuz, supervised by President Bani Sadr, would tend to prove (and to make known) that republican Iran remains determined to maintain in the Gulf some of the ambitions of the fallen empire.

Saudi Arabia, seeing as early as 1970 the impressive arsenal of the shah and desirous of setting bounds to his hegemonic designs, undertook in its turn to strengthen its military capacity. It tried to compensate for weakness in manpower levels (44,500 men) by effectiveness and sophistication of equipment, which explains the very high level of military expenditure ($1,000 per inhabitant in 1976-1977). Parallel with the army, a national guard of more than 20,000 men recruited from the tribes of the Nedj, commanded by Prince Abdallah (12) is specially entrusted with the protection of the dynasty and the surveillance of oil installations. But this defense apparatus is not yet effectively cohesive.

The conditions in which occurred the occupation of Mecca by "renegades," in November 1979, and the difficulties in subjugating them, showed not only weaknesses in the general security apparatus of the kingdom, but also the inadequacies of the forces and of some of the staffs. The reorganization of commands, improvements in training, the establishment of obligatory military service, the decision to build up the army to 300,000 men and the national guard to 75,000 men by 1985, the construction of several multi-functional military bases spread out all over the kingdom (13), and the creation of a navy (with the help of France) are the next steps Saudi Arabia wants to take in the climb to power it is presently pursuing.

The small Emirates of the Gulf have more modest plans. Bahrain and Qatar have only a few battalions, rather well equipped to be sure, charged with maintaining internal order and coastal surveillance. Their air forces, practically nonexistent, could eventually be equipped with Mirage 2000's (14). Kuwait was the first Emirate to provide itself with a small modern army, well supplied with armor, airplanes (18 Mirage F-1's) and means of anti-tank and anti-aircraft defense. These precautions are explained by the fact that its powerful neighbor to the north, Iraq, has not completely backed off from its territorial claims, and that tension persists on the borders separating the two states.

The Federation of United Arab Emirates disposes of fairly considerable forces if one compares them to the population and the dimensions of the country. It is true that, despite the existence of a federal army, several emirates (Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharjah, and Ra's al-Khaimah) also maintain l al armies, one of which, that of Abu Dhabi, is clearly bigger than that of the federal state. The decision, made in November 1976 by the supreme council, to unify the military forces, like that of May 1975 to authorize the federal force alone to dispose of air, land, and naval armaments, is thus not formally implemented. The presence of a majority of mercenaries (Omanis in particular) and the traditional rivalry between Sheikh Rachid of Dubai and Zayed, emir of Abu Dhabi and president of the federation, add to the confusion, paralyzing a defense system which is having trouble freeing itself from tribal constraints.

The army of the Sultanate of Oman is distinguished from the other armies of the Arabian peninsula by the fact that it is the only one to have fought a rebellion, namely that of Dhofar. Staffed by British officers, composed partly of mercenaries (Baluchis), supported starting in 1973 by an Iranian expeditionary corps, it succeeded in putting down the revolt at the end of 1975. Since then, Sultan Qabus has continued the modernization (acquisition of 12 Jaguars) and has been trying to "Omanize" his troops. On permanent state of alert against the ever-present possibility of a resumption of the Dhofari rebellion, the Omani army is thus maintaining itself at a high operational level. Foreign assistance, since the Iranian withdrawal, is nevertheless still indispensable.

The Iraqi army is the strongest Arab army in the Gulf, although at least until recently its missions did not particularly extend to this zone. Strongly politicized, by tradition (15), it has been trained and equipped, with the help of the Soviets, to contribute to the Arab war effort in the Near East conflict. While this army has effectively participated in [that effort] (in 1973, 13,000 men and 250 tanks were dispatched to the Syrian front), it has above all been used to fight against Barzani's Kurds, from 1969 to 1975. The crushing of the Kurdish movement is not so much due to the effectiveness of its campaigns as to the fact that the shah of Iran, in accordance with the terms of the Iranian-Iraqi agreement of March 1975, brutally ended the support he was giving to Mustapha Barzani.

Endowed with an imposing armor-park, having a high-quality air force (especially the Mirage F-1's), the Iraqi military is not yet capable of ranging enough warships (16) to claim to figure honorably in the Gulf. This insufficiency of naval forces also explains why up to now Baghdad has not risked aggravating the dispute with its Iranian neighbor. It explains also why Saddam Husayn too has decided to get himself a naval force, in the creation of which France should be involved. Alongside the regular army there is a popular force of more than 75,000 men, endowed with its own materiel and forming the pretorian guard of the Baas regime.

Foreign Military Presence

The foreign military presence in the region must be distinguished according to whether it is deployed within or outside the Gulf, that is, in the Indian Ocean and the riverine countries (Oman, South Yemen, Somalia, Kenya, and India), and also according to whether it is of a permanent or temporary nature, and finally according to the diverse forms it assumes: bases, port calls, advisers, arms supply.

Even within the Gulf, this presence remains limited: all the riverine countries are against the ostentatious deployment of foreign forces. In Bahrain the United States has only port facilities in the military part of the port of Jufair formerly run by Great Britain: piers, some military huts, light maintenance personnel for three warships, whose flagship is the "LaSalle." On 27 June 1977, Bahrain and the United States decided to terminate an agreement giving the American fleet the right to utilize the installations (17).

It certainly seems that this was only a false retreat, for the American presence, indeed discreet, remains. The isle of Bahrain in fact offers the advantage of being in the heart of the Gulf and of being a principal node for aerial communications in the region.

What the Soviet navy has in the Iraqi port of Oum Qasr is scarcely better: there too it is just port facilities, with supply depots and repair shops. The United States and the Soviet Union are set upon keeping these facilities because they justify their units taking shore liberty frequently there and because they offer the possibility of reinforcing an armed naval presence at any moment.

With respect to Moscow, this privilege assumes greater significance, since it results from the implementation of the Soviet-Iraqi treaty of friendship and cooperation of April 1972, which apparently seems not to have suffered as a result of the fairly tangible cooling of relations between the two countries since 1977 (18). More than 800 Soviet advisers are helping the Iraqi army, for which the Eastern countries remain the principal source of supply. If Kuwait, which along with Iraq is the only Arab country in the Gulf to maintain diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, has embarked with this country on a modest program of military cooperation (purchase of missiles) since 1976, at least it refuses to expand this [cooperation] to the presence of advisers (19).

The apparent ambiguity of American-Saudi relations, which suffers (20) from misunderstandings or from differing views on the modalities of peace between Arabs and Israelis, is not translated into a slowdown in military cooperation, even if one discerns, among Saudi leaders, considerable irritation with American vacillation in Iranian affairs and with White House reluctance to authorize the delivery of more sophisticated armaments. It is notwithstanding the case that least 60 percent of Saudi military contracts are signed with the United States, which underwrites the biggest share of arms supplies (with the exception of French tanks), technical assistance, personnel training, conception, realization of logistical infrastructure, and maintains in the country several hundred advisers or technicians, civilian and military.

The disorganization of the apparatus of state prevailing in Iran does not permit us to be sure whether the Soviet Union can hope to turn the eviction of the Americans to its advantage and launch [a program of] military cooperation (21). It is also not certain that the present leaders would be disposed to do so, those who support the Afghan revolt against the Red Army. The time will come however when Tehran will have to think seriously about re-filling its inventory of materiel, which already suffers from the absense of upkeep and spare parts.

The foreign military presence within the Gulf, where on the Arab bank the United States seems to hold the advantage, has less reason to be circumspect once outside the Straits of Hormuz. Opposite its outlets, in the Sea of Oman, American and Soviet fleets are building up and watching each other. The Soviet Union now has some 30 warships cruising (10 combat, 16 support), supplemented during maneuvers by several nuclear attack submarines or the aircraft carrier "Minsk." Several hundred marines are on these ships which include electronic warfare craft and logistical support vessels. The United States for its part is doing no less, and can bring to bear as much naval transport from the West (25). The necessity for the Soviet Union to become an oil importer, starting in 1985 probably, is another explanation of its effort to penetrate the Gulf. Moscow denies it, of course. The Soviet Union "does not covet the wealth of others," Leonid Brezhnev says, in January 1980, but it could not notice without reacting to the appearance "on its southern border of a source of serious threats to its security," he adds. In other words, if the region belongs to a "sphere of vital interest," it is rather that of the Soviet Union than that of the United States.

The disappearance as a regional power of the Iran allied with the Americans, chosen and equipped by them to stand guard in their place over their interests in the region, has provoked a fresh review of their local strategy. The present doctrine seems to start from the principle that there must be no more reliance on "proxy-powers," but rather to guarantee the threatened order by itself, through a combination of its own military and economic power (26). Washington would also like to rely on its Egyptian and Israeli allies who dispose of the two most powerful armies in the Near East and are agreed to supply to the [American] co-signatory of the Camp David accords the logistical facilities (use of air bases) [needed] to complete its dispositions to the west of the Gulf. In fact, what men like Zbigniew Brzezinski and Harold Brown in Washington would like is the constitution of a veritable regional military alliance which would include not only Egypt, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia, but also Israel.

The still uncertain future of the Iranian revolution, and the still less foreseeable future of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, have certainly sensitized the Arab regimes in the Gulf to their defense problems, but not to the point that they would rush to get under an American "umbrella," whose flimsiness moreover has been shown by recent events. To entrust its security to the West would require assurance that the latter will have the means and above all the political will to intervene. It would also require a definition of the conditions and limitations of intervention in such a way that there would be no doubt (or ambiguity) about intentions. It would, finally, imply the ability to squeeze out a consensus on this subject. The capabilities of the West being in doubt, American intentions remaining unclear, and unanimity being far from being achieved, the Arab countries of the Gulf have, without exception, beginning naturally with Iraq, clearly expressed their intention not to leave the responsibility for maintaining internal order in the Gulf to any but their own forces.

This option, which Saudi Arabia reconfirms again in January 1980, by affirming that it does not want to accord any military facilities to the United States or to tolerate the presence on its territory of foreign troops or equipment (radar-aircraft notably), implies that the riverine states are redefining their defense policy. Thus one sees that the share of the budget reserved for the armed forces has grown perceptibly in 1979-1980, and that purchases of armaments, along with technical assistance, mostly from Western firms, have grown larger (27). The United States, but also France, Great Britain, Italy, and the Federal Republic of Germany are thus making, indirectly, their contribution to the defense of the Gulf. But this effort in equipment remains futile without the human resources [needed] to use the materiel acquired. This is doubtless not the case with Iraq, but it is already to some extent with Saudi Arabia and most certainly with various Emirates, those that must resort to a large number of foreigners for their forces.

However, the most serious aspect of the question is not in recruitment, even if it is an immediate problem, but rather in the difficulty of integrating into a system of collective security these different forces, some of which lack any truly national character. The problem is not new, since already in the time of the shah it was posed but couldn't be solved (failure of the Muscat conference of October 1976), because of Iranian pretensions (to remain the kingpin) and Iraqi fears (concerning the preservation of freedom of navigation). The Khomeyni revolution then came to give the Saudi leaders the opportunity to renew the discussions, leaving Iran aside. After having dropped the abiding suspiciousness with which it viewed the Iraqi Baas regime, by proceeding to sign, on 20 September 1979, a treaty of mutual defense with Iraq, Saudi Arabia on 16 October convokes a conference at Taef. This comes to grief on the choice of alliances to set up: American for the Sultan of Oman, to whom the United States had just promised $100 million for the protection of Hormuz, inter-Arab for the other participants, among which group, however, Iraq is not found. On 8 Feburary 1980, this country will propose a charter condemning all foreign military presence in the Arab world and calling for the formation of an inter-Arab force capable of coming to the rescue of any member state of the Arab League whose security should be threatened.

Despite the failure of Taef and despite ideological conflicts, several accords now exist between these different Arab states at the level of police and intelligence organizations, but Iraq, Kuwait, and even more so North Yemen remain still opposed to the establishment of a regional defense pact as well as to the Omani initiatives aimed at "internationalizing" protection of the Straits of Hormuz. Riyadh is thus still searching for an Arab defense formula which, in spirit, would cover not only protection of the Gulf but would also neutralize the threat from South Yemen, felt even more keenly in the wake of the Mecca affair.

Iran, for its part, is concerned both by the pressure of Iraq on its borders and by the consequences for the economy of a solid American blockade. The tour of the Arab Gulf made by Sadeq Ghotbzadeh in May 1980, in the course of which he mentioned the possibility of calling for large-scale cooperation with the socialist bloc and hinted at the role Shi'ite minorities could play, illustrates the pressures to which the riverine Arab countries are subjected. If their leaders, who today are demanding strategic independence, delay in coming to agreement on a plan for collective defense, it is because they fear that to make it credible they would have to fall into dependence on a third power, in this instance the United States (28). If that should be the case, they would have to take into account the opposition from their own people, who may be more sensitized than they seem by the "anti-imperialist" professions of faith emanating from Tehran or elsewhere.

It is indeed important for the West to demonstrate its solidarity with the Arab countries of the Gulf. It is no less important for this to be accomplished with discernment, taking into consideration these constraints of every kind, quickly summarized, that prevail in this zone of tensions.

MECCA GOVERNOR DISCUSSES FUNCTIONS OF HIS POSITION

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 16 Jun 80 p 15

[Interview with Mecca Governor Prince Majid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz; by Ramzi Sufiya, in Mecca; date not given]

[Text] Prince Majid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, governor of Mecca, believes in the necessity of stimulating municipal councils to make them more effective and capable of coping with the daily problems of the citizens. In this interview with AL-SIYASAH, after he became governor of Mecca following a long period as minister of municipal and rural affairs, Prince Majid presents a number of new ideas and administrative programs which he sees as more conducive to doing a better job.

He still believes in the necessity of establishing an association of Saudi contractors to replace big foreign companies which inflate prices. Prince Majid also believes in the principle of administrative decentralization which facilitates flexible and quick action in conducting general affairs.

Summarizing his administrative policy, he describes it as an "open door" policy which eliminates routine barriers between citizens and officials. In the final analysis, he says, we have to go by God's words: "Do your work [well], for God and His prophet and the faithful will witness its results."

The following are excerpts from this comprehensive interview.

[Question] Your appointment as governor of Mecca is an indication of high royal trust in you. What are your first impressions since you assumed your new position?

[Answer] I assumed my position fully aware of its burdens and the nature of the very important phase which my country is going through. It is a phase of cultural development, reconstruction, and building of a modern state. This state adopts modern methods and concepts, but retains, at the same time, its immortal spiritual values, its deep-rooted heritage and the heritage and the principles of the true Islamic religion.

I ask God the Almighty to help me carry out my duties, be worthy of the trust of my king, and fulfill as much as possible the wishes of the citizens of this country. There are many problems and concerns. But I believe that faith, sincerity, seriousness and commitment can make miracles happen.

[Question] What is the ideal climate that you deem necessary for the achievement of your goals?

[Answer] The ideal climate is represented by two very important elements: Security and stability. During these glorious years, we are carrying out the biggest operation in development which the country has witnessed in its modern times. We are doing it through very ambitious 5-year-plans and intensive economic and social development programs and projects. This can only be accomplished under secure and stable conditions, where the Saudi citizen feels that his life, money, honor, present and future are always safe.

The economy can develop and flourish, and progress and prosperity can be achieved in such a climate. Based on this, I see a very strong connection between development programs and security.

Thank God, the kingdom of Saudi Arabia is a paradise of security, stability and prosperity, because it is protected by God's law--the law of love, peace, brotherhood, compassion, solidarity and mercy which are the best guarantees of security and stability.

[Question] What are your expectations in the realm of development in the coming phase?

[Answer] I will do my best to offer support and assistance to all authorities concerned to help them implement their development projects and programs. I will offer all the support and control they need to maintain their progress toward their developmental objectives.

The western region has received one of the largest shares of development projects and programs in the country. Several of these have already been implemented. It is now steadily moving toward accomplishing a cultural change operation, on the basis of studied scientific plans, in this suitable climate of security and stability. As I previously mentioned, I consider such a climate essential for any constructive and creative effort. Under it, the citizen can enjoy human dignity and total security for his money, honor and life.

[Question] Your success in all responsible positions you have held makes me wonder what method you use in decision-making?

[Answer] My decisions are based on developing a complete understanding of the matter or problem at hand, and all the circumstances surrounding it.

I live in the heart of society. I stay in touch with reality. I apply to a problem both my mind and my heart, and then I make a decision. This is why I always come up with a sound and correct decision based on an ideal solution for it.

I do not believe much in "memos," "reports" and "paper work." I believe in field work and in direct contact with the problems and matters that call for a decision.

The most useful decisions are those that are inspired by reality, not those made in isolation behind a desk in a closed office.

[Question] How do you evaluate the present system in Mecca, following the period you have so far spent as governor of Mecca?

[Answer] I think a lot of changes are necessary in the emirate's system.

[Question] In what ways?

[Answer] As you know, our country is open to pilgrims, to te of thousands of people seeking work in development projects and programs, and to others who come for different purposes and who are involved in various businesses. You can imagine the situations that are created by the arrival of these huge numbers of people in the western region. In this human flow of people, each individual has his own morals, behavior, good and evil tendencies, ideas, ideologies and beliefs which have an impact on the country. This is why I mentioned the necessity of developing the emirate's system to face all these matters.

[Question] What are the most important ideas you have relative to the cultural program you are responsible for in the Mecca emirate?

[Answer] I have the honor of being responsible for the most sacred Islamic holy places and the Great Mosque. This, in itself, is enough to give me the enthusiasm and will to work.

You ask me about the ideas I have. I will do my best to serve this holy place which bears the mark of the Prophet's mission and has a very special place in our hearts.

However, if you are asking about development projects and programs, you probably know that these are mainly the responsibility of the various ministries. Each concerned ministry sets up its projects and programs in accordance with budget allotments for these projects. My duty is to provide the best conditions for these ministries to implement their projects in the best manner, and on time.

Thus, my role in relation to projects is not related to planning or implementation. It is support, assistance and cooperation which I will offer to all the ministries concerned.

My primary concern is my ties with the people, my human relations with them, and my seeing to it that they are comfortable and safe.

[Question] As governor of Mecca, what, in your opinion, are the dimensions of this responsibility?

[Answer] It is anticipated that the law of the provinces will define the role of the governor. When this law is complete and becomes effective, one of its main features will be to define the responsibilities of the governors.

However, there are certain natural and self-evident truths regarding the governors' functions. The most important of these are: To administer justice among the people; protect their lives, property, wealth and honor; and offer all possible assistance to ministries and government agencies to implement their development projects. I may as well point out some misconceptions about the governor's duties. The governor does not punish the guilty or put those who deviate from the right path in jail. He is the one who promotes the spirit of love, affection and unity among the people; brings them together through the strong ties and teachings of the true Islamic religion; makes them aware of good and evil, and of what is harmful and beneficial to them; learns about their conditions and worries; and tries to find solutions for their problems and ways to provide them with a comfortable life. At the same time, his function is to apply God's laws against those who do wrong, become corrupt or harm society.

The ultimate goal of a wise governor is to build a happy society, protect the rights of every citizen, provide people with all means of comfort and make services available to every citizen, as these services are a natural right which must be provided.

This is one side of a governor's function as I see it. As to the other side, it is related to projects that are important to the region. These projects, as I previously mentioned, are implemented by concerned ministries and government agencies. The governor's role is to assist and support them in implementing these projects, and bringing wealth and prosperity to the whole region.

[Question] How do you see the spiritual role of the Mecca Emirate from the standpoint of organizing the lives and relations of Muslims?

[Answer] The Mecca Emirate is carrying out its full duties toward the Muslims. It has, in this respect, a distinguished 1400-year history. It annually welcomes the pilgrims and provides Muslims from all over the world with this great annual meeting place where they discuss their mutual interests. In this respect, Mecca lives up to its full responsibility to serve Islam and the Muslims. We do not have to overburden it [with other responsibilities].

[Question] How about the Emirate's role in the overall development of the area?

[Answer] I have chosen for myself a very useful method to fulfill the public's needs. This is to follow up on government projects in the region without interfering with the prerogatives of the ministries or government agencies. Thus, I go beyond the traditional concept of the governor's function, which is to act on complaints of the people and provide them with security. In this century, a governor's role must go beyond such narrow and classical boundaries.

[Question] Are you thinking of expanding the role of municipal councils to cooperate with the Emirate in studying and meeting the area's requirements?

[Answer] From my experience as minister of municipal and rural affairs, I can say that these municipal councils are almost inactive. The people of the area, in general, do not wish to participate in these councils and consider this to be a waste of time, forgetting their legal duty to give their opinions and suggestions to help in the development and progress of their area.

People keep from attending to the public interest, because they are busy attending to their private interests. This negative phenomenon prevails even among young people who are dominated by a narrow individualistic outlook. For this reason, I think we should first attempt to first stimulate these municipal councils to carry out their current primary responsibilities. We would then think of broadening the scope of their responsibilities at a later stage.

[Question] What administrative method have you chosen to carry out the responsibilities of your position?

[Answer] I have chosen to hold periodic meetings with the Emirate's officials and open meetings with the chiefs of the Emirate's districts, to discuss all matters that are important to the area. I also visit various areas in the Emirate of Mecca to establish direct contact with the people and learn their needs and requirements.

[Question] Your wise call for the establishment of an association of Saudi contractors is still echoing in all circles. Is your enthusiasm for this call still the same?

[Answer] Yes, and I still call for this and say that scattered efforts are useless. I made this suggestion when I was minister of municipal and rural affairs, and I still advocate it in my new position. I call for the coming together of Saudi contractors to replace big foreign companies that charge high prices, carried away by the spirit of greed and exploitation, especially as the Saudi contractor has proved his ability and efficiency in all the projects assigned to him.

[Question] Which method do you prefer? Total centralization or decentralization?

[Answer] I will follow, without reservation, the decentralization method, delegating certain authorities to other officials, instead of centralizing all authorities in one person who would fall under heavy pressure, drown in a sea of routine work, and spend his time signing mountains of paper. This will be achieved by applying the principle of "the right man in the right place."

[Question] The reader would be very pleased to meet the "other side" of your personality--the personal side, particularly "Prince Majid, the father."

[Answer] I have seven children. The eldest is my daughter Masha'il who, God willing, will study medicine at the University of Edinborough in Scotland, specializing in heart surgery. I also have Mash'al, 'Aziz, Basmah, Jawahir and Sarah.

[Question] What method of upbringing do you follow in raising them?

[Answer] Being their friend before being their father, teaching them the true religion of Islam, giving them independent personalities, and deepening their spirit of belonging and loyalty to this great country.

OPPOSITION LEADER TALKS ABOUT INTERNAL STABILITY, ARAB UNITY

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 27 Jul 80 p 15

[Interview with Ahmad Ben Salah by Hamidah Na'na'; date and place not given]

[Text] Ahmad Ben Salah's experience in Tunisia is considered to be one of the manifestations of the crisis that faces Third World countries which gain their political and administrative independence, but maintain ties with their former colonizers through their economic structures and their political, educational and cultural orientations.

In 1960, when Bourguiba summoned Ben Salah--who was then minister of health and a well-known labor leader who had come to government from the Tunisian General Union of Labor [UGTT]--to charge him with the task of building and restoring the structure of the Tunisian economy, it was not clear in Bourguiba's mind that Ben Salah would make decisions and undertake measures that would affect Bourguiba's closest allies in the government.

It was also not clear in Ben Salah's own mind that it was impossible to reform the economy without reforming the political power. He thought he would be able to change the infrastructure of Tunisian society and that this could lead to a change in the government system. By means of what may be called socialist capitalism, Ahmed Ben Salah tried to establish a system of "mutual cooperation" which resembles the system of cooperatives. The result of that system was that the interests of the middle class were hurt. A policy of austerity was proclaimed, which primarily hurt the working class and the farmers. Meanwhile, Tunisian capitalists maintained their life of ease and comfort because they were protected by western industrial organizations.

Ben Salah was not able to touch the interests of the major capitalists and feudalists who were directly protected by the palace and by Bourguiba himself. After his experiment was attacked, he discovered that it would be difficult to build socialism in a country whose orientations and ties on the foreign policy level continued to be with the imperialist camp.

The first crisis between him and Bourguiba developed in 1969, and it worsened early in 1970. Ahmed Ben Salah was arrested on 25 May 1970, and was stripped of his ministerial and party positions and duties. He was charged with high treason and sentenced to 10 years of hard labor. However, he was able to escape from jail in 1973 and has been in exile ever since.

Ever since 1973, Ahmed Ben Salah has been considered one of the prominent figures of the Tunisian opposition. He spoke to AL-SAFIR about conditions in Tunisia, about the prospects for change there, and about his experience in government.

[Question] We will begin with the existing situation in Tunisia: the open door policy, the cabinet of Mzali, and their results.

[Answer] The regime has conditioned us to look for a relationship between violence and malevolence. I believe that major malevolence is in store at this stage. It may at first appear that there was a retreat from injustices and inequities, but the regime does not in fact intend to make any radical changes in its policy. The people who were there in the past are the same people who are [in power] now: they have not changed, including the prime minister. Very few people who work with Bourguiba have their own personal influence or political power. This is because Bourguiba is everything, and everything goes back to him.

For the last 10 years, Tunisia has been experiencing instability, unrest and trials. There have been more than 100 trials, and there have been many explosive situations. The 26 January 1978 [incidents] and the recent events in Gafsa are examples of these. It is true that there was a difference between the two eruptions: the 26 January eruption was carried out by labor elements and revealed the violent nature of the regime. Gafsa involved a group of young people who despaired of any change and rebelled against the regime. But what is new in the matter this time is the fact that non-Tunisians did intervene. I believe that Tunisian police departments had knowledge of these interventions and used them to settle domestic accounts. One of the most important results of Gafsa on the domestic scene was the disappearance of Hedi Nouira and Mohamed Sayah and the advent of new people to power.

Tunisia's crisis may be summarized in the fact that the regime, like its president, is suffering from old age. It is now experiencing political crises, since it is no longer possible to concentrate all powers in the hands of the group's leader and allow the rest [of the group] little room for action.

The Adulterated Unity

[Question] The opposition in Tunisia and abroad is living in a stage of partisanship and fragmentation. Are there programs for national unity? Have you thought about this? Is there a new reality for this opposition after what happened in Gafsa?

[Answer] I do not believe that there is a serious Tunisian opposition that wants to do away with the regime. There are oppositions that dream of changing the regime, but this is a dream shared by all factions of the opposition. We did try in the past to propose a five-point national unity program. However, of 16 persons who participated with us in the discussion, we discovered that 11 were working for Tunisian intelligence. The result was that most of our fighters in Tunisia were arrested. I was sentenced to prison for 8 years, and some factions of the opposition accused us in their newspapers of dealing with the regime.

Internal unity is not in demand now. The Arabs are afflicted with the disease of unity, even if it were adulterated. With regard to the Tunisian opposition, let me say that now there are people who are professional members of the opposition inside the country and abroad. Members of the opposition cherish that position just as a minister cherishes his ministry.

[Question] There are two principal forces now on the Tunisian scene.

1. The labor movement.

2. The religious tide.

It is now known that there are communications between the regime and the labor movement. What is the nature of these communications and where could they possibly lead?

The religious tide, however, rejects all factions of the opposition, including yourself.

[Answer] Yes, for months there have been communications between the regime and the labor movement. This is an attempt by the regime to gain time. But I do not believe that the labor movement which sacrificed its people on 26 January can accept a change in its programs and in its radical position vis-a-vis the regime and its nature.

With regard to the religious tide, it is one of the factions of the opposition. If the religious movement is rejecting us all, it is welcome to make the changes by itself, and we will wait for its experiment.

The religious tide which has become active in Tunisia and in most of the Islamic countries is only the result of the disappointments that followed independence in the Arab world. People discovered that independence was no more than a superficial, administrative independence, while the substance of the culture in those countries remained colonialist. Therefore, a strict adherence to the Islamic faith and to Islamic morals was a response to the alienation that the regimes forced upon their peoples. What is unfortunate, however, is the fact that Arab reactionaries are now using these tides in their own interests to eliminate other inclinations such as Arabism and socialism.

[Question] The wife of Bourguiba, Mrs Wasilah, did contact you in Paris. What did she want? Did she suggest that you return to Tunisia?

[Answer] She did contact me 2 years ago, but there has been no contact since then. Mrs Wasilah contacted one of our colleagues and asked him if she could meet me. My response was that that was impossible for security reasons. My life is still being threatened, and it is known that there was an attempt to assassinate me in Switzerland. This attempt was made by one of the well-known figures in the regime: Bashir Rizq al-'Uyun.

[Question] What is left of the experiment you made in Tunisia? What are the reasons for its failure, and how was the regime able to do away with it so quickly without encountering any opposition?

[Answer] Much remains. If we were to try to account for things, we would find that most of the production power in Tunisia after my departure had been financed in the sixties. We tried to establish foundations that would not yield their results within a short period of time. Therefore, we imposed a belt-tightening policy, and [those who succeeded us in government] benefited afterwards from our policy. It is necessary to call to mind the fact that the socialist experiment at that time had encountered major difficulties and required many sacrifices. Tunisia was weak then, and it was coming out of a crisis. The extension of loans was forbidden; there was no oil nor were there petro-dollars. Nevertheless, we were able to a large extent to liberate the economy of Tunisia from tutelage and from ties with the West, but we were vigorously contested.

Chief among those who fought us was Bourguiba. He feared the creation in Tunisia of new conditions and powers that would be the result of the change in the economic structures, and he feared losing the power to make decisions. The regime is concentrated on the authority of one person, and it is extreme in its concentration.

One of the most important results of the experiment of the sixties may be the fact that people began to look at Bourguiba in a different way, and he began to sense the danger of that. He sensed that people had begun to assemble, to make decisions, to discuss [matters] and to dismantle the regional government upon which he builds his regime. People even went so far as to threaten strikes against personal and foreign interests. Bourguiba became very fearful, and he dealt a blow to the experiment. His objective was not to deal a blow to the policy of mutual cooperation specifically as much as it was to save his own individual power.

[Question] Nevertheless, it took him 24 hours to succeed in doing away with the experiment without encountering any resistance!

[Answer] This is not true. The foundations we tried to establish in Tunisia are still there in one form or another. The mutual cooperation systems constitute a power inside the country that is not to be ignored. The successive explosions that have been taking place since the early seventies are but an indication of the state of dissatisfaction that is prevalent among the Tunisian people.

[Question] You are being accused of giving the regime at a certain stage a progressive identity and of prolonging its life.

[Answer] I did not give the regime this identity, and I did not prolong its life. What I did was for the Tunisian people, and my actions remain as a reaction to the injustices and the attempts to liquidate me. I did believe that by changing the economic, cultural and educational structures we would have been able to change the power that was not in our hands.

[Question] You had seven ministries under you!

[Answer] But we did not have power; it was Bourguiba who had power. Nevertheless, when I came to the government, I was convinced that there was no other way for bringing about change.

Tunisia and the Arabs

[Question] The Tunisian regime has been isolated by the Arabs as a result of the pan-Arab positions it had taken and as a result of its relations with the West. But now this isolation has culminated in the presence of the Arab League in Tunisia, and the new government is making claims about pan-Arab inclinations. Do you believe that the regime has really changed its direction?

[Answer] What changed? The Arabs acknowledged that the Tunisian regime had not turned its back to the question of Palestine or to the Arabs. I think that by taking that position it is the Arabs that did turn their backs to the question of Palestine following Camp David, whereas the Tunisian regime turned its back to the question of Palestine before Camp David. Naturally, the Arab position is more serious, but it is better for us to stay quiet.

Let me say this about the previous period: the battle between us and the regime because of the positions it took on pan-Arab questions have never ceased. I was the only one who went to 'Abd-al-Nasir after the well-known crisis, and I was convinced that Tunisia could not survive apart from the Arab world. Bourguiba visited Egypt in 1965 after my mediation. I believed that there was some similarity between the experiment that we were conducting in Tunisia and 'Abd-al-Nasir's experiment. This was always the subject of the conversation between us. I believed that for the two experiments to succeed, a geopolitical solidarity was essential, and regardless of the difficulties that would face this solidarity, we would have to confront them because unity consists of battles that must be waged.

Tunisia is one of the countries whose people are most sensitive to Arab solidarity. We are Arabs and we are affiliated with the Arab nation.

This is a deep feeling amidst the people of Tunisia.

However, it was the government that stood in the way of establishing this solidarity. Bourguiba believed that the correct way for the advancement of Tunisia was what (Shaban Dalmas) or (Edgar Fur) had been thinking about. Hedi Nouira became the victim of that. Bourguiba is the product of the Arab nation's inability to confront the enemy.

[Question] Is this his own inability?

[Answer] And it is also the nation's inability. Had this not been the case, how else can we explain the existence of al-Sadat?

The Old Age of the Regime

[Question] Do you still believe in the possibility of change within the regime? What prospects for change do you see? Who are the principal powers that can contribute to it?

[Answer] No. After 25 years of independence we may say that the political regime which had forced itself on Tunisia has now reached the stage of old age and is today running the risk of a political crisis. It has become evident that its isolation is increasing daily, and the prospects for radical opposition to the regime are becoming clearer. The characteristics of the popular forces are clear despite the layers of fog that surround them as a result of the regime's oppression and the various games it plays. There are labor movement forces and young people's forces that are vital, steadfast and movement oriented even though they are members of cells that are far apart from each other.

With regard to our faith and our struggle, we in the popular unity movement are affiliated with these forces and with the future they hold. There is a group of democrats which is advocating reform and which is being courted by the regime that did approach it after deciding to restore it to the fold. We do not know what the reckoning will be that will make this group play another role in the regime's escape to a state of numbness and manipulation; nor do we know what the reckoning will be that will make it withstand illusions.

It is known that there are various groups and movements, that these groups and movements are scattered, and that they comprise various affiliations of communists who are "determined to defend the national territory" against the neighbors, and especially of those who like China and who work in every direction. We hope that these groups will go back to their Tunisian origins and to their African, Arab, Moroccan origins so that they can combine their powers and become constructive.

The Army: a Disaster!

[Question] The army took action twice: once on 28 December 1978 to subdue the labor movement and once in Gafsa. Will it take action a third and a final time? Don't you believe that Tunisia after Bourguiba is in danger of a military coup?

[Answer] I don't know anything and I don't want to know anything about the army. You talk about the army. This is the disaster of the Third World. I will fight so that the army would not come to power.

[Question] What will be your position if you were to be surprised by a military coup?

[Answer] My position will be in accordance with the direction such a military coup might take. We do not take positions before the fact. I do not think it likely that Tunisia will be surprised by a military coup unless the forces that protect it decide upon a military coup.

[Question] What is your relationship to international socialism? Is the Popular Unity Movement a member of international socialism?

[Answer] The People's Unity Movement is not a member of international socialism. We had asked for observer status so we could have a platform from which we could express our opinion without being subjected to persecution. However, I have had personal ties with a number of the leaders of this movement ever since I was in government and even before then when I was a fighter in the ranks of the labor movement. We succeeded to a large extent in influencing some of them to change their positions on the Palestinian question.

[Question] Was that done through the proposal that Kreisky and Brandt were making for a western solution to the Palestinian question?

[Answer] This was their proposal, but we have our own position. We are the ones who are talking about a solution that would be acceptable to the Palestinians--that is, if the Palestinians are interested in their cause. We cannot ask Kreisky or Brandt to assume positions that are more radical than the position of some Arabs.

UN DELEGATION HEAD'S RESERVATIONS ABOUT MEXICAN PROPOSAL

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 10 Sep 80 p 7

[Article signed S.M.: "Mr Mahmoud Mestiri's Declaration to LA PRESSE: 'Tunisia is Expressing Reservations About Mexican Proposal'"]

> [Text] New York: Mr Mahmoud Mestiri, head of the minister of foreign affairs' staff, and head of the Tunisian delegation to the UN special session on economic problems, is probably best qualified to evaluate the work now in progress in Manhattan's "Glass Palace." A former chairman of the Group of the 77, Mr Mestiri has, in fact, acquired a well-established reputation at the United Nations as "an exceptional diplomat, well-briefed on the matters under discussion and, above all, an authority on all problems concerning the North-South dialogue. So Mr Juliani, spokesman for Dr Waldheim.
> This is why we have asked him to give us a "general synthesis" of the session, of the problems it must face, and of the prospects it opens...

"Two major themes dominate the debates," Mr Mestiri told us, "on the one hand, the strategy of development for the decade beginning in 1981 and, on the other hand, global negotiations, first to solve the most urgent problems and, second, to give a new impetus, on new bases, to the restructuration of the world's economy so as to achieve the new international economic order advocated by the United Nations."

"This new order is all the more urgent as, at present, there no longer is any order to be safeguarded... What we have is disorder! A new order is, therefore, necessary and it can only be the order decided by the United Nations, by all countries in the world, developed and under development."

"Strategy and global negotiations are two useful steps toward a restructuration of the world's economy. This restructuration, this new order cannot take place in one day or in a short time, through a revolution, but they will result from a series of reforms spread over 10, even 20 years."

No Progress In Strategy

Can we expect concrete and positive results from this session?

"Yes, it could achieve that," Mr Mahmoud Mestiri answered. "At present, the prospects are not encouraging, but the present session might well reach an agreement on global negotiations, procedures, and the question of the central organization to coordinate and supervise development actions, in particular those of organizations which are not under UN control, such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the GATT."

"However, I must be frank: while it has been possible to achieve progress with respect to global negotiations, no new development has taken place with respect to strategy. The present strategy is exactly the same as the previous two strategies... although a revolution in international economic thinking has taken place in the interval."

During this session, Tunisia has offered to aid countries which are on the verge of "taking off," while the vast majority of member countries are urgently calling for an aid to the poorest countries... Is our position realistic?

"We all believe that the poorest countries should receive particular attention," Mr Mestiri stated, "but there are also countries which--like Tunisia--have reached different stages of development, here they are called 'medium-income countries,' with 1,000 or more dinars of national gross product per inhabitant per year. Should we then give all our assistance and mobilize all our resources to aid the poorest countries? We believe that countries which have made efforts and are about to take off should not be penalized."

Aid for All, Priority to the Poorest

"In this respect, we must stress that the aid given to medium-income countries cannot hurt the poorest countries. On the contrary, it reflects the line adopted by the Group of the 77, namely: "Aid for all, priority to the poorest."

Does Tunisia support the Mexican proposal concerning a limited North-South summit meeting to break the present impasse?

"We have reservations concerning the principle of such a meeting," Mr Mestiri answered. "Each country, within the limits of its sovereignty, is free to organize meetings... some countries, such as Jamaica, have had the 'practical' idea of bringing their friends together to discuss certain problems informally. This is not a bad idea, on the contrary. It is a positive fact that each Third World country may take steps on its own to work toward the new international economic order."

"I am afraid that the Mexican proposal may be more ambitious and may clearly infringe on the role of the Group of the 77. What is at stake there, is the organization of a summit which would place itself above the United Nations and the Group of the 77 and would purport to make decisions on the line of the report of the Brandt commission."

The Brandt Report Contains Nothing New

"Besides, this commission is not representative of anybody and is not accepted by anybody, since each group of countries has subscribed only to that part of the report which suits its own interest. The Brandt commission report, this must be said, only summarizes all too well known ideas and does not contain anything new."

"This does not diminish in any way the part played by ex-Chancellor Brandt who is a man of good will and may still play an important part in North-South relations, as he did in East-West relations."

"Therefore, what is going to take place in Mexico will engage only those who will be there, certainly not the United Nations or the Group of the 77."

ACTIVITIES OF JOINT FRENCH-TUNISIAN COMMISSION

Tunisian Labor in France

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 3 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Jean Francois-Poncet, French minister of foreign affairs, will arrive today in Tunis to preside over his country's delegation during the proceedings of the eighth session of the General Joint French-Tunisian Commission. The Tunisian delegation will, in turn, be headed by Hassan Belkhojz, minister of foreign affairs. The meeting of this commission assumes greater importance since Tunisia is getting ready to begin the work of preparing the Sixth Plan and since it therefore needs to know in advance the financial, technical and other arragements made by its French partner, as well as the guarantees or insurance which it is in a position to furnish with regard to the Tunisian labor which is now located within France.

The level of commercial and technical cooperation between our two nations is certainly satisfactory. Nevertheless, Tunisia expects, as has been pointed out by Mohammed Mzali, its prime minister, much more from France and, above all, a much larger contribution on its part to the realization of the great industrial and agricultural projects in Tunisia which can provide employment for several thousands of individuals. In view of its political stability, its geographical location and even the goal that it has set for its social and economic development, Tunisia has indeed the right to demand that our relationships with France should be raised to a much higher level.

Now, whether we are talking about relationships between Tunisia and France or between Tunisia and Italy, these relationships between countries on opposite sides of the Mediterranean Sea can only be developed in a framework of peace and stability. This assumes and requires the existence and maintenance of political cooperation between our two countries which shall be as broad as possible. At the time that the world is practically divided into two blocs and that the most "liberal" nations resort to protective measures to safeguard their economies, Tunisia and France, which believe in the same values and share the same concerns with regard to peace and security, therefore must understand each other better in order to cooperate better.

Joint Communique

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 5 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] The General Ministerial Joint Commission, established by a joint declaration published on 30 June 1972, held its eighth session in Tunis on 3 and 4 September 1980.

The Tunisian delegation was led by Hassan Belkhoja, minister of foreign affairs. The French delegation was headed by Jean Francois-Poncet, minister of foreign affairs.

Jean Francois-Poncet was seen by His Excellency Habib Bourguiba, president of the Tunisian Republic as well as by Mohammed Mzali, the prime minister.

The work of the General Commission was conducted in an atmosphere of complete cordiality, due to the ties of mutual friendship, confidence and understanding which unite the two nations. This work illustrated the mutual desire to improve a state of cooperation which has a long history and had already achieved great success. This attitude was inspired by the historical visits of President Bourguiba to France and of President Giscard d'Estaing to Tunisia.

Both ministers were pleased to observe that both governments, at all levels, were maintaining close contact which permitted the mutual exchange of information and continuous cooperation with regard to all matters of common interest.

They proceeded to conduct a braod survey of problems dealing with international policy. They confirmed the affinity of both countries to the cause of peace and security with respect to independence of nations and their territorial integrity.

Both ministers examined the situation in the Near East and expressed their serious concern regarding the worsening situation in this region. They recognized that the solution to the Palestinian question plays a dominant role with regard to the establishment of a just and lasting peace. They emphasized the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination in accordance with a comprehensive settlement providing for security in the region with the participation of all the parties concerned, which implies participation of the PLO as well.

Furthermore, they reaffirmed the necessity for having Israel evacuate all of the occupied Arab territories, including the holy city of Jerusalem. In addition, they rejected the recent illegal decision to unilaterally change the status of the city.

Then, referring to the declaration issued by the heads of state and the governing body of the European Economic Community in Venice on 13 June 1980, the Tunisian representative stated that, although this declaration did not satisfy all of the aspirations of the Palestinian people, it constituted a positive contribution to the search for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. With regard to this point, the Tunisian representative expressed the desire to see Europe play a constructive role in the search for peace in this area.

Both ministers brought up the situation in central Asia. With regard to Afghanistan, they observed that the events in this country imperilled detente and stuck a blow at international law. They expressed a desire that the appropriate resolutions of the United Nations be observed.

The two ministers also dealt with the situation in Africa, expressing the concern of Tunisia and France with regard to the risk of increasing tension which endangers the security of the African Continent and which constitutes a great obstacle to its efforts towards development.

Both delegations condemned the policy and practice of apartheid and racial discrimination in South Africa and reaffirmed the need for making every effort to have Namibia proceed rapidly, in accordance with the decisions of the United Nations, to full and complete independence.

Both ministers believe it indispensable that the African Continent be maintained free of outside interference so that security and peace, the responsibility for which depends on the Africans themselves, be safeguarded and that they may work in peace towards its development.

Both parties emphasized the importance which they attached to a renewal of the European-Arabic dialog in all of its aspects including that of policy. They agreed to step up their consultations with a view to taking the initiative towards such a renewal of dialog.

Particular attention was paid to examination of the Mediterranean situation and the necessity for developing political and economic collaboration and cooperation between these Mediterranean neighbors. Both ministers repeated their conviction that European security and cooperation cannot be separated from those of the Mediterranean. In preparation for the next meeting of the CSCE (Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe), they agreed to act in unison so that the non-European Mediterranean nations might play the role incumbent on them during this meeting.

The relationships between Tunisia and the European Economic Community were thoroughly examined. The modes of application of the cooperation agreement between Tunisia and the European Economic Community signed on 25 April 1976 as well as the prospects for broadening the Community received special attention.

Both ministers agreed that it was time for the French Government to take effective action to permit agricultural and industrial Tunisian products to be sold in greater quantities on the Common Market. They desired that a great deal of attention be paid to the security of employment and residence of Tunisian workers in the countries of the European Economic Community.

The Tunisian delegation expressed the desire that an agreement should be reached between Tunisia and the European Economic Community during the negotiations for expansion of relationships. The French delegation expressed its understanding for the Tunisian concerns and that it would refer the Tunisian suggestions to its partners in the Common Market and the Communities Commission, insisting on the need to take into account the interests of Tunisia.

The French delegation indicated that the first documents dealing with the consequences of expansion of relationships with the Mediterranean nations had been submitted by the Committee of the Communities Council. It believed that these documents constitute the first stage in taking into consideration Tunisian concerns and is part of the desire to pursue and expand on the thoughts expressed.

The Tunisian delegation expressed its interest in the French proposal for trilateral cooperation among the Arab, European and African nations and called on the parties concerned to intensify collaboration in this regard.

The French delegation expressed its satisfaction for this support and reaffirmed its backing of the implementation of the trilateral cooperative agreement recommended by President Bourguiba since 1973.

Both delegations examined all aspects of Franco-Tunisian economic and financial relationships and expressed their desires to expand the scale of cooperation between them.

In the first place, a thorough analysis has been made of the commercial exchange situation. For this purpose, both delegations studied the various means of arriving at a reduction of the unbalance of exchange rates which are disadvantageous to Tunisia and to encourage joint initiatives and actions that would permit the promotion of Tunisian exports to France.

Both ministers also agreed that economic relations between Tunisia and France should be slanted towards cooperation in the area of production. For this purpose, it was decided to encourage a policy of industrial cooperation. With this in mind, the French delegation declared that it was ready to encourage the installation in Tunisia of industrial plants simultaneously with a real transfer of technology.

While emphasizing that the new Franco-Tunisian cooperation effort should be furnished with an adequate means for permitting a quick start, the Tunisian delegation brought up the idea of creating an investment bank with which French banks would be associated. The French delegation agreed to the objectives sought by the establishment of such an organization and made known its desire to activate the study that had already been initiated.

Both delegations decided to establish a cooperative effort in the field of energy. This effort will deal particularly with economic measures as well as activities concerned with research for new types of energy.

Both ministers registered satisfaction with the promise that negotiations dealing with French governmental assistance will take place very soon in Tunis.

Both delegations pointed out that cultural, scientific and technical cooperation continues its upswing. They reaffirmed their advocacy of Arab education in French secondary schools to which the Tunisian Government would contribute its share.

Furthermore, they emphasized the interest that they had in strengthening of technical cooperation and concentrating it in the most important areas of the Tunisian development plan in order to favor the transfer of technology.

A thorough study was made of Tunisian-French social and consular relations, particularly in regard to matters dealing with labor, professional training, social security and movement of individuals.

The French delegation emphasized the importance that it attached to the problem of transferring funds that the French nations would want to send home from Tunisia and its desire that a solution to this problem be found. The Tunisian delegation made note of this point.

In order to allay the concerns expressed by the Tunisian delegation on matters dealing with the Tunisian community in France, assurance was furnished by the French delegation that the situation of Tunisian nationals would be jointly examined in an atmosphere of close ties and mutual trust between the two countries.

Joint Commission Meeting

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 4 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] The General Tunisian-French Joint Commission began its work at its eighth session last night at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs under the joint chairmanship of Hassan Belkhoja and Jean Francois-Poncet.

In addition to the ministers of foreign affairs of both countries, the delegations included the following members: Tunisia was represented by Hedi Mabrouk, Tunisian ambassador to France, Ahmed Ben Arfa, ambassador and director of the International Cooperation Agency, Moncef Ounayes, Office Chief of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Noureddine Meidoub, Director of Political Affairs for Europe and America as well as representatives of the Ministries of Planning, National Economy, Agriculture, Social Affairs and the Tunisian Central Bank. France was represented by Pierre Hunt, French ambassador to Tunisia, Serge Devaix, Director of the North African-Middle East Division, Eric Desmaret, Technical Advisor to the Office of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs as well as representatives of various offices in this department, in particular Treasury and Industry.

Established by the joint Tunisian-French declaration of 30 June 1972, which crowned the official visit of President Bourguiba to France, the General Joint Commission meets every year, alternately in Tunis and in Paris, for the purpose of examining the various phases of the cooperative effort between the two countries and the methods of intensifying this effort.

Opening the meeting, Hassan Belkhoja first welcomed his French counterpart, assuring him of Tunisia's ardent desire "to impart new vision to our cooperation and our friendship which is ceaseless oriented into the future."

After having brought attention to the fact that the greatest portion of Tunisia's foreign trade is carried on with the member nations of the European Common Market, the Minister underscored "the uncomfortable position, to put is mildly, in which Tunisia has been placed due to the protectionist measures taken by the European Economic Community." In this context, Hassan Belkhoja launched an urgent appeal so that France might act to achieve a reexamination of these measures which contradict the terms of the cooperation agreement of 1976 between Tunisia and the European Economic Community and also contradict the concept of cooperation. He expressed the desire to have France take into consideration the interests of its close friends to whom it is linked by history and geography and to employ all of its influence to have the European Economic Community reconsider its protectionist policy with respect to Tunisia, to open its markets to Tunisian agriculture and industrial products and, together with its Tunisian partner, to exert itself to find adequate solutions to the problems of the emigrant workers.

In order to assure true economic promotion of Tunisia, this new multilateral policy should, in our opinion, be accompanied by a new spirit in our bilateral relations. In fact, we wish that our economic relations with France may develop into cooperation with respect to production. We desire that Tunisians and Frenchmen may henceforth participate in joint investments and take joint economic risks. We would like industrial cooperation to lead our two nations to the realization of great industrial projects of a type that will create the maximum number of jobs, to distribute products in French and foreign markets and to conduct a real transfer of technology. These sentiments were presented by Hassan Belkhoja who expressed the hope that, in order to assure the financing of such projects, the Tunisian proposal dealing with the creation of a Franco-Tunisian investment bank will be realized very soon.

Hassan Belkhoja indicated that, in this crisis-ridden world where sources of tension and conflicts abound, the French trilateral project recommended by President Giscard d'Estaing and the Tunisian idea of "development contract" proposed by President Bourguiba may succeed in eliminating an untenable situation.

Furthermore, the minister directed attention to the fact that the awareness that is presently occurring in Europe with respect to its worldwide role in the principal international affairs constitutes a new factor which we encourage enthusiastically.

Our desire, he said, is that Europe should take the initiative with respect to ideas and actions so as to create a stir and to deliver its message. The importance of the role that it will play will then be determining and will be able to return confidence to the Third World and dissuade it from being won over by ideologies which are foreign to it.

France and Tunisia are therefore called on today, more than ever before, to collaborate and to attune their actions so as to favor Tunisian-French cooperation in the interest of the nation itself and of world security, said Mr. Belkhoja in conclusion.

In respone to the statements made by Hassan Belkhoja, Jean Francois-Poncet noted that "Franco-Tunisian relations are those that permit reciprocal confidence. They are founded on deep friendship which binds together not only the leaders and their staffs but also unites the two peoples." He expressed the conviction that the work of the General Joint Commission will bring about a new manifestation of this friendship, emphasizing the concern for permanent collaboration which impels both governments.

After expressing great satisfaction with the intensity of Franco-Tunisian relations, Jean Francois-Poncet called attention to the fact that the reason for the existence of the Franco-Tunisian General Joint Commission is precisely this desire for permanent collaboration.

The chief of the French Diplomatic Corps considered it necessary that, by means of this General Joint Commission, it would be possible each year to take a complete inventory of this cooperative effort, pointing out that the agenda and the rate at which work is performed by the Commission reflects the evolution of relations between nations.

With regard to economic and financial questions, both delegations will have to prepare an inventory of our joint efforts, to identify carefully and precisely the difficulties encountered and to think about the future, added Jean Francois-Poncet.

"It is not without precedent that France has pleaded in favor of the interests of Tunisia before the European Economic Community. France has always done so and I will say that it does so even more now that the problem of expanding to other Mediterranean countries has been posed.

"We are familiar with the problems that such expansion can create for other Mediterranean economies. We have made it understood to candidates for expansion that these problems should be studied and dealt with together with the interested parties, beginning with Tunisia, before the final decisions concerning such expansion are made," said the Chief of the French Diplomatic Corps in essence.

"Rest assured that we will practice this policy of faithfulness with regard to Tunisia," continued Jean Francois-Poncet who recognized that one of the duties of industrialized nations is to furnish access to their markets for the products of nations which are developing their industries.

It is nevertheless believed that these nations should understand the social and economic characteristics that this policy may require and therefore accept the fact that certain stages and a certain amount of adaptation over a period of time be provided for such guidance.

The chief of the French Diplomatic Corps referred to the proposals made in June 1980 by Tunisia aimed at imparting new dimensions to the already very old and very close economic cooperation existing between the two nations both at governmental and business levels. He pointed out that these proposals furnish the basis for a very careful examination on the part of French government agencies working jointly with interested business circles. He furnished assurance that this examination is proceeding in a most constructive vein.

Mr Francois-Poncet expressed his belief that cultural and technical cooperation was an important and essential matter. He was delighted to observe that this type of cooperation was being actively pursued and was being futher developed. Moreover, he announced that the Joint Cooperation Commission would meet next 29 September in Tunis to conduct an exhaustive examination of this phase of bilateral relations.

"Our concern in this area is to maintain cooperation at a very high level, to constantly match our actions to the priorities of the economic and social development of Tunisia and to take care that such cooperation does not interfere in any manner with the takeover by Tunisian staffs," he added.

With respect to social and consular matters, Mr Francois-Poncet noted that the General Commission should consider all problems met by the nationals of both nations and therefore should deal with the important subject of the situation facing the Tunisian workers in France.

In conclusion, Mr Francois-Poncet assured the Tunisian delegation that it would find that its French counterpart was extremely openminded, was anxious to be understanding and exhibit an attitude of esteem and friendship as borne out by this meeting. Finally, he declared that he felt persuaded that these contacts with the highest level Tunisian officials would permit the imparting of additional vigor the the already exceptionally active relations between France and Tunisia.

SIXTY SIX THOUSAND JOBS TO BE CREATED EACH YEAR OF NEXT DECADE

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 9 Sep 80 p 4

[Article: "Mr Mezri Chekir brings to a Close the Regional Students' Conference in Nabeul"]

[Text] Friday evening in Nabeul, Mr Mezri Chekir, head of the prime minister's staff, brought to a close the regional students' conference in the presence of the governor and of the general secretaries of the Coordination Committee and of the National Union of Youth Organizations.

During this conference, delegates discussed matters related to student life and to the state of the country in general.

Answering questions raised by the delegates, Mr Mezri Chekir stressed the importance of contacts and dialogue with the youth because, he said, youth is the leading force in the country.

He then praised the maturity, realism and moderation of the students of Nabeul. These qualities, he stated, to which the Supreme Soldier always appealed, represent decisive factors in the stability of the regime and the achievement of greater solidarity between Tunisians.

Mr Chekir also pointed out that democracy should be understood as a means of reassuring citizens as to their future, of creating conditions enabling them to live in dignity, and of giving them an opportunity to express their opinions freely. He added that all political streams could coexist within the Party, provided that they always take the general interest of the country into consideration. Mr Mezri Chekir also indicated that, in Tunisia, the press is free as long as information is managed according to principles of good faith and a sincere and constructive criticism.

Mr Mezri Chekir pointed out that the Party is open to the new ideas brought by competent youths desirous to take a part in political life.

Touching on the economy, Mr Chekir stressed that development during the next decade will require large credits which will be used to create 66 thousand jobs each year. He added that the success of the Sixth Plan depends on the social and political stability of the country and on the joint efforts of all Tunisians. Such political stability, he noted, is our best argument in dealing with those who wish to help us in the financing of many socio-economical projects. Concerning agriculture, Mr Chekir stated that development in this sector will be a major option in the next Plan, and he announced that several measures will be taken to promote agriculture, especially with regard to the property structure of certain tracts of land, the granting of credits, the marketing of production, and an increase in agricultural product prices.

With respect to the administrative reform, Mr Mezri Chekir recalled that the government has already started implementing its policy of administrative decentralization and procedure simplification, so that the mission of the central administration will soon consist mainly in planning, programming and controlling.

Concerning Tunisia's foreign policy, Mr Mezri Chekir stressed the importance of cooperation between Maghrebian countries, and his political will to create a unified Arab Maghreb.

In concluding, Mr Mezri Chekir promised the students of the Gabes Higher School of Engineering that he would study the problems they are facing, and he stressed the necessity for them to study under good conditions, in view of the essential part they will play in the country's social and economic development.

MINISTER OF EDUCATION DISCUSSES VARIOUS ISSUES

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French, 10 Sep 80 p 5

[Article: "Mr Abdelaziz Ben Dhia to the Students of Jendouba: 'Universities Will Be Located in All Areas Fulfilling Conditions'"]

[Text] Monday in Ain Draham, Mr Abdelaziz Ben Dhia, minister of Higher Education and Scientific Research, chaired a meeting of the regional students' conference of the Jendouba governorate; also present were Messrs Abderrazak Kefi and Mohamed Hedi Ben Farhat, respectively governor and general secretary of the Coordination Committee of the area.

During the discussion which took place on this occasion, students raised several questions concerning higher education, the policy of decentralization as well as the programs, the attribution of scholarships, university selection and guidance, cultural animation and the representation of students in unions. Other questions concerning the development of industry and tourism, the balance between regions, the price and wage policy, employment, rural development and economic cooperation with Arab countries, were also discussed.

Answering these questions, Mr Abdelaziz Ben Dhia first stated, concerning university selection and guidance, that there are definite criteria which must be complied with--use of computers for the selection and guidance of students is not questioned--indicating that the data supplied to the computer are prepared at three different centers.

In this connection, the minister stated that every student, after one year of study in the field assigned to him the first time, may take part in the competitive examination for admission to the field of his choice, which takes place every year in May.

He also warned students against false rumors alleging that a selective policy is being applied.

Concerning the decentralization of higher education, Mr Ben Dhia stated that the government is contemplating the creation of universities in all regions, provided that the conditions for such a creation are met.

The minister went on to talk about the attribution of university scholarships; he pointed out that all applications submitted had been examined by the departments concerned within the prescribed time.

He also indicated that the amounts of these scholarships are sufficient to cover the needs of the beneficiary, taking into account the fact that room and board do not exceed 12 dinars and that the student receives 10 monthly payments in addition to the additional subsidy intended for the purchase of university supplies, the amount of which varies between 30 and 50 dinars.

As for students who have to stay down, the minister stated that Tunisia is one of the few countries where those among such students who have a grade average higher than 8 out of 20 are granted 80 percent of the scholarship amount.

Mr Abdelaziz Ben Dhia then talked about the UGET [General Union of Tunisian Students]: he first recalled the decision made in this respect, inviting the students to form a representative committee, and he pointed out that the prime minister himself had announced this decision which is intended to guarantee free and democratic elections.

Answering other questions concerning development, the minister stated that the reduction of the imbalance between regions is a political decision made by the government as well as one of the main objectives of the Sixth Plan. Besides, the decision of the Supreme Soldier to convene an extraordinary congress of the Party is consistent with the desire of the regime to fulfill all conditions necessary to achieve success in this direction.

As for economic cooperation with brother and friendly countries, the minister remarked that Tunisia has consistently worked toward the opening of new horizons in the field of economic cooperation. For this purpose, it has always called for the adoption of a common Arab economic strategy, for the development of inter-Arab exchanges and the creation of an Arab Common Market.

At the end of his speech, Mr Ben Dhia urged the students to take a more effective part in the animation of cultural life in the area.

Prior to that, answering questions on regional matters, the governor had suggested that a special fund be set up in the area, to finance students' activities.

The delegates to the conference also formed a Regional Students' Bureau.

WHEAT STORAGE PROBLEMS DISCUSSED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 10 Sep 80 p 2

[Article signed N.O.: "Agriculture: Wheat Storage Problems"]

[Text] No country can have food reserves if its infrastructure and storage capacity are inadequate.

In our country, where agricultural activities still provide jobs for over 60 percent of the active population, and to the extent that the agricultural sector still depends on climatic conditions, the creation of such reserves is considered to be a guarantee that the country will be normally supplied with food.

Once the granary of Rome, the northern area in general, and the northwestern area in particular--where agricultural activities predominate--present a strange and distressing sight to the eyes of the ordinary traveller.

Thousands of wheat sacks, the result of a full year's work, are piled up on the ground, unprotected against rain and storms at a time of the year characterized by sudden weather changes. That wheat may get weevil-eaten or washed away by rainwater, yet nothing appears to have been done to remedy the problem and prevent losses.

In all centers, the storage infrastructure has not appreciably improved over the years; the street, with all its risks and hazards, becomes a place for temporary storage.

At a time when wheat is becoming a "green weapon" in the hands of the large producers who are competing against one another to sell it, it is becoming essential for a developing country like ours--striving to achieve food self-sufficiency--to create an adequate infrastructure which will take into account both production and consumption trends.

Why, then, this discrepancy between storage capacity and production?

Since wheat collecting and marketing are managed exclusively by cooperatives under administrative control, why not allocate to them the means to enable them to create a storage infrastructure which would take into account the geographical distribution of production?

The problem of storage is not new in Tunisia, and the responsibility for it is shared by all. No effective action was taken when it first occurred, and the same problems now arise cyclically each year: silos filled to the brim although production (some 11 thousand quintals this year) is far from sufficient to satisfy our consumption which is estimated at 16 millions of quintals per year--still less than anticipated by the development plans.

The actual storage capacity did not change after the country became independent. While production and consumption have almost doubled, storage capacity has increased by 15 percent, i.e. 5.4 thousand quintals, with the following breakdown:

- Grain office: 3 thousand quintals
- COCEBLE [expansion unknown]: 1.2 thousand quintals
- CCGC [expansion unknown]: 1.2 thousand quintals

Storage never got its due because investment in this sector is not considered immediately profitable; amortization is very slow. Contrary to tourism, this sector did not benefit from large capital investments.

In addition, cooperatives such as COCEBLE or CCGC do not have sufficient resources to build new silos or even to maintain existing silos when these need repairing.

The storage premium determined by the Ministry of Agriculture remains low and does nothing to encourage effective action which would change the present situation.

In addition, because of the priorities and choices they adopted, past development plans have not lent any particular attention to the restructuration of this sector.

Financial aid to the cooperatives managing this sector has now become mandatory. The immediate construction of metallic silos (not very costly) should be considered in areas where storage capacity is insufficient.

In the future, we should take a closer look at this sector and give it the place it deserves in our next development plan, now in preparation.

All the more so as the report of the Large Crop Committee (1979-1980) has stressed the necessity of:

- preparing a master storage plan which will take into account the geographical distribution of storage and marketing capacities;

- overhauling the existing storage infrastructure of the country;

- encouraging farmers farming over 200 hectares to change their harvesting method to adopt a bulk method.

In the meanwhile, we must use all means now available to us to protect the wheat exposed and reduce our losses to a minimum.

FATAH'S ABU SHARAR ATTACKS JORDAN'S ATTITUDE TOWARD PLO

LD191547 Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 17 Sep 80 p 11

[AL-WATAN report: "Abu Sharar to AL-WATAN: 'Jordanian Move To Cancel PLO's Role'"]

[Text] Rome--Fatah Central Committee member Majid Abu Sharar has accused Jordan of making enormous financial gains since the Baghdad summit conference which allocated $1.25 billion for Jordan's steadfastness. In a press statement to AL-WATAN, Abu Sharar said: "Jordan has done nothing to confront Israel during all these years." He added that Jordan, through the joint Jordanian-Palestinian committee for consolidating steadfastness in the occupied territories, has gained a great deal but lost nothing and has participated in managing the affairs of our people in the occupied territories and expanded the pro-Jordanian front.

The Palestinian official pointed out that "Jordan has recently begun to present itself as representative of the Palestinian people alongside the PLO."

He said: "We can now say that we are in an opposed position." Abu Sharar expects this contradiction between the [Palestinian] resistance and Jordan to explode in the next few months.

He added: "We are now gathering information on Jordan's diplomatic moves in Europe, America and the Arab area. We have evidence proving that the contacts that have taken place center on cancelling PLO's role as the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people."

CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY ACTIVITY IN ISLAMIC WORLD SEEN AS MENACE

Tripoli AL-ZAHAF AL-AKHDAR in Arabic 30 Jun 80 pp 16-17, 11

[Article by Mukhtar Sawisi: "The Voice of Islam Must Resound; Serious Colonialist Challenges Seek the Destruction of Islam; Islam Is Equality and Destruction of Class Structure; Islam Is Historic, Cultural Message Based on Inspired Book"]

[Text] When Islam dawned on the Arabian Peninsula, when it spread over the horizon and expanded to the farthest countries of the earth, the age of ignorance and paganism which used to control all of humanity vanished. Islam was neither an unexpected incident nor a reform movement. It was rather a historic, cultural message based on a divinely inspired book sent to God's noble prophet who was the guiding light for humanity. People found in him their ultimate salvation from slavery, oppression, tyranny and the control of idols which do not benefit those who worship them and ask them support or protection from danger.

Islam was a revolution against polytheism, against ignorance, against a preoccupation with vice and against floundering in murky darkness. Islam was a radical revolution that changed the face of the universe which had been steeped in corruption, error and the consecration of material idols carved by human hands from different materials in the shape of dolls. When the light of Islam dawned and illuminated the universe, the unfair relationships established by a small group of pre-Islamic noblemen to serve their interests and enslave humanity changed.

Islam came to undo tyrannical relations, establish foundations of equality and justice, and assure the human being of freedom in a free and happy society.

Islam has been a universal appeal to the entire world for the welfare and deliverance of all of humanity without exception from all kinds of injustice and tyranny. God Almighty spoke to His noble prophet and said, "We have sent you forth as a blessing to mankind" [The Prophets: 107].

The law of Moslems is the Holy Koran from which no evil can come. God Almighty said in His beloved book: "Believers, obey Allah and the Prophet when he calls you to that which gives you life" [The Spoils: 24]. He also says, "Allah is the patron of the faithful. He leads them from darkness to light" [The Cow: 257].

"This path of mine is straight. Follow it and do not follow other paths, for they will lead you astray." [Cattle: 153]. Islam is the religion of truth and welfare for all; and it is the religion of deliverance from the yoke of slavery. It is also the religion of man's liberation from the gloom of darkness; it brings him out into the light of equality, justice and the paths of righteousness and welfare where he can enjoy worshiping the one and only God.

The Arab and Islamic nation fell prey to the conspiracies of western imperialism and racist Zionism when it neglected Islam. These conspiracies were mixed with hatred, malice and intrigues against Islam. Their purpose was to weaken Moslems, to break their power and misrepresent the Islamic Arab character. We cannot fail to see the state of weakness and submissiveness which the Arab and Islamic nation is in today as a result of the western colonialist intellectual invasion which began to act on and extend its influence through the body of the Arab and Islamic world.

We are not unmindful of the efforts that have been made to abort and to exterminate Islamic thought through the missionary expeditions that came to the Arab world from the west many ages ago to pave the way for intellectual colonialism and to establish the reactionary bases for this colonialism. At first these expeditions came under the guise of missions whose outside appearance was meant to conceal their reality. But they soon expanded their activities and led armies of crusaders to the land of Islam. Their purpose was to destroy Islamic thought, obliterate the features of Islamic culture, take over the holy places of Islam, and turn them into centers for spreading Christianity by various ways and means, such as the establishment of hospitals, societies, and Christian schools and universities to teach Christianity to the residents of any area where Christians may land. These Christian missionary establishments pledged protection and care to all those who joined them, were attracted to them, or enticed by them.

Some of those who joined these organizations were sent to study in Europe. As soon as they returned to their home countries, they were nominated to leadership positions for the purpose of gaining control over these countries. Yesterday, Jerusalem fell, and until this moment it remains defiled by Zionism. Today, Lebanon is being subjected to the same conspiracy: Christians are playing a major role in this conspiracy as intermediaries. They are doing so to pave the way for the Zionist, colonialist attack, and for the fall of Lebanon into the grip of Zionist colonialism.

Some Arab countries may be subjected to the same conspiracy in the future, especially under these critical circumstances which the Arab and Islamic nation is experiencing wherein the Islamic religion is being aborted and destroyed. We have sensed the hatred and the religious fanaticism of the Christians. It is evident to all through the vile conspiracy being perpetrated against the Arab and Islamic nation by international imperialism and Zionism, with the assistance of their reactionary allies and all the malicious forces which are trying to finess their conspiratorial designs under the pretext of protecting Islam.

Unless the Arab and Islamic nation resists, unless it intensifies its efforts to foil the conspiracies that are being perpetrated against it, the final result will be the irreversible elimination of Islam and Islamic culture. Afterwards, God forbid, Islam will be no more than a passing memory which future generations would read about.

We want to take this opportunity to shed light on the Society for Islamic Missionary Activity. We want to know the extent of its efforts and activities in spreading the Islamic message and opposing the attempts that are being made against Islam for the purpose of aborting it.

The Goals of the Society

The goals of the Society for Islamic Missionary Activity are to spread the Islamic message all over the world by all possible means, but especially as follows:

* The Holy Koran is to be made known, and an effort is to be made to have it taught, memorized and disseminated by all means.

* The holy tradition of the prophet is to be made known, and the lofty principles of the prophet's life, may God bless him, are to be brought to light.

* Islam is to be presented in a manner that encompasses all the aspects of its faith, its ethics, its rites of worship and its dealings. Such a presentation is to be easy and free of distorted notions, dialectics and interpretations that are foreign to the essence of Islam.

* Islam is to be interpreted in a manner that stays in step with all the branches of human science and learning.

* An effort is to be made to prepare missionaries who would carry out the duty of Islamic missionary activity.

* Periodicals, magazines, Islamic encyclopedias and books are to be prepared and published to present the principles and instructions of Islam; to present the tradition of the prophet, may God bless him and grant him salvation; and [to present] the values of Islamic civilization. An effort is to be made to have them translated into all languages.

* Meetings for Moslem students and young people are to be organized for the purpose of making Islam known and making an effort to spread the Islamic message.

* Religious and scientific agencies and organizations are to be contacted so as to achieve the dissemination of the Islamic message.

* The Arabic language is to be disseminated by all means because it is the language of the Holy Koran. All the Islamic countries are to be requested to make Arabic the official language and to teach it in all the stages of education.

* Islamic countries are to be urged to make the Koran the law of a Moslem society and to amend their laws so as to make them consistent with the principles of Islam.

* The board of the society, under the supervision of its secretary, manages the affairs of the society, conducts its business and directs its activities so as to achieve its goals. It makes the decisions that are necessary to achieve the purpose for which the society was created in accordance with the provisions of its bylaws and the rulings that are issued accordingly. It has the specific [authority] to do the following:

* The board is to set up the programs that are necessary for Islamic missionary activity in the different countries in accordance with the conditions and the circumstances of each country.

* It is to establish branches for the society in the other countries.

* It is to convene Islamic conferences and debates.

* It is to approve the society's proposed budget and its [annual] financial statement, and it is to develop its resources in legitimate Islamic ways.

* It is to establish the administrative, professional and financial rulings that are necessary for organizing the business of the society.

* It is to study the reports that are submitted by the branches of the society; it is to evaluate and to follow up on the business of these branches; and it is to issue instructions that are necessary for them.

* It is to accept contributions, donations and bequests, and it is to manage the religious endowment that is offered to the society.

* It is to write rules to regulate financial and material assistance grants as well as other assistance within the purposes of the society.

* It is to hire employees; to approve lending and delegating them [to other institutions] and determining their areas of specialization.

To achieve the objectives of the Society for Islamic Missionary Activity, this society spares no effort in championing and elevating Islam. To do so it pursues several courses: either it organizes practical or educational programs or it attends international gatherings and participates in Islamic and international meetings. During the 11th session of the Islamic Conference in Islamabad, the secretary of the society affirmed several essential and significant points in his address to the conference.

Some of these points were brought up in the following quotation from his address: "The Society for Islamic Missionary Activity came into existence with the emergence of the glorious First of September Revolution which was an Islamic revolution. It raised the banner of Islam and it worked for victory for Moslems in all the corners of the world. It is a society that undertakes popular action to advocate the religion of the One and Only God and to strive by all means to make the Holy Koran the law for Islamic societies. The Society for Islamic Missionary Activity did perform its duty in many of the Islamic and non-Islamic countries. It had hundreds of missionaries who invited people to [adopt] Islam. Their efforts, thank God, had their effect, and hundreds of people adopted Islam. The society's projects and programs--which were prepared and written by scientists and professionals from many Islamic countries--achieved great results. Numerous mosques, Islamic centers, schools for the Koran, vocational institutes, academic colleges, hospitals, university libraries and students' homes have been established. Many Moslems' sons have been given scholarships at intermediate institutes and at the university for undergraduate and graduate work. The society has distributed the Holy Koran in numerous interpretations of its noble meanings. It is cooperating with various Islamic countries and societies for the sake of Islam and for giving Moslems power on earth."

The Necessity of Collecting and Amassing All the Factors of Support

In his address, the secretary of the society called upon Moslems to be solicitous about Islamic missionary activity. He said: "In the context of this conference, we must remind ourselves of the necessity of being solicitous about Islamic missionary activity on the broadest [possible] scale. All the necessary organizational, human and material factors that are necessary for achieving the major cultural objectives which are enjoined upon us by the principles of Islam are to be collected and amassed.

"In the recent past Islamic missionary activity was disdained, ridiculed and ignored by enemies and friends alike; it was even ignored by the Moslems themselves. This [attitude] used to constitute a major obstacle to the return to God's true religion. Due to the influence of imported cultures Moslems used to view Islam in the same way they viewed other religions, considering it at best to be a religion that focused on the purely spiritual aspect of man. [In their view] the age had gone beyond that view [and espoused] modern philosophies and ideologies [that had come] from the west and the east."

In his address, the secretary of the society also warned against the wave of serious colonialist challenges that seek the destruction of Islam.

"Today, after the truth has become plain, after contemporary Islamic revolutions that had proposed Islam as an all-encompassing way of life have gained victory, and after man has risen in rebellion to realize his liberation and find the right path, Islamic missionary activity finds itself facing a new obstacle from the enemies of Islam who want to involve Islam in marginal problems. They want Moslems to escape from life to a kind of monasticism they devised. As has been their custom they began to establish centers for scientific, political, psychological and social research which concerned themselves with studying the Moslem mentality, the makeup of Islamic societies and the content of the Islamic faith for the purpose of subjugating Moslems and changing the directions of the Islamic revolution which is now attracting the Moslem masses everywhere. They want to make all this vanish in temporary reform programs that dwindle away in the tumult of western materialistic thought.

"The matter went beyond that too to a race between the enemies of Islam in the west and in the east to reduce the Moslems to servitude in the name of Islam so as to achieve their own objectives, and especially with regard to the plans of the superpowers. All these plans are in agreement about conspiring against this religion and extinguishing 'the light of Allah with their mouths: but Allah seeks only to perfect His light, though the infidels abhor it' [Repentance: 32].

"Islam is a message [that advocates] truth, justice, freedom, welfare and equality. It is against injustice, fraud, persecution and oppression. It is a religion for all people and not a religion for those who own property, who are wealthy and who are masters. Nor is it the religion of the aristocracy in any of its forms; it is the religion of the masses wherever they may be.

"In advocating Islam we must recognize that if we do not face the real problems; if we do not recognize the suffering of those who are deprived, those who are treated unfairly and those who are helpless; and if we do not help [all those] rebel against injustice and deprivation so they can achieve justice, equality and freedom in its noblest sense, we would be like someone who spoke a language that people in this or in any other age did not understand. We would not have the ability to compete with other missionary movements and ideological messages that are making attempts to solve the problems which people are facing.

"In this age we have failed to become aware of these serious facts which the tradition of the prophet, may God bless him and grant him salvation, indicates he had an interest in and found solutions for."

Islam Is a Permanent Revolution on the Road to God

The secretary of the society also affirmed in his statement that every Moslem is to heed the Holy Koran and the principles of Islam.

"Islam is a permanent revolution on the road that leads to God; it is incombatible with tutelage by any creature whatsoever. In this sense Islam is the natural right of every human being, and, consequently, we must allow each individual to devote himself to the Holy Koran so he would become familiar with that immoral divinely inspired book which is the last message from heaven. [We must allow] every person to live according to its rules and principles. Everything that Moslems may do will be of secondary [importance] if they do not succeed in making every Moslem aware of the message and the principles of the Holy Koran. It is then that religious, political, economic and social tutelage is repudiated. In this case a Moslem and a Moslem society become models for free men and for free societies, that are controlled by no man, government or institution. Homage then is due to the one and only God; all the idols would fall; and justice would be achieved." It is the fact that they have strayed from the Koran and adhered to changes which reflect individual interpretations of the Koran that are governed by specific historical, geographical and social circumstances that separated Moslems from each other in the past and led to their backwardness, their disunity and their partisanship. Today, the Koran is our route to genuine deliverance in a happy Islamic society."

The Superpowers and The Extension of Influence

The secretary of the Society for Islamic Missionary Activity also referred in his address to the superpowers that are engaged in a fierce struggle against Islam. He said it was necessary to confront them so as to oppose the dangers that are threatening Islam from every direction. These dangers seek to obliterate the religion, the culture and the principles of Islam. He said:

"Many people spoke in this conference about the major dangers that are threatening the Islamic world from every direction. The real weapon [that can be used] to confront these major challenges is a deep-rooted faith in the principles of Islam and an insistence on applying the teachings of the Holy Koran and making it the law and the way of life for Moslems. Afterwards [it is necessary to] become acquainted with the sources of these dangers and to confront them with force that emanates from an enlightened, awareness of self sharpened by a determination to fight in a holy war.

"With regard to the foreign sources of these dangers, we find that the superpowers are competing with each other to spread their influence on numerous Islamic countries and to interfere in their affairs and firmly establish the foreign occupation of these countries. Palestine has been the foremost of these countries; instead of the Moslems succeeding in liberating it, Egypt was lost after it. The enemies of Islam who usurped Egypt after succeeding in occupying Palestine were victorious. We now hear [expressions of] diplomatic enthusiasm in favor of making the occupation authorities in Palestine change their decision about declaring Jerusalem their capital. We are all forgetting that the first head of state to visit this occupied city was the Egyptian president who sold his nation's cause. Instead of taking the economic measures that are necessary against those who were on our side one day and then sold themselves to the enemy, we are now imploring those enemies to give up gains they had won by force."

The Pope Tours the Dark Continent

The programs of Christians and missionaries in some African countries--and Central America is among them--have been successful. These countries were occupied again by the Christian forces of the west after the Islamic efforts that were made by al-Jamahiriyah succeeded in the Islamic missionary activity, and those countries became Islamic.

The pope is touring the dark continent these days. He is pleased with the obvious victory [that was achieved] after Moslems failed to champion their brothers in many corners of the Islamic world. The results have always been more refugee camps and hundreds of thousands of poor, needy and sick people who became a burden to international relief organizations while we begrudge them even the approval of forming an Islamic red crescent that would take pity on them and show them mercy and extend that pity and mercy to the needy everywhere.

As a result of deep psychological influences that developed from the ages of oppression and corruption, Moslems have become accustomed to taking matters lightly when matters are serious. They accept lagging behind when it is time to take action. When disaster befalls one of their homelands, they vie with each other in mourning the loss; they hold conferences to study the reasons for the loss; and they [also] excel in eulogizing that country which suffered the loss.

Today, the only thing Moslems have to do is to overcome this delusion that is oppressing their hearts and rebel against their reality so as to change it. "Allah does not change a people's lot unless they change what is in their hearts" [Thunder: 11]. This change will not take place unless it stems from them and from their own will. It is not to be a change effected in response to what is dictated to them by their enemies who are now expounding upon Islam to conquer it.

The First Project of the Islamic Mission Society

At a time when book, periodicals, printed publications and radio and television broadcasts are considered principal means for promoting the Islamic message, the Moslem missionary is considered to be of major significance. He is the pivot upon which Islamic missionary activity rests. The missionary represents the direct and continuous link which is based on direct contact and on a one on one relationship that is undoubtedly influential and greatly effective in spreading Islam. Along the lines of interest in [those] missionaries a conference is being convened in Libya from 18/8/80 to 31/8/80. It is a meeting to which all the missionaries of the Islamic Mission Society are invited--and there are about 500 missionaries--to achieve the following objectives:

1. To stimulate Islamic activity and to give it a new impetus.

2. To strengthen intellectual ties with the missionaries.

3. To strengthen relations among the missionaries themselves and to manifest the principle of getting acquainted among them.

4. To find out about their psychological preparedness, their cultural capabilities and the extent of their commitment to adhere to the course of missionary activity and also to find out about the effect they had on Moslems and others around them.

5. To find out about the obstacles and the problems that are facing the missionaries and to consider proposals to overcome them.

6. To utilize the missionaries in finding out about the reality they are experiencing and in finding out about the economic and social condition of Moslems and the extent of their awareness of the cause of Islam and the dangers that surround it. These dangers are manifested in the missionary and Zionist movements as well as in other destructive movements.

7. To enable the missionaries to find out about the new Libyan reality which is based on Islam; which succeeded in realizing social justice and freedom through socialism; and which achieved freedom by giving people authority on the basis of the fact that [freedom and justice] are the foundations of Islamic life, and especially to enable the missionaries to find out about the doubts that are aroused by the enemies of Islam against the Islamic experiment in Libya.

8. To make them aware of the necessity of advocating true Islam from its primary source which is the Holy Koran that was sent by God to Muhammad, may God bless him and grant him salvation. Their missionary activity is to be quite remote from narrow, prejudicial sectarianism.

These goals could be achieved by means of [the following]:

* Lectures.

* Discussion meetings.

*Debates.

KURDISTAN REVOLUTIONARY WORKERS' ORGANIZATION CALLS FOR ARMED STRUGGLE

Stockholm RIZGARIYA KURDISTAN in Turkish Jan-Feb 80, pp 16-19

/Text/ From the Kurdistan Revolutionary Workers' Organization to peasants and rural workers and our brothers and sisters in the south.

When the Iranian people initiated the revolution to end dictatorship, the peasants did not contribute much to the struggle. They said, "If the Shah goes, feudalism and the old ways will come back."

Now we see that the feudal lords are surrounding Kurdistan on all sides. They are buying guns, attacking the peasants and crushing them, taking everything they have. In other words, what our brothers said has come true.

This shows us the wisdom of the peasant. Another reason the peasants did not join the struggle was that they did not know what would happen to their own world or who would come out the winner. But if they had joined the struggle in the beginning to prevent the advance of the feudal lords, they would not have been able to hold up their heads now.

Measures must be taken before the calamity comes. We know that the wild boar is nasty and dangerous and must be prevented from wreaking havoc. Or, when black clouds start gathering in the sky, the tobacco farmers cover their tobacco before the rain begins.

Therefore, as we said, the peasant did not join the struggle, because to an extent they did not know what would happen to their own world. To be more precise: There were no political parties to talk with the peasants or to organize them. The existing parties, while talking nonsense to the peasants, at the same time rose and fell with the landlords and feudalists and supported them. And still support them.

It is our duty for our peasant brothers and workers to draw their attention to the situation, especially the situation in the rural areas, in order to defend them against all pressures, including the new forms.

We hope that the following will summarize developments in the rural areas.

On What Landlords and Feudalists Do and Efforts of Peasants

1. Two weeks ago, Husen Agha from Bize and his brother Qarani Agha and their collaborators attacked Ballan villagers. They bound some of the villagers, tied ropes around their necks and dragged them out of the village. Later they demanded taxes for the past 15 years from the villagers. The Free Revolutionary Council (pro-government, translator's note) turned a deaf ear and did nothing about the situation.

2. In Suma Village in the Bradost region near Urmiye, collaborationist feudal lords like Jihangir Khan robbed some of the peasants and demanded extortion (rent) from others.

3. Jander Agha, the owner of Sard Awa Village in the Bokan region, surrounded the village mosque and dispersed by force of arms the villagers who had assembled to form a Village Revolutionary Committee.

4. After the Shah fled and the government led by the traitor Bakhtiyar fell, Abdullah Khan from Hawraman, landlord of Dizli, sent a letter to his people saying, "The law is now dead." He later attacked the villagers and tried to seize their expansive lands.

5. The magistrate of Geozeh Kereh Village in the Merivan region seized the villagers' lands by force.

6. Ahmed Agha of Goleh Village terrorized the villagers for the purpose of intimidating the people.

7. In the vicinity of Kermanshah, former collaborators of Kamyaran began a robbery campaign in the surrounding villages in order to intimidate the people. They would plunder a different village every night. As a result of this thievery and plunder, the peasants of Kani Lili left their village and migrated to other regions. Other villagers nearby took their rugs and all the household furnishings left behind to the homes of their relatives living in Kermanshah and Sanandach. Some villagers said, "Even the Shah's regime was better than it is now."

Now Let Us Talk About What the Peasants Are Doing

1. The people of the Kamyaran region rounded up guns again and decided to get organized to join forces. For example, when armed robbers tried to plunder Kani Isa Village, the people of Uzmaneh Village with their young men and brave youths ran to the aid of their neighbors and turned back the attackers.

2. In the Sardesht region, the Alwatan gendarmerie station commander had obtained weapons for Selim Agha of Alwatan. But the villagers took measures against this and Selim Agha was left without guns.

3. In the Kamyaran region, residents of Yaminan Khwaru drove the government's rent men out of the region last year. These forces and robbers together attacked Yamani Village several nights ago, cut down and burned the trees in three fruit orchards; the villagers then opened fire on them, forcing them to abandon the village.

4. Farmers in Bluanwa and Dedana near Sanandach seized the private farms which had been wrenched from them earlier by cruel feudal lords and began plowing them.

5. Landless farmers from 12 villages in the Bokan area demanded equal distribution of the farms of large landholders and arranged a demonstration in Bokan on 22-12-57 (12 March 1979, translator's note).

6. Khelil Melichi Agha, the owner of Kani Sur Village in the Sakiz area, came to Rahim Gujyag Village two years ago with fifty tractors and seized the land and some of the pasture of a dozen or so farmers.

These families -- a total of nine families -- are now going to Sakiz to make the situation known and to get the support of the people. One of these of our brothers who was robbed said, "Our land is our life. We will definitely get it back and plant crops again. If only we had a few guns. We will not hesitate to give our lives for this purpose."

7. Kamyar, grandson of Hama Rashid Khan and long-time henchman of Barzani, has begun raiding in the area around Saran Village in Baneh region. With his armed gang, he has taken 20,000 tumans (Iranian monetary unti, translator's note) by force from workers. The Boneh Khwaru villagers have bought guns and are defending themselves every day against this traitorous gang. They were the ones who fled and took refuge in the police station. As for the armed thieves of these traitors, they are not brave enough to approach us.

The following announcement was made by the Merivan Peasant Union:

"In the name of God the Almighty -- on 16 Efsand 1357 (5 March 1979, translator's note), each of the following villages sent two representatives to attend a meeting held in Na-Na Village. The names of these villages are: Na-Na, Chor, Almaneh, Hajmneh, Merg. Sarincmar, Daga Shekan, Goze Koreh, Darseran, Gagel.

"The text of the proposals and decisions of the meeting is as follows:

"1. We invite the farmers of Merivan and other regions to unite, as other citizens have done, to work toward ensuring mutual assistance and solidarity in harmony with all other classes and under the flag of Islam.

"2. Since most of the people of Merivan are agricultural workers and since this class is the most oppressed class as compared to other classes. we will unite, we will recognize our enemy and we will be ready to answer his attacks.

"3. We all know that the remnants of the former shah's clique are trying to infiltrate us and destroy our unifying bonds. We will be vigilant and foil their plans.

"4. Valued farmer! At this moment as we wish to unite, our enemies are trying to make us out to be 'communists.' They have spread this slander among the people to prevent our union. But this is not important. It is like the dog howling at the full moon. We will expand our union under the banner of Islam.

"5. Wherever a village is oppressed, we will gather there. We will defend it without fear of sacrifice.

"6. We will stand against all rules imposed by the landlords.

"7. We will overcome those who speak against our religion or those who defend ideas opposed to our religion.

"8. The mullah we want is the one who stands by the peasant, who speaks the truth and does not walk behind the cruel landlords.

"9. The one who should set prices on grain and other produce is the peasant. He must accomplish this in his own way.

"10. We, the peasants, are defenders of our nation. We will never permit foreign tyrants to enter our nation.

"Long live the Merivan Peasant Union! Death to the tyrants and enemies of the peasants!"

Two things are clear from these reports. First, the feudal lords and reactionaries are armed and they are suppressing the peasants. But on the other hand, our peasant brothers are refusing to remain silent in the traditional way and are defending their own rights. If the peasants do not take their own rights themselves, it does not matter what kind of government comes to power, it will not give the peasants their rights. We hope that the new government which has come to power in Kurdistan will deliver the rights of the peasants first of all; that is, that it will lift all pressures on the peasants. These duties may be listed as follows:

1. To help the peasants get rid of the feudal lords and armed robbers. If the government really wishes to help the peasants, it will arm them and help them disarm the bloodsuckers and it will try all of those who have oppressed the peasants.

2. To eliminate rents and interest payments on debts and, in the case of small landowners, the government must take the burden of these payments upon itself.

3. To nationalize the land, water and resources in the possession of large landowners by allowing them to hold no more than the average amount going to the peasant. Increased amounts must be distributed free of charge to the peasants who are without land or whose holdings are very small.

4. All debts and interest debts owed by peasants to banks, cooperative companies and lenders must be cancelled.

5. To raise the prices of grains, other agricultural produce and farm products (oil, livestock, etc.) with the intention of preventing the peasants from going to the cities to seek jobs and encouraging them to work on their own land.

6. At the same time, prices of tea, sugar and other commodities must be reduced.

7. When there is a question of peasant children's performing military service, they must be trained in Kurdistan and not forced to go to other regions.

8. To establish factories and farms in Kurdistan in order that Kurdish workers not be forced to move to distant regions in order to make a living. Kurdistan must be developed on a par with the other regions of Iran.

9. Village affairs must be directed by the farmers and no city authority must interfere in these affairs except by the full approval of the peasants. Also, regional council directors must be elected by the local people. Region administrators and multiregion general administrators must be elected by the local city and village people. Those involved with village weaving affairs must have the trust of the village people. Lawmaking bodies authorized by the councils in a region must be formed by the participation of representatives which the peasants elect according to their percentage of the population of the entire region. If, for example, 50 percent of a region's population consists of peasants, 50 percent of the representatives must be from the villages.

10. The language of education in the schools and higher education must be Kurdish. Official bodies in Kurdistan must use Kurdish as both the spoken and written language in administrative correspondence. The expenses of farmers' children who attend middle-level schools and university must be met by the government.

11. The government, in cooperation with the farmers, must provide the people the following resources: roads, schools, public baths, energy generating plants, water mains, public health organizations, clinics and medical centers.

12. To provide interest-free credit to the peasants for the development of agriculture and farming.

13. The Kurdish masses must have the right to determine their own destiny and to plan their lives for the future. This means that: Local government which will operate in Kurdish regions must be composed of Kurdish workers and and must be supervised by them. Kurdish workers must live side by side with other workers of Iran, without inferior treatment of any kind, in fact, as brothers, not as master and servant as was once seen in relations between the communities.

Valued worker brothers! In the 13 items we have listed above, we have demanded that the new Iranian regime perform its duty vis-a-vis our farmer brothers and all Kurdish people. We have done this (demands presented to the government, translator's note) briefly and in summary. However, the farmers have gained the right (deserve, translator's note) more than this. Therefore, we will debate these demands and other demands which are the logical conclusion of these in broader detail in the future. And we will disseminate our views from person to person throughout Kurdistan. Also, we will cooperate with all groups and parties which support the workers and all of us will work together for the realization of our demands and to achieve our goals. It is the duty of all progressive and honorable groups to sacrifice and to struggle for the realization of workers' rights. We, like other world progressive and revolutionary forces, recognize the duty to submit to you our highest humanitarian sensibilities and to channel all our forces toward realization of your needs. Perhaps there may be those who tell us that your goals and purposes are a kind of idealism, but we say who could have imagined at this time last year that things could have changed in such an extraordinary fashion? We saw how the Shah's regime collapsed and how its grisly conformity was destroyed by the masses. The united front of the masses is capable of demolishing the filthy dungeons of the tyrants.

On the other hand, we know that "if we cannot survive the harsh winter, we will not see the fruit and flowers of spring in our gardens and orchards."

Workers,

Unite arm in arm in the city factories and on the farms.

Beloved worker brothers!

To achieve our goals, we must strive to the utmost and move forward immediately. While demanding fulfillment of our demands from the government on the one hand, at the same time we will marshal our forces to seize our rights on the other. The most urgent duties ahead which our revolutionary worker brothers have already begun are these:

1. To organize peasant units in every region in the spirit of the Merivan revolutionary peasants in order to defend all villages and all farmers.

2. Landless farmers are confronted -- more than anyone else -- by the excessive repression of the feudal lords. This is why they hate the feudal lords more than anyone else. It is their right (landless peasants, translator's note) to make the large feudal lands public property and use them for themselves and other landless farmers. It is their duty to support them (landless peasants, translator's note) in every way possible, to unite the others against the influence of the feudal lords and to encourage and persuade them to struggle beside their farmer brothers. This means that the only way to advance is to join with the landless peasants.

3. It seems that the enemies of the peasants are armed, so the peasants must be armed also in order to be prepared to defend themselves. We must demand that the city councils, the gendarmerie stations and the army barracks provide us weapons. Moreover, it is very important in fact that the peasants buy weapons whenever their strength is sufficient or, if the village residents prefer, they can buy weapons for their own self-defense.

4. Many of the city people, such as city workers, most of the teachers, professionals and shopkeepers, support the farmers and workers and are ready to work together with our organizations to help us.

5. Infiltration of peasant units and influence over them by collaborators will be prevented. Their kind are only trying to get into the units in order to be agents for the tyrants. The feudal lords and some reactionary, collaborationist mullahs have launched a formidable campaign to prevent the farmers from uniting and especially from uniting with the progressive forces in the cities, spreading such groundless rumors as "They are atheists and communists" and the like. But the wise and experienced worker will know by their deeds and actions who is friend and who is foe.

The tyrants cannot cover up their exploitation and cruelty with these lies and groundless rumors.

Long live the tillers of the soil and the landless peasants!

Victory belongs to the armed struggle of the peasants and landless peasants!

Down with feudal lords and lackeys!

ARMY REVAMPS REGULATIONS, FALLAHI REVIEWS POSTURE

Bahonar on Reform Measures

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 16 Sep 80 p 12

[Text] Hojjatoleslam Dr Mohammad Javad Bahonar, following the publication of the Revolutionary Council's report on the afternoon of the day before yesterday, participated in a press and radio/television interview. In answering the questions put to him by reporters, he talked about the procedures of the purge and the attempts to attract people to government employment as well as Iran's foreign policy, the activities of the Reconstruction Crusade and the Mostaz'afin Foundation, wage increases for workers, attracting unemployed manpower to cooperatives and the work of the Revolutionary Council for the benefit of the downtrodden people. He said: So far, in the area of education, thousands have been purged and 14,000 people have been retired. In the armed forces, first 7,997 people were purged, but later, after investigations, 829 were reinstated. And in other ministries, those who were purged or retired are as follows: In the Ministry of Justice, 312 Freemason and other judges; in the Ministry of Post, Telegraph, and Telephone, 2,000 people were retired and 600 purged; in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 798 out of 1,600 personnel were purged; in the Ministry of Energy, 600; in the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare, 800 were purged; in the Ministry of State, 491 were retired, 151 were purged, and 35 people were bought out.

Hojjatoleslam Bahonar said, in another part of his talk, that some of the standards for purging have not been clear and some individuals have been purged for no reason. Concerning the revamping and other undertakings in the armed forces, he said that the most important activities carried out in connection with the armed forces are in the 13 following areas:

1. A new office, the Office of Political Ideology, was established in the joint headquarters of the armed forces, which will work to raise the cultural level of the Islamic revolution and Islamic ideology within the armed forces.

2. The ranks of General and Lieutenant General were abolished.

3. The retirement of all chiefs of the armed forces.

4. Expansive purging within the armed forces.

5. Many acts of discrimination in the armed forces were stopped.

6. The use of privates as servants and physical punishment were abolished.

7. The standards for command were changed.

8. Islamic societies were formed in the armed forces.

9. Meetings for religious sermons have become common.

10. The monthly activities of the armed forces were changed to harmonize with the Islamic revolution.

11. All arms and colonial contracts were nullified.

12. An office for industrial research was created within the Ministry of Defense.

13. A plan for a people's army with an ideology.

Premium Pay Rules

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 16 Sep 80 p 12

[Text] Premium pay and benefits for military personnel of the armed forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran were determined and announced to the Ministry of National Defense of the Islamic Republic of Iran. In accordance with the legislative bill, the premium pay for military personnel eligible according to the employment law of the armed forces, although there has been no change in the wage charts, is as follows:

Enlisted Soldier, Gendarme, and Policeman Third Class, 12,500 rials per month; enlisted Private First Class, Gendarme First Class, and Policeman Second Class: 12,700 rials per month;

Corporal and Policeman First Class: 13,850 rials per month; Sergeant Third Class and Police Officer Third Class: 16,000 rials; Sergeant Second Class and Police Officer Second Class 17,500 rials; Sergeant First Class and Police Officer First Class: 18,000; WOJG: 20,000 rials; CWO: 22,000 rials.

In accordance with this legislative bill, which was approved as a single article in one of the last sessions of the Revolutionary Council of the Islamic Republic of Iran, there will be a 15 percent increase of the premium pay of other grades whose total monthly salary and benefits are less than 80,000 rials, provided that the total does not then exceed 80,000 rials.

Also, the premium pay of the groups of the above mentioned military grades who work in the offices of the central administration has been set at a rate of 10 percent less than the above mentioned figures. In addition, the premium pay of those persons who work in technical fields has been set at 5 percent less than the above figures.

The report states that the benefits and premium pay of those individuals who serve in areas of disturbance will be 10 percent and those serving in war zones 20 percent above the aforementioned premiums and benefits, when applicable.

Also, in accordance with the bill passed by the Revolutionary Council of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the amendment to Chart No 3, Article 1 of the wage and benefit law for the personnel of the armed forces is nullified, and ranking officers and the above mentioned will benefit from this legislative bill.

Also, it has been reported that in the legislative bill concerning the daily premium pay for personnel who participate in military activities within the country, following the approval of the Revolutionary Council of Iran, the phrase "to each ranking officer and pilot of the armed forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran" has been changed to: "to each of the personnel of the armed forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran."

In accordance with this legislative bill, all personnel of the armed forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran who participates in military activities inside the country will be paid for every day of their active participation on the basis of a wage factor of 9 in addition to the daily premium which they will receive.

The daily military action premium for a private will be calculated on a basis of one and one-half the wage factor. Also, no sum will be deducted from the premium pay for food and lodging. This law is to be implemented from 3/21/79 [1/1/58]. The kind and period of military action will be determined by the joint armed forces of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Observations of General Fallahi

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 15 Sep 80 p 16

[Interview with General Fallahi by Mahmud Hojrat]

[Excerpts] [Question] General Fallahi, why is the news of the skirmishes in the west of the country and along the Iraqi border not reported clearly and precisely; in other words, why are the facts always hidden? What is your response to this problem?

[Answer] The facts concerning the country's borders and the internal areas are conveyed. However, they are conveyed a little later. The reason is that at times, the problems are vague. Sometimes reports come from various areas. At the present time, we do not have a centralized information system to direct and supervise the information. At the same time, everybody and every organization in an area, whether responsible or not, immediately sends reports about border incidents or incidents this side of the border. As a result, collecting these reports, coordinating them, and receiving the true report is sometimes delayed a few days. The delay is partly due to the numerous centers who are not responsible and who know nothing about the problem but who send these reports, at times disturbing and confusing the public. Consequently, in order to clarify things for the public and to give them accurate news, we have to collect information for two or three days after an incident. The news must be recorded, evaluated, and interpreted; then, it should be translated into information. And there should be an information center from which we can give accurate news to the people. Of course, sometimes there are communication problems as well. For example, in the border regions, the brothers of the pasdaran, gendarmery, or military are scattered in groups along the border. At times, there are no real communication facilities for sending precise news. At the present time, we have these problems, but we do not intend--God forbid--to give incorrect news to the people. As I have mentioned, the alert conscience of the people refuses to accept inaccurate news.

[Question] General Fallahi, having in mind the six conspiracies discovered among the military thusfar, have you devised a system for strict control and prevention of probable future conspiracies?

[Answer] There are two ways to eliminate conspiracies. One is to neutralize a conspiracy; another is to find its roots and to take steps to eliminate the breeding ground for conspiracies. Neutralizing conspiracies is a temporary solution. It requires an extensive information system which at the present time the people of Iran will not accept, because of the bitter memories they have of the former military counter-intelligence system and of SAVAK. At the same time, the people of Iran believe that there should exist a people's informational organization. At the present time, conspiracies are mostly discovered by responsible, faithful military personnel who believe in the ideology. On the whole, these conspiracies are discovered from within the armed forces and then neutralized. In certain other instances, we have received outside help. But the most essential thing is to eliminate the breeding ground for conspiracies, which is partly the result of discrimination and inequality in the military. A series of steps bas been taken to reorganize the armed forces, which has been done from within. Of course, this work requires sufficient time, because reorganization from within is a difficult task, which, when it is finished, will eliminate all breeding grounds for conspiracies and then we will not have to search to discover and neutralize them. Instead, this reorganization will be accomplished, and when it is instigated from within, and on the whole, existing inequalities are uprooted, there will be no excuse for conspiracies and we will not have to discover and neutralize them.

[Question] General Fallahi, it has been said that military spare parts are indirectly obtained from the United States. What do you have to say in this regard? In any case, since most of our military equipment is American made, what will you do to ensure that spare parts will be obtained?

[Answer] The first part of your question, that we receive our requirements from the United States, I deny and reject.

Since the victory of the revolution, we have not received any parts in any form directly or indirectly from the United States. But we have received a series of minor, small parts from free world markets and non-aligned countries, whose intentions are less exploitive, and that amount is insignificant. But what have we done? We have had somewhat of a stock from the previous regime, which had spent much of this nation's money and had bought many spare parts which are readily available in storage. And these spare parts will be available for some time to come. Another area concerns those vehicles which, because of age and use, are unrepairable--a problem which exists in all the armies of the world. We have used parts from unusable vehicles and have met our needs in this manner. Of course, I do not deny our material needs. But the spiritual needs of the military personnel are much stronger. That is to say, we must try to eliminate discrimination and inequality within the armed forces and have a truly ideologically Islamic, monotheistic people's army and attain a state of internal purity, where internal complexes are released and as a result our spirits are not merely not weakened but strengthened. But we have a number of difficulties concerning living and welfare facilities, the most important of which is housing. During the despised previous regime, several times there was talk of creating a collective residence for military personnel, but none of these plans were completed. The despised previous regime proved that it could not even afford to create a housing complex. As a result, in the military, too, certain housing complexes were started and at the present time, even though it has been 18 months since the victory of the revolution, they are still uncompleted. The problem that we have had is due to the fact that the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development had been responsible for the supervision of the completion of military buildings, which, during the last 18 months, has fallen into the clutches of bureaucracy. We went to the president, who was kind enough to transfer the supervision over to the military. Since a short time ago, we have begun work on the unfinished buildings. At the present time, however, 7 percent of the ground forces have military housing but 93 percent do not. In certain cases, the families of two ranking officers share one room in Dasht-e Azadegan. Building housing for the remaining 93 percent will require much money, which has not been allowed for in this year's budget. But, some funds have been put at our disposal to finish the incomplete buildings. When these unfinished buildings are completed, part of our problems will be solved. Recently, the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development has put 25 billion rials at the disposal of the Ministry of Defense to be given to the military through Sepah Bank. With this money, an organization has been created within the Ministry of Defense. But with my experience of 29 years in the service, I do not think that the military can do without using heavy equipment such as artillery, tanks, airplanes, and helicopters, although we are using similar equipment in our training, which has reduced the workload of such equipment to a certain extent. For example, instead of teaching the personnel to drive on the tanks, we use trucks.

And we have been successful to a certain extent Some of the rapidly consumed parts are difficult to produce domestically. But if we get involved in a war, we must change the nature of the war. That is, it will be the nation who will fight, not merely the military. For this reason, a mobilization organization has been formed and the military supports the arming and training of the mobilization organization, which is that very army of 20 million. If there is a war in the region, and if this war is an extended one, we will seek help from these mobilized forces and all the people. And we will change the nature of war. That is, we will emphasize night battle. We have presently begun night training in order to prepare for night operations, to be safe from invading planes. We will also carry out an irregular war through the people and the army, that is, through preventive operations and disruptive operations. We will change the nature of war from its regular, geometrical form. And if the war lasts only a few months, we will have no problems concerning spare parts. On the other hand, if we cannot finish the work of the mobilization organization and if we are soon involved in a regional war where we have to use airplanes, war ships, tanks and artillery, we would certainly face difficulties concerning spare parts.

[Question] Can the problems between Iran and Iraq and the frequent border skirmishes only be solved militarily, or is it possible to resolve them through political and diplomatic channels?

[Answer] The Islamic Republic of Iran will not tolerate the interference of the Iraqi Ba'th government and it will not compromise with a government which is not genuine. If Iraq would not allow its borders to be crossed, for sure, we would not have the border problems we do now. Iraq allows, encourages, and even helps people to enter and exit from its borders and still expects the Iranian revolution to be confined to Iranian territory. All its efforts are expended in trying to bridle the Iranian revolution here in the center of the Islamic Republic of Iran and to prevent its spread. Of course, the Iranian revolution is genuinely Godly. It is not merchandise to be exported. But the Iranian revolution will spread. Iraq's efforts are futile. This process is not artificial. This is an internal matter, a matter of beliefs. Iraq's attempts may postpone its spread a little. But it will spread and one day the Iraqi government will explode. When that day will be cannot be predicted.

HELICOPTER PROPOSED TO SERVE FUTURE DEFENSE NEEDS

Tel Aviv MA'ARAKHOT in Hebrew Feb 80 pp 6-9

[Article, first of three in this issue: "The Attack Helicopter and Defense Objectives"]

[Text] The profile of war is a subject mired in controversy, and it is difficult to find agreement about it. But we must consider the possibility, as we examine the profile of war as the basis for developing the military, that the IDF will have to fight in a very difficult situation. It must, therefore, be built in such a way as to stand up to such conditions and assure that in its time of trial, it will be the one to determine the course of the war. Emerging from this assumption is a war profile in which the IDF is taken by surprise, its reserve forces, the major part of the IDF, have not yet been called up, and battles are breaking out on several fronts at once.

The Next War in the Eyes of the Arabs

Ever since the Yom Kippur War, Arab publications have been enlarging on the possibility that another war will break out. Many Arab commentators have been trying to analyze events of 1973, learn lessons from them, and draw the scenario of the next war. Most of the scenarios emphasize the following points:

--Surprise: Just as Israel was taken by surprise in the past, so it can be surprised in the future.

--Concentration of forces: Israel bases its strength on its reserves. We must, therefore, strike immediately at the beginning of the war with the greatest possible force, before Israel can recruit its full forces.

--Relations with political powers are working to the advantage of the Arabs: Israel is limited in its activities while the Arabs enjoy a freedom of political activity which stems from their control over oil supplies. This freedom will allow the Arabs to carry out a limited military operation whose objective is: "disturbance of the faith in the doctrine of Israeli security by some kind of conquest in the region."

The Syrian JAYSH AL-SHA'B of November 1977 describes it as follows: "Two clear facts have emerged from the events of October 1973 in the Middle East: the great effectiveness of the antitank missiles and the surprise attack of the Arabs which confused the Israelis. There is no doubt that in the future, this kind of surprise attack, which deceived Israeli and American intelligence, must be uppermost in the thoughts of the attacking nation." In another Syrian publication (AL-MAJALLAH AL-'ASKARIYAH, November 1976), the following was said on the same subject: "The October War represented a very important landmark in the Middle East conflict, and its lessons represented a turning point in the development of the Arab armies. To date, 3 years after the war, it is up to the Arabs to effect these changes by means of training and troop exercises before the next round; from the point of view of consequences for the region, the October War was a tie and did not bring about a decisive victory. As long as there is no decisive victory in Palestine, these rounds of war will continue." The Arab commentator al-Ayyubi, in his talk published in the Lebanese AL-USBU' AL-'ARABI of October 1977, also agrees that it is possible to repeat the surprise element in the Yom Kippur War. "Perhaps Israel will be caught off guard as it was on Yom Kippur because Israel believes that the Arabs are again not united and incapable of deciding to wage another war."

How will the Arabs carry out their assault? The Syrian AL-MAJALLAH AL-'ASKARIYAH (16 November 1976) sees a massive attack operation whose purpose will be to saturate the battlefield with arms and manpower. This attack will be based on armor and boosted by tactical surprise of time and place. The armor and the Syrian [armored infantry] would have air cover based in antiaircraft guns and missiles which would advance together quickly with the land forces. The English commentator, Steven Rosen, emphasizes (in a study published in the publication INTERNATIONAL SECURITY No 2, 1978) that "the 1973 war demonstrated that the combination of land-to-air missiles and antiaircraft guns like the SA-2, SA-3, SA-6, SA-7 and ZSU-23x4 can cause many losses and lessen the effectiveness of air power which is trying to aid the land forces and/or can work to disrupt the enemy's ranks. Short range antiaircraft missiles like the Stinger, the Blowpipe and the SA-7 will be used in large quantities in the fifth war." The Syrian AL-MAJALLAH AL-'ASKARIYAH emphasizes this point: "The Syrian army must cancel out the Israeli air superiority and limit the fighting to two dimensions only."

What will be the outcome of the Arab assault? The Arabs themselves know that a "final" victory over Israel is not yet within their reach. But, "as long as the Arabs, in contrast to Israel, enjoy political freedom which allows them to carry out hostile acts, their tactical capability is superior to Israel's conventional strength (JAYSH AL-SHA'B, 16 November 1977). The British commentator, Rosen, develops the argument that the next Middle East war will have a political rather than a military character. "It is worth pointing out that if the Arabs decide to go to war, it is reasonable to assume that it won't be out of a calculation to achieve decisive victory.... One can expect that the Arabs will seek a few local victories in specific campaigns.... They can rely on the fact that the great powers will bring about a ceasefire to prevent the total destruction of the Arab armies. The professional military men... will be forceful in demanding limited and attainable war objectives which will give them credit for future bargaining."

And, more specifically, the Arab armies will develop their strategy "around a number of symbolic objectives. Such goals as the following are likely to be included: ...conquest again of the slopes of the Hermon or the hills near Qunaytirah; bombing of Dimona; or even some specific and minor but symbolic penetration beyond the green line. It doesn't matter if the victory is great or permanent. What is important is the feeling that the Arabs are advancing, however slowly."

A Preemptive Strike

It is generally accepted, as leaders in Israel and high-ranking officers in the IDF have said, that Israel cannot afford to lose territory in a war, because, apart from the blow to morale that such an event would bring, every lost piece of territory would be a bargaining card in the political negotiations after the war.

This approach suggests the possibility of solving the problem of loss of territory through the option of a preemptive strike. The Arabs, like various observers outside of Israel, are aware of the fact that Israel, if it can spot signs of an approaching Arab attack, is likely to strike a preemptive blow. However, given international pressures, there are those who are doubtful about Israel's ability to decide to make a preemptive strike. In the Lebanese publication AL-USBU' AL-'ARABI (11 July 1977), the argument is presented that Israel will not be able to start a war, stick with it, and achieve positive results if the United States does not agree. The United States will not agree, for fear that the war would hurt its own interests. Every additional piece of territory conquered by Israel will create new security problems, and will arouse international public opinion. For the world demands a retreat from the territories captured in 1967. This kind of aggression will also bring into play the weapons of oil which could result in the Western world being brought to economic collapse." The British commentator, Rosen, believes that, in contrast to what happened in 1973, in the future, when the opening of the next round of war is certain, it is likely that "Israel will have to adopt the strategy of the first blow," but, in any case, it is reasonable to assume that the Arabs will try to open with an attack "in an effort to achieve both strategic and tactical surprise."

The accepted way of dealing with this kind of problem is to set up a strong line of defense based on obstacles and powerful forces which will stand ever ready to stop the enemy. But such a line of defense calls for a deployment of forces in the area to man the defenses. From Israel's vantage point of the "few against the many," where the major part of the fighting force of the IDF is located most of the year behind the lines and where the emergency fighters are also everyday citizens engaged in economics, industry, and agriculture between wars, it is not possible to maintain permanent forces which can stop a massive attack.

As a result of this, there is a need for advance warning which will allow them to call up the reserves. But the intelligence service warning, which is the logical one in such a situation, did not stand the test of reality in the past, and I believe that it is likely to fail in the future as well. In any case, I prefer that we prepare for the worst possibility from our perspective, and that is that we will fail once again. The concept of a massive line of defense has not proven itself in the past, nor do I recommend it as a solution for the future. Thus, in approaching the subject of developing the IDF and deciding about the proper balance between various types of fighting apparatus, we must develop a deterrent force which will keep the enemy from attaining its goals which are the following: swift control of territory, disruption of processes for organizing defenses as well as for organizing for attack.

The Answer--The Attack Helicopter

The Israeli Air Force can respond to the problem of defending the rear. It is the job of the interception system of the army. It can also, in my opinion, adapt itself to the demands for defense on the front. The deterrent force on the front must be a force with high mobility, a capability for destroying armored forces and for surviving, and all of this under front-line conditions. A look at the characteristics of the war equipment existing in the IDF today points to the fact that with such a profile, it would not do to base it on land forces which would be on the front line in time of surprise. And it would also be hard to base it on air power since the major part of this force will be busy defending the rear and preparing for attack. The cost of air restraint by means of attack planes for close support is high compared to the benefits, and there also exists the possibility that bad weather conditions would limit their potential activity.

The Attack Helicopter Is the Answer to the Problem of a Primary Restraint for Israel

The appearance of the helicopter altered the traditional clear-cut division of transport by land, water or air. It added a fourth to the above three dimensions--the hovering dimension. The hovering dimension differs from the three traditional dimensions in every respect. It gives the helicopter ability to wage a different contest depending on the features of the area and the existing field conditions in a modern war. By being, in essence, an instrument of flight, its advantage over the tank lies in its high mobility without having to depend on the passability of the territory, inits ability to lift up to a height which allows it a wide and deep field of vision, and by its skill in assuming different positions very rapidly. Its advantages over the plane are seen in its ability to fly at low altitudes (5 feet), at different speeds appropriate to the area, in its ability to hover and make use of the landscape and the cover to hide and to carry out ambushes, in its ability to stay at the front for long periods, to refuel, to be equipped in the area and thus remain in the battle zone without time limits, to remain near the forces, to receive (and transmit) the latest intelligence information, and to remain in direct communication with every element on the battlefield. In the absence of land forces (with whom it works), the helicopter can even operate independently.

In the past, it was assumed that the helicopter was vulnerable, and would not have a place on the modern battlefield. The myth of the vulnerable helicopter was already destroyed during the Six-Day War when helicopters carried out four major strike missions during the days of fighting, dozens of recovery missions from within enemy territory and from active battle zones, and hundreds of missions for the evacuation of wounded from the battlefield, and all of this without losing a single helicopter. And in the course of the war of attrition, dozens of missions were carried out across the border, and not a single helicopter was destroyed. And in the battles mentioned, the technique of ground contour flight (NOE) did not yet exist. This technique represents one of the major factors adding unequivocally to the survival capacity of the helicopter. The Vietnam War, in which thousands of missions were carried out by helicopter, serves frequently as an example of the low survival of the helicopter on the battlefield. But the facts about this war show an entirely different picture.

Total	15,050,194	1,985	1: 7,581	1106,752	363	1:3,048	1:2.48

Explanations:

The data in the foregoing table were taken from the numbers of missions recorded in the book, "The Air War in Indochina," pp 267-272. The number of missions was listed in the book under the heading, South Vietnam (that is, not including North Vietnam). I am assuming that this number represents the total number of missions carried out in Southeast Asia. The number of losses recorded in the book is divided into South Vietnam and North Vietnam. In the calculations, the ratio of missions (listed only for South Vietnam) to losses is only for South Vietnam. If the calculation had been done for losses of both North and South Vietnam, the ratio would be even more favorable for helicopters because helicopter losses in North Vietnam were insignificant because the number of flights was insignificant there. At the same time, losses of attack planes in the North were great as the following data show:

Year	Helicopter losses		Losses of attack planes		Comments
	South Vietnam	North Vietnam	South Vietnam	North Vietnam
1966	123	1	69	280
1967	260	4	73	326
1968	496	2	107	141
1969	459	-	68	2	End of the bombings in the north
1970	417	-	29	4
1971	230	-	17	6

Explanations:
Key dates.
End of 1968: Cessation of bombings in North Vietnam by the Americans.
End of 1973: Ceasefire.
End of 1975: Evacuation of the Americans from Vietnam

It turns out that a judicious use of the helicopter's advantages earns it a very high grade in terms of capacity for survival on the battlefield. The helicopter can fly low (under 50 feet) and slowly. It is also able to hover, to hide, and to make use of all kinds of features of the land and cover. This skill allows it to defend itself against heavy missiles and antitank armor coming from any direction. The helicopter can also hide, hover or slow down. This ability makes it possible for it to reveal the enemy and receive exact intelligence at the right time and to remain outside the region of light antiaircraft and to keep the enemy from discovering it.

The appearance of the long-range antitank missile allowed the helicopter to remain outside the danger zone (far away and low) but still influence the battlefield, and turned it into a lethal piece of equipment against the armored forces of the enemy. The combination of all these qualities, added to the capacity to carry out all the goals of restraint in a flight over our territory, turns the helicopter, under the conditions reigning in Israel, into a primary restraint for the IDF.

Helicopters on the Modern Battlefield

In looking at the helicopters which exist today in the armies of the world, we need to differentiate between two configurations: the heavy attack helicopter, armed with antitank missiles, a 20 mm gun, a 7.62 minigun, rockets, a 40 mm gun, and the light attack helicopter (antitank helicopter) armed only with antitank missiles. In Israel, the heavy helicopter is modeled after the Cobra of Bell Co.

Belonging to the heavy class are the YAH-64 (made by the Hughes Co), the future attack helicopter of the U.S. Army, the German-French PAH-2 (still in the planning stage), and the Augusta 129. The light helicopter is represented in Israel by the 500 MD of the Hughes Co. Also belonging there are the German BO-105 and the French Gazelle. The two approaches are being tested in the area. The parameters being tested now include: firepower, maneuverability, weight, cost, and so forth.

The Cobra helicopter which is now in our hands, is armed with 8 TOW missiles with a range of 3.57 km, a 20 mm gun with an effective range of 1,400 meters, rockets, a 400 gun, and a 7.62 minigun.

The mode of operation of the helicopters should be like the one proposed by the Americans. Colonel Miller of the U.S. Army proposes, in his article, "Air Superiority at the Height of the Treetops" (Cyclon 5, November 1979), a fit between reconnaissance helicopters, whose job is to pinpoint targets, and escort helicopters which will secure the battlefield and allow the attack helicopters to attack the armored forces of the enemy.

Low altitude flight is one of the chief components in the high survival capacity of the helicopter. In a ground contour flight, the problem of navigation is difficult and compounded when battle conditions make things even more difficult.

In order to give the attack helicopter a free hand on the front, the pilots have to know the area in which they are flying. The U.S. Army, which worries about restraining the masses of armored forces of the "Warsaw Pact" stretched along the border of the two Germanies, is attempting to apply a solution to fit the A-10 planes on the mainland (see MA'ARAKHOT, 269). These planes, which are designated to destroy enemy armored forces, have areas set aside for them from the outset. Every pilot practices, usually on a specific section, until he knows it well. In this way, the specific area becomes the pilot's "home base." He knows every tree and bush, and if he is sent out over targets in the area, he can find his way immediately without needing navigation or even communication. This kind of solution applies also to the operation of attack helicopters. Proper cooperation during the practice sessions with the forces in the area will also bring about a close relationship between the forces and the pilots in the squadron. The personal acquaintanceship and the shared language which will be developed contribute a lot to the consolidation of a powerful restraining force.

In summary: The special conditions of Israel which is fighting a battle of the few against the many require the establishment of a deterrent force which is mobile, has high survival capacity and can destroy armor. The attack helicopter is one of the most significant solutions to this challenge.

Just as the interceptor plane is the deterrent and defender of the rear, so is the antitank helicopter the primary deterrent force on the front. Thus, the contribution of the antitank helicopter to the front is like the contribution of the interceptor plane in the rear.

After the next war, when the statisticians relate and summarize the contribution of each force and section to the victory, it will be clear that while the major destroyer of tanks is still the tank gun, the primary deterrent force is the attack helicopter. It will prevent the enemy from conquering territory, allow the IDF to get organized, and allow the transfer of tank guns to take place. It will allow the air force to organize its attack and the interceptor force to defend the skies of the nation and attack the enemy on its territory.

POLL SURVEYS VIEWS ON EMIGRATION

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 15 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] The inclination toward emigration from Israel has increased about 1 percent since May. Of the total Jewish population aged 18 and over, 6.9 percent declare that they consider themselves candidates for emigration, and another 4.9 percent say they "might" emigrate. Overall, therefore, 11.8 percent are considering emigration. In May (HA'ARETZ, 16 May 1980), 10.9 percent declared that they wanted to emigrate. These are the findings of the nationwide public opinion poll of the Pori Institute sponsored by HA'ARETZ. To the question, "Do you or do you not consider yourself a candidate for emigration?" 6.9 percent answered yes, and another 4.9 percent answered maybe, which makes a total of 11.8 percent of the adult population.

Prominent among those declaring that they would definitely emigrate are younger persons, aged 18 to 29 (11.8 percent), native-born Israelis (9.8 percent), persons in academic and managerial occupations (8.6 percent), persons with below-average incomes (8.4 percent), persons with better education (8.0 percent), and persons of Asian or African origin (7.7 percent).

Of those polled, 38.6 percent said that they knew "people who intend to emigrate"; 18.8 percent have close relatives--sons, daughters, brothers, sisters, parents--who have emigrated, and another 5.6 percent have close relatives who intend to emigrate. That is to say, members of 24.4 percent of Israeli families have either emigrated or intend to emigrate.

Prominent among those declaring that close relatives had emigrated were long-time (pre-State) residents, persons with better education, persons in academic occupations, and white-collar workers.

But the majority of the public does not approve of emigration. To the additional question, Do you or do you not approve of emigration?", 68.7 percent answered no, while 22.1 percent answered yes. Another 5.2 percent said that approval or disapproval depended on the circumstances in each individual case. The remaining 4.2 percent had no opinion.

The director of the study, Pori manager Rafael Gil, points out that especially prominent among those approving of emigration are younger persons, aged 18 to 29 (31.2 percent), persons of Asian or African origin (27.4 percent), and manual workers (26.4 percent).

The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women who were interviewed personally in their homes in all areas of the country, with full preservation of privacy.

BRIEFS

DECLINE IN INVESTMENTS--In the first half of 1980 there was an actual decline in investments of about 20 percent. The decline is showing itself also in the implementation of investments and in long-range planning of investments. According to data of the investment center of the Ministry of Industry, Commerce, and Tourism, the total number of investment programs submitted for approval declined 31 percent. The number of new projects submitted for approval declined from 70 last year to only 44 this year. There was a more moderate decline in approvals of investment on additions to, and enlargements of existing projects, where there has been a 14 percent decline since the beginning of the year. Data on the import of investment equipment and the domestic manufacture of such equipment also indicate that in the first quarter of 1980 there was a decline of 10.2 percent. It is estimated that in the second quarter the slowdown in import and domestic manufacture of investment equipment increased, and that the actual decline in this branch will reach 20 percent compared to the same period last year. In the first 5 months of this year there was also a decline in the number of development loans approved and implemented, amounting to 25 percent. The deputy general manager of the Ministry of Industry, Commerce, and Tourism, Avraham Asheri, reported that the causes of the investment slowdown are the indexing of development loans, the credit freeze, and the prevailing uncertainty concerning the condition of the domestic market. Mr Asheri said that the decline in investments must give concern to those who are planning on an increase in exports in the coming years. He pointed out that in the long run, an increase in exports and a change in imports are possible only through the implementation of new investments, and that there is no doubt that the major portion of the accelerated growth of exports this year is due to the maturing of investments of recent years. POLL ON TERRORISM--Two-thirds of the Israeli public is opposed to a terror-against-terror system in the hands of nongovernment Jewish organizations, while one-fourth of the public supports such activity; this was learned from a nationwide public opinion poll of the Pori Institute sponsored by HA'ARETZ. To the question, "Do you favor or oppose a Jewish terrorist system in the hands of nongovernment Jewish organizations as a reaction to hostile activities of the Arabs of the Occupied Areas?" 67.4 percent answered no, while 23.9 percent answered yes. Another 2.1 percent were ready to support terror-against-terror under specific conditions, such as: if only those who injure us are injured, if this is the only way to put an end to Arab terror, and depending on world reaction. The remaining 6.6 percent had no opinion on the subject. The director of the study, Pori manager Rafael Gil, points out that support for the terror-against-terror system was especially high (32.4 percent) among persons of Asian or African origin, in contrast to 16.4 percent of persons of European or American origin. Greater opposition was recorded among persons of better education, persons in academic and managerial occupations, and long-time residents of Israel. Within these population levels, opposition to Jewish terror was close to 80 percent. The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women in their homes in all areas of the country, with full preservation of privacy. [Text] [Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 12 Aug 80 p 3] 9045

PEACE POLL--A plurality of the Israeli public (47.8 percent) is of the opinion that the Begin government is not qualified to complete the peace-making process; this was learned from a nationwide public opinion poll of the Pori Institute sponsored by HA'ARETZ. A response of 34.6 percent indicated that the government is qualified. Another 6.8 percent said that the matter depends on particular factors, such as what the Arab position will be, whether the government will remain in power for another term, the state of Mr Begin's health, and whether the Begin government will be more flexible and less fanatical in its positions. The remaining 10.8 percent had no opinion. Prominent among those who consider the Begin government unqualified are persons with better education (55.4 percent), persons in managerial and academic occupations (56.1 percent), persons of higher income (55.2 percent), persons of European and American origin (56.3 percent), and long-time (pre-State) residents (51.5 percent). The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women. [Text] [Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 11 Aug 80 p 3] 9045

POLL ON PRIME MINISTER--A majority (52 percent) of the Israeli public is of the opinion that Prime Minister Menahem Begin cannot continue in office in the present state of his health, it is reported in a national public opinion poll of Pori Institute sponsored by HA'ARETZ; 35 percent said that he was able to continue; 2.4 percent said that the matter depended on the actions of the other government ministers, "if they don't aggravate him," and on the decisions of the physicians; and 10.4 percent had no opinion. Prominent among those believing that the prime minister is unable to continue in office are persons in academic and managerial occupations, of whom 59.1 percent held this opinion; persons with higher income (59 percent); persons with better education (55.6 percent); and persons of European or American origin (58.3 percent). Prominent among those believing that he is able to continue are persons of Asian and African origin (41.9 percent), persons with less education (40 percent), and persons aged 18-29 (38.2 percent). The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women. [Text] [Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 4 Aug 80 p 3] 9045

POLL ON WEIZMAN--A majority of the Israeli public (53.7 percent) would like Ezer Weizman to return to the post of minister of defense; this was learned from a nationwide public opinion poll of the Pori Institute sponsored by HA'ARETZ. Another 33.1 percent do not want him in this post; 2.2 percent said that they would like to see Weizman back at his post, but "not in this government"; the remaining 11 percent had no opinion. Prominent among those wanting Weizman to return were persons of low income (60.0 percent), manual workers (59.3 percent) and persons of Asian and African origin (58.3 percent). Prominent among those not wanting him to return were persons with better education (40.7 percent) and in academic and managerial occupations (40.9 percent). Women favored Weizman's return (60.3 percent) much more than men (47.2 percent). The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women. LEBANON-ARAB LEAGUE DIFFERENCES REVIVED OVER ABORTIVE KLIBI VISIT

LD181557 Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 16 Sep 80 p 1, 19

[Fatin Hamawi report: "Acute Crisis Between Lebanon and the Arab League: Lebanese Foreign Ministry Refuses To Receive Chedli Klibi"]

[Excerpts] Beirut--A dispute between the Lebanese authorities and the Arab League has resulted in Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi's being prevented from visiting Lebanon.

This was confirmed in one way or another by official sources in Beirut. AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM is certain that the secretary general was indeed prevented from going to Lebanon last Thursday.

The details so far available on this subject, whispered in Arab diplomatic circles, are as follows:

Last Thursday night, the Lebanese foreign ministry received a cable to the effect that Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi was on his way to Beirut by air. A few minutes later, it was discovered that Klibi's plane, which was expected at Beirut airport, did not land but proceeded eastward and landed in Damascus. The departments concerned began inquiring what had happened. It transpired that Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus had instructed officials to cancel Klibi's visit because relations with the Arab League were not very good. Everybody was surprised by this behavior, which led to a crisis. Mediation to resolve the crisis have failed so far, in view of the fact that Minister Butrus's decision came in the wake of a violent Lebanese political and propaganda campaign against the Arab League. The campaign started especially when the PLO called for an emergency meeting of the joint Arab Defense Council. The Lebanese Foreign Ministry strongly objected to convening the defense council on the pretext that the PLO, by calling for the council meeting, was encroaching on the Lebanese Foreign Ministry's jurisdiction and interfering in Lebanon's affairs.

Lebanese political and PLO officials were waiting for the Arab League secretary general last Thursday when it was discovered that he would not be arriving in Beirut. Soon afterward, late on Thursday night, PLO executive committee chairman Yasir 'Arafat left for Damascus and met Klibi, contrary to news sources' belief and to Lebanese official information media broadcasts. 'Arafat returned early Friday morning. This crisis related to Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi's visit to Lebanon has led to the reemergence of Arab-Lebanese disputes over the role of the Arab League, the role of the Arab states in helping Lebanon and the Lebanese official attitude to developments in the area.

Before Chedli Klibi was due to visit Beirut, an intensive campaign was launched against Klibi's envoy to Lebanon Hammadi al-Sayd. Lebanese official circles accused the Arab League of failing in its duty to Lebanon and of failing to make tangible efforts to resolve the Lebanese crisis in a serious manner. Certain information media linked to official circles on the one hand and to the Phalangist Party on the other also accused the Arab League of plotting against Lebanon and encouraging Palestinian armed presence in Lebanon.

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM SEEN AS INCREASING PROSPECTS FOR BALANCED DEVELOPMENT

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 26 Jul 80 p 28

[Article by Fath al-Rahman Mahjub: "The Sudan Begins Political Decentralization Experiment! Division of the Country Into Six Provinces With Separate Governments and Assemblies; Development of Sudanese Transportation to Accompany New Political and Administrative Changes"]

[Text] The Sudanese National People's Assembly has passed some new constitutional amendments with the approval of the president. According to these amendments, the country will be divided into five regions, in addition to the southern region which gained autonomy in 1972. Each region will become autonomous with its own regional government and legislative assembly. With this move, Sudan has voluntarily chosen to change from a centralized state to a federation of six units--a remarkable step in a world in which slogans of unity contend with slogans of partition among the citizens of the same nation.

But what will this renunciation of centralized government lead to?

This question came up as soon as the decision-makers started working on a formula to establish the Sudan's internal borders and define the characteristics and boundaries of its various economic, administrative and political structures at the regional level. Moreover, this took place at a time when factors for unity and reconciliation were being much discussed, especially at the national level.

Now, six new regions are being established based on the constitution. Originally, there were to have been five regions: a western region, a northern region, an eastern region and a central region, in addition to the existing southern region. However, the proposed western region leaned toward division into two sections, probably due to historical and emotional considerations embraced by the inhabitants of the region when the issue was raised before the national conference of the Sudanese Socialist Union early this year. Thus, the proposed western region became two regions, Darfur and Kurdufan.

The constitutional amendments stipulate that "the establishment of regional government shall not involve any encroachment on the unity of the Sudan or its economy, the freedom of movement of citizens and of services and goods by rail, or the national government's conduct of affairs relating to sovereignty, national defense, national security, foreign affairs and other areas of responsibility defined by law." Moreover, the provisions of national legislation take precedence over regional legislation "to an extent which eliminates any conflict between them."

In response to a question by AL-MUSTAQBAL, Minister of Culture and Information Dr Isma'il al-Haj Musa stated that regional government compounds and augments the responsibility of existing organizations to maintain contact with the masses on both the local and national levels through all cultural and informational channels "in order to reinforce common national feeling and strengthen the fabric of national unity." This is because the division of a country into regions out of economic and administrative necessity can produce the opposite results if racial or tribal prejudices are awakened.

The main forces which influence the Sudanese do not fit into the framework of the traditional kinds of conflicts which develop within a state of equilibrium--conflicts involving peripheral considerations ranging from economic factors all the way to foreign influence which generates conflicts between Copts and Moslems, Arabs and non-Arabs, and Sunnis and Shiites.

Perhaps it is this fact which prompted Isma'il al-Haj Musa to follow up his emphasis on the importance of coordinating the impact of communication, which ties the different regions of the Sudan together, by stressing the need "to develop and stimulate local cultures so that they can plan their full roles in fashioning the Sudanese national culture."

This diversity on the geographical map of the Sudan is accompanied by a great disparity in physical appearance, tastes, means of livelihood, and modes of thought and behaviour. For example, the Sudan includes representatives of all the major language groups in Africa, with the exception of the (Khubabsan) language group of South Africa. There are about 500 local languages which belong to these main language groups, and these are united by a single common language, which is Arabic. The use of Arabic in this role extends even to the southern region, which colonialism sought for a long time to dissociate from the north which has been more influenced by Arabic and Islam.

Whether the reasons for the conflict which compelled Sudan to adopt regional administration are primarily economic, social or historical in nature, a regionalization process must be accompanied by material safeguards in order to become a motive for unity and cohesion--aside from giving each region the opportunity to pursue its own course in developing its resources and culture and governing itself within the general framework. Perhaps one of these safeguards is the strengthening of the means of communication at the technical level--the areas have been connected by a microwave and ground satellite system for some time--as well as developing the means of transportation.

The vastness of the areas of the country, the low population density and the inadequacy of the means of transportation have helped to maintain those differences which have characterized Sudan's regions. Authorized sources in the Ministry of Transportation told AL-MUSTAQBAL that work is now in progress on the development of the means of transportation to go along with the new political and administrative changes, especially since the demands of the big development projects constitute a burden on the transportation capacity at a time when complete balance in the overall distribution of these projects throughout the regions has not yet been fully achieved. This is one of the reasons which have made these projects a national treasure which is not the sole possession of the region in which specific projects are established.

BOURGUIBA CALLS SPECIAL SESSION OF CONGRESS IN 1981

[Article: "President Bourguiba Sets the Party's Special Congress for Spring 1981"]

[Text] President Bourguiba met with Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali yesterday morning at the Essaada Palace in La Marsa; after the meeting, Mzali made the following statement:

"Because of the importance that the supreme combattant places on the next decade for the decisive orientation of the country towards economic prosperity and socio-cultural progress, and in order to assure real invulnerability, as the next 5-year plan is important in this program, and considering the chief of state's concern to have the party cadres think along the lines of this plan, President Bourguiba has decided to call a special session of Congress of the Destourien Socialist Party for the spring of 1981.

"The main goal of this congress is to study the major elements of the 5-year plan as well as the means by which this plan will meet with psychological and human success, so that Tunisia might reach a new level on its way to realizing its developmental objectives during the next decade."

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED FOLLOWING ITALIAN MINISTER'S VISIT

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 3 Sep 80 pp 1,4

[Article: "Toward Re-examination of the Cooperation in Fishing Matters"]

[Text] Following Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs Emilio Colombo's visit to Tunisia, this communique was published:

In response to Tunisia's Minister of Foreign Affairs Hassan Belkhoja's invitation, Emilio Colombo made an official and friendly visit to Tunisia from 31 August 2 September 1980.

Mr Colombo had an audience with His Excellence Habib Bourguiba, president of the Republic of Tunisia. He met with Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali.

During the conversations, which took place in an atmosphere of warm friendship and of mutual confidence, the two ministers and their collaborators proceeded to an exchange of exhaustive views on bilateral agreements and international questions of common interest. They gave particular attention to the promotion of bilateral realtions, expressed their satisfaction concerning their efficient development, as well as with their collaboration in all areas. They agreed to a more involved Italian participation in the Tunisian development effort of the Sixth Plan. They also agreed to promote industrial cooperation between the two countries, thereby favoring a technological transfer.

An ad hoc committee will meet in the near future to study the different aspects of financial cooperation between the two countries: the amount, means of payment, and conditions.

--Tunisia Must Keep its Interests in Mind While Negotiations for the Enlargement of the CEE (Communaute Economiqne Europeenne) Goes On

The two ministers also agreed that a mixed group of experts would meet during the month of October 1980 to examine the new basis of cooperation between the two countries in fishing matters.

The two ministers also examined the problems of Tunisian nationals in Italy and Italian nationals in Tunisia, and agreed that negotiations would begin as soon as possible towards conclusion of an agreement on social security and a convention on manpower.

The commission appointed 16 May 1979 will meet to examine the results of the work of sectorial committees already cited and to adopt the necessary decisions early in 1981 in Rome.

The two ministers closely studied the relationships of Tunisia with the EEC and agreed upon an efficient course of action which would permit Tunisian agricultural and industrial products to be sold more easily throughout the Common Market. The two parties also agreed that it is of the utmost importance to take Tunisian interests into consideration during negotiations concerning the expansion of the Community.

The two ministers then proceeded to an exchange of views on the most important international problems.

Their exchange of views resulted in great agreement on most of the questions discussed. The two ministers thus decided to intensify the rhythm of their political consultations in the future.

--Middle-Eastern Conflict: Toward a Global Solution

The discussions dealt especially with the multiplication of crisis areas in the world, especially in the Mediterranean, in the Middle East, in Africa and in Asia, and on the current deterioration of the international climate.

The two parties agreed on the necessity to bring about peaceful solutions to the conflicts, all the while fully respecting the rights of both the peoples and the countries to peace, as well as to the independence and sovereign choice of means of development protected from all foreign intervention or meddling.

As for the Mediterranean, the two parties indicated the price they attach to the maintenance of stability and security in this region. In this respect, they emphasized that security and cooperation of Europe. This is why they feel it is necessary to pursue dialog between Europe and the Mediterranean border countries which did not sign the Helsinki pact.

The two parties hope then, that the Mediterranean non-European countries can play their due role during the next meeting in Madrid.

The two ministers also agreed that Tunisia and Italy will take the same stance on bilateral and multilateral affairs in the fight against pollution and for the ecological protection of the Mediterranean.

Closely examining the Middle East situation, the two parties reaffirmed the necessity to reach a global solution for this conflict which would consider all the essential aspects of the problem and which would recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people for self-determination, and would demand Israel's retreat from all 1967 occupied Arab Territories, including Jerusalem, on the basis of pertinent UN resolution principles.

They denounce any unilateral action which aims to modify the statute of Jerusalem.

The two ministers emphaiszed that the Palestinian question, which constitutes the essence of the Near East crisis, should be resolved with the participation of the PLO at the negotiations.

The two ministers also expressed their uneasiness over the event in Central Asia, particularly the latest developments in Afghanistan, which brought a serious blow to the politics of detente and which could lead to grave dangers for international peace. They feel that it is important, in order to resolve this crisis, to scrupulously respect pertinent UN resolutions and the principles of the UN Charter.

As for the situation in Southern Africa, the two ministers congratulated one another on Zimbabwe's independence and repeated their condemnation of apartheid politics and racial discrimination in South Africa and Nambia.

In addition, the two parties emphasized the importance they attach to European-Arab dialog, and agreed that they greatly hope to pursue this form of regional cooperation and to confirm all the components, including the political dimensions. In this respect it was decided that Italy and Tunisia should make a concerted effort to give this dialog new verve.

The two ministers expressed their satisfaction with the results of the visit. Mr Colombo expressed his gratitude for the warm reception and traditionally friendly hospitality he received during his stay in Tunisia. He invited the Tunisian Minister of Foreign Affairs Hassan Belkhoja to make a similar official visit to Italy. This invitation was accepted with pleasure. The date of the visit will be fixed at a later time.

DISCORD WITHIN KARMAL GOVERNMENT REPORTED

Lahore MASHRIQ in Urdu 23 Jul 80 pp 1, 7

[Article: "Two Karmal Opponents Hanged; Many Officials Mysteriously Disappear From Kabul"]

[Text] Kabul, 22 July (BBC Radio report)--Major battles are being fought between the Mujahidin and the Russian army in Nangarhar, Asmar, Paktia and other places. The Mujahidin claim that they have surrounded the Afghan army in Asmar and have destroyed many tanks and armored cars in Nangarhar. At the same time, the Russian air force is bombing Afghan villages recklessly. Hundreds of houses have been destroyed in Nangarhar province by this bombing.

Meanwhile, the Babrak Karmal government is experiencing discord within its own ranks. The minister of the interior has been arrested. Two anti-government activists have been hung. Another 10 have been sent to jail.

According to TASS, 12 opponents of the Karmal government have been jailed by a revolutionary court. They were accused of murdering six pro-government people, illegal possession of firearms, and anti-government activities. They were also accused of distributing anti-government pamphlets and having connections with foreign agents. According to TASS, tanks have been stationed on the bridge on River Kabul in order to strengthen Karmal's position. Artillery has been installed on all roads going out of Kabul.

According to diplomatic sources, purges on a large scale have been ordered.

Russian war planes have bombed many villages in Nangarhar province destroying hundreds of homes. The Mujahidin claim that they have destroyed many Russian tanks and armored vehicles in Nangarhar. They have also captured a jeep and attacked the Jalalabad airport where they destroyed three helicopters and six tanks. They killed 20 Afghan and five Russian soldiers. A battle has been raging for many days in Asmar. The Mujahidin have surrounded the Russian army in one place. The Mujahidin claim that they have killed 50 Russians in this battle. According to one announcement by the Mujahidin, more than 500,000 people have been killed since Karmal came to power.

According to PPI, Hizb-e-Islami Afghanistan has announced in a press release that the Mujahidin are fighting the Russians fiercely in (Kinha?) province. In this battle, 12 local communists were killed in addition to a large number of Russian soldiers. An armored vehicle and a military truck of the enemy were destroyed. According to a report from Pikita, the Mujahidin barricaded a road in (Hani) Khel and burned a Russian tank which was protecting a company of Russian soldiers.

KARMAL TRIP CANCELLATION MYSTERY--Peshawar, 19 July--Afghanistan's president, Babrak Karmal, who was being sent to Moscow for 2 weeks by the Russians, was made to return from the airport. When Karmal arrived at the airport to leave for Moscow, he was whisked back to the People's House in a military vehicle. It has not been disclosed why he was being sent to Moscow, or why his trip was cancelled. [Text] [Quetta JANG in Urdu 20 Jul 80 p 1] London, 22 July--According to diplomatic sources, the head of the pro-Soviet puppet government of Afghanistan, Babrak Karmal, was rushed back from the airport because of a heart attack. The Russian authorities took Karmal to a hospital where he was specially treated by Russian doctors for 1 week. He was transferred to the presidential mansion, the People's House, after his treatment. It is said that when President Karmal got out of his car to board the plane for Moscow, he fainted. He was rushed to the hospital in a car. He is being treated at the People's House. [Text] [Lahore MASHRIQ in Urdu 23 Jul 80 pp 3, 8] 7997

DOCTORS REJECT RUSSIAN WOUNDED--London, 22 July (MNI)--Teachers and students at the Medical College in Jalalabad have refused to treat wounded Russians. About 30 Russians were taken there recently for treatment, but the doctors refused to see them. The Russians closed the Jalalabad Medical College in retaliation. All doctors and teachers were ordered out of the hospital. Twelve teachers and 15 doctors were arrested. They are being accused of inciting other doctors and teachers against the Russian regime. Some 8,000 more Afghan families have entered Pakistan as a result of the continuing war in Afghanistan. According to Doctor Fazil Mohammad, president of Hizb-e-Islami of Nangarhar, these refugees came from Deh Pala, Miznia, Ispola and Kot. Their villages were destroyed by Russian bombing. Hundreds of children, old people and women were killed in these bombings. These refugees succeeded in making it to Pakistan, saving their own lives. EXILE DISCUSSES KURDISH STRUGGLE IN IRAQ, IRAN

LD251121 Rome AVANTI in Italian 20 Sep 80 p 9

[Interview with 'Ismat Sharif Wanli, exiled Kurdish leader, by Mirella Galletti: "It Is My People Who Must Decide About Their Resources and Their Future"--"some weeks ago" in Italy]

[Text] A small man with a thin face which still bears the scars of an attack carried out by Iraqi "diplomats" in Lusanne 4 years ago. He is 'Ismat Sharif Wanli, a Kurdish leader who has been living in exile for years, sometimes holding delicate diplomatic posts. For a long time he was Mullah Mustafa Barzani's representative in Europe. About a year ago he founded the "Kurdistan Freedom and Progress Party" which, according to its political adversaries, has little following in Kurdistan. But with his work as scholar and politician, Wanli is one of the prominent figures in the Kurdish National Movement. The interview took place some weeks ago during Wanli's visit to Italy.

[Question] What are the reasons which prompted you to found the party Kurdistan Freedom and Progress Party?

[Answer] The Kurdistan Freedom and Progress Party differs from the other Kurdish parties in two respects. The first is that the latter regard themselves as the repositories of the people's will and refuse the autonomy offered by the central governments. We, on the other hand, do not want to make other people's decisions but intend to create the conditions so that the Kurds can choose the kind of solution that they prefer--autonomy, independence or a union with other national groups.

The second aspect is that our party addresses itself to all Kurds, since the Kurds constitute a single nationality, for instance the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) is represented in all the strata into which Kurdistan is subdivided, but the Iranian KDP has a different strategy and different aims from the Iraqi KDP.

The Kurdistan Freedom and Progress Party, however, has a single leadership though obviously the organization is different for each area of Kurdistan. It is a progressive socialist party with a social program, but it is not Marxist-Leninist.

[Question] What is the strategy of the Kurdish movement as a whole?

[Answer] The first objective is for the Kurds not to be dependent on the ruling fascist and chauvinist governments in Iraq, Turkey, Iran and Syria. There is now a natural convergence of interests among the Kurds and oppressed people of the other nationalities. They want an administration capable of exploiting Kurdistan's resources for the benefit of the Kurdish people and reject the power politics pursued by the central governments. But the governments' nationalism is so deeprooted that it will take time to attenuate the extremist stances.

The Kurds are prohibited from enjoying their own country's natural resources and every method is being tried to eliminate their desire for unity. Why should the Kurds not be united among themselves instead of with Arabs, Persians and Turks, as they are at present?

[Question] You visited Iran immediately after the victory of the Iranian revolution. After a year what can you say about the situation of the Kurds in Iran?

[Answer] Khomeyni had the merit of expelling the monarchy. But we must not forget that the Iranian revolution was carried out by the Iranians, in the plural. Khomeyni played a major role but the mass demonstration against the shah took place not only in Tehran but throughout the country and above all in Kordestan. The imam himself acknowledged this activity when he congratulated the Iranian Kurds during his exile in France.

During these struggles the shared hope was to gain from the revolution freedom and guarantees for the solution of the problems of the national minorities.

But the Iranian peoples' revolution was confiscated. By a theocratic and fanatical government which manipulates the unemployed as an oppression force against the people. The notorious Pasdaran.

There is no democracy now in Iran. The freedom of the press is more and more limited. The social and economic problems remain unresolved and the minorities' problems have not been resolved. Iran is composed of a mosaic of peoples and a federation would be a solution to this state of affairs. Instead Khomeyni wants to unite the Muslims and rejects this solution. The imam does not belong to this century and it is not a matter of being against Islam. The present Iranian government will not last long.

[Question] Press rumors have reported that Iraqi KDP Chairman Masud Barzani's Peshmerge is being helped by Khomeyni in the struggle against the Iranian Kurds. Can you elucidate?

[Answer] I would rather not talk about this. In general it can be said that there is a vicious circle in the Kurdish parties which are trying to gain advantages from the contradictions among the states to secure aid and conduct their struggle. It is a lamentable policy because the governments are manipulating the Kurdish movement. The result is the accentuation of the differences among Kurds.

What the Kurds are doing in Iran is positive. They have not lost the war. They have abandoned the cities to be able to wage guerrilla warfare in the hills. It is something new for Iran that there is open talk, especially among the opposition forces, of the problems connected with resolving the minorities' problems.

[LD251123] [Question] How do you assess the situation of the Kurds in Turkey?

[Answer] In that country there is convergence between the Kurds and the Turkish working class with regard to overthrowing fascism and reaction, which are the main obstacles to the Kurds' self-determination and to democracy in the country. I fear that the Western governments are making the same mistakes in turkey as they made in Iran. They are giving the fascist government weapons to use against the population and trying to save the country from bankruptcy.

The Kurdish movement in Turkey is very active but also very divided. They must not make any mistakes and must identify who are their real friends.

[Question] What about Iraq?

[Answer] The situation of the Kurds in Iraq is the most tragic, on account of the Kurds' mass deportation. Over 700,000 Kurds have been deported to the country's southern and western areas. This means that one-fourth of the Kurdish population is dispersed and families have been split.

The autonomy given to Iraqi Kurdistan is a myth and the Kurdish parliament is a tool in the Baghdad government's hands. But now in Iraq we are witnessing the unity of the opposition. A national front has been formed, embracing the progressive Kurds of the "Patriotic Union of Kurdistan," the al-Nasirites, the communists and the Ba'th leftwing.

AUTONOMOUS REGION LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL ELECTIONS CONCLUDED

JN201806 Baghdad INA in Arabic 1650 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Irbil, Autonomous Rule Center, 20 Sep (INA)--The results of the elections for the First Legislative Council of the Autonomous Region, which were held yesterday through direct, secret and free ballot, were announced here today.

A statement issued by 'Izzat Ibrahim, Revolution Command Council vice chairman and head of the higher commission supervising the elections, said that the elections were held with great awareness and large popular incentive and enthusiasm, which emphasized the rallying of our Kurdish people's masses around their revolutionary leadership.

The statement explained that this exercise of democracy was a lively expression of our people's awareness of their historic responsibilities and continuation in form and content of the exercise of democracy Iraq witnessed on 20 June to elect the council's members. [sentence as received]

The statement gave the names of 50 persons constituting the Legislative Council's members.

About 700,000 citizens took part in the Legislative Council's elections, held to elect 50 members from 194 candidates in 11 constituencies, which comprised 177 electoral centers distributed in the 3 autonomous rule governorates.

Under the Legislative Council law, the Legislative Council of the Autonomous Region will be in charge of drawing up and ratifying laws concerning the region's affairs and discussing its general budget.

The Legislative Council law has not permitted dual membership in the National Assembly and the Legislative Council, but has allowed the candidate who has not won in the National Assembly elections to renominate himself for the Legislative Council elections.

The Legislative Council will hold its meetings in Irbil City, center of the autonomous region. The council's term of office is 3 years.

This electoral process comes to complete the construction of the democratic institutions and to develop and deepen the exercise of democracy in Iraq.

DEPUTY RCC CHAIRMAN ON RELATIONS WITH ITALY, TURKEY

LD190915 Baghdad AL-JUMHURIYAH in Arabic 16 Sep 80 pp 1, 11

[Unattributed article on press conference held by 'Izzat Ibrahim, deputy chairman of the Iraqi Revolution Command Council, in Rome on 15 September]

[Excerpts] Deputy chairman of the Revolution Command Council 'Izzat Ibrahim has affirmed that Iraq and Italy have agreed on developing their relations on the basis of the interests of the two friendly countries' peoples.

Speaking at a press conference in Rome attended by a large number of Italian and international newspaper and news agency correspondents, he said: We hope that all the active and influential forces of the Italian people will participate with officials in Iraq and Italy to strengthen this policy and achieve its desired objectives, because cooperation between the two countries stems from the friendship between them and because of the geographical positions of Iraq and Italy. This friendship and cooperation are the great objective in the development of relations between the two countries, despite attempts by hostile forces to disrupt relations between their peoples.

He added: We strongly and effectively resist such activity whether by internal or external forces. The media in both countries must clarify this truth to the two friendly peoples who are struggling for their own interests out of their common desire--the desire that has been expressed by the Iraqi delegation's visit to Italy.

Ibrahim then reviewed the 17 July Revolution's achievements in mobilizing the masses and fostering cultural development on the basis of the principles of the Socialist Arab Ba'th Party.

He said: On the basis of these principles we have established developed relations with Europe, particularly the countries which have shown considerable change in their policies toward our problems. Our clear and declared policy at this stage is evident in the adoption of an independent course and the strengthening of our relations, particularly with Italy and France, because of the change in their attitude to our cause and the Palestine problem and of their response to our desire and ambition to develop our country culturally.

'Izzat Ibrahim said that Iraq's attitude to the transfer of technology and economic and military cooperation with Italy is increasingly clear and frank, in response to the sincere and frank Italian attitude and in the light of the development of the Italian situation.

He explained that Iraq will continue to supply Italy with oil within its capabilities and on the basis of honest friendship and cooperation and mutual benefits and interests. Accordingly, friendly relations involve obligations and rights. As far as we are concerned we have fulfilled our obligations. We also ask our friend to fulfill such obligations not on a one-for-one basis but in the general sense of our agreement.

Speaking about Iraqi-Turkish relations, the deputy chairman of the Revolution Command Council said that Iraq has no problems with Turkey and enjoys developed relations with it, relations that we respect very much just as Turkey respects our policy. Iraq has also extensive economic relations with Turkey. We look at the recent coup d'etat as primarily an internal matter, since Iraq believes in Turkey's need for political and social independence because it concerns us. We hope that the new regime will place Turkey in a better position.

OFFICIAL CRITICIZES COMMUNIST PARTY'S NATIONAL STANCE

LD191551 Baghdad ATH-THAWRAH in Arabic 12 Sep 80 p 4

[Interview with Hashim 'Agrawi, Iraqi minister of state and member of the National and Nationalist Progressive Front--date and place not given]

[Excerpts] The higher committee of the National and Nationalist Progressive Front achieved important results during its recent meeting. The Front's higher committee approved the expulsion of the Iraqi Communist Party from the Front because of its numerous excesses and violations of the National Action Charter.

ATH-THAWRAH met with Hashim Hasan 'Agrawi, minister of state and member of the National and Nationalist Progressive Front, to discuss this matter. He said:

The Iraqi Communist Party joined the National and Nationalist Progressive Front not because it profoundly believed in the Front's aims and sought to promote the front's work and consolidate its democratic role in society. It joined the Front for a tactical political purpose and not on the basis of long-term strategy and horizons. This becomes clear by noting the Iraqi Communist Party members' conduct inside the Front. It can be said that the party tried to exploit the Front and its presence in the Front to achieve private aims and objectives inconsistent with the spirit of democratic action and the cohesion of the Front, which must be strengthened.

Exasperation began to show on the faces of the Communist Party representatives and in their behavior in the National Front when the Ba'th Party began to make efforts to implement the clauses of the National Action Charter and deservedly gained the leading position in the front. It is the Ba'th Party which founded the Front and proposed its charter out of its belief in the need for Front action and a Front role in serving the course of the revolution and consolidating its great achievements. Our masses were aware of the practical leading role the Ba'th Party was playing in the Front. This prompted the Iraqi Communist Party to raise obstacles to the Front's progress. It thus deviated from the principles of the Front charter which it signed and approved.

An example of this is what the Communist Party did with regard to the armed forces. It tried to disseminate its organizations inside their ranks when the Ba'th Party is the commander of these forces and is entitled to disseminate its organizations in their ranks, out of its belief in building the armed forces ideologically. This is stipulated in the charter and was agreed by all the Front parties. Only the Iraqi Communist Party openly violated the charter provisions.

Moreover, the Iraqi Communist Party opposed many of the national stands and policies of the 17-30 July revolution. It is worth mentioning that the said party used to offend some of the states with which Iraq maintained good relations. It used to exploit its internal and propaganda publications for this purpose. It also used to support some sides which were against our national struggle and which adopted stands prejudicial to our Arab causes.

The Iraqi Communist Party felt the Front because it realized that it was completely "bankrupt" and that the 17-30 July Revolution has fulfilled all the people's aims. It was aware that it had lost our masses and could do nothing that would serve the masses in their leading march. In order to cover its miserable failure, the party adopted a hostile stand and went across to the opposing trench. This can simply be described as a stand hostile to the people and their aims. The Communist Party tied its fate to that of the nation's enemies and their conspiracies. However, we believe that the revolution is stronger than all conspiracies and schemes. We also believe that the Front will continue on its path with strong determination, inspired by the noble concepts contained in the National Action Charter. The Front will continue on its road to achieve all the national and pan-Arab aims, unaffected by the Communist Party's departure from the Front. Whoever leaves the Front is discounted by the people forever.

ARAB MAJORITY SEEN TRYING TO ORGANIZE POLITICALLY

Tel Aviv AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 1 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by Kassim Zay: "The Sane Majority Movement in the Arab Community; The Red Line of Israel's Arabs" (Part Two)]

[Text] Last Friday a group of Arab public figures convened, in order to examine the possibility of establishing a suprapolitical organization, the first of its kind in the Arab community. Those convened agreed unanimously, that the establishment of such an organization was necessary in light of the serious deterioration in both the Jewish and the Arab communities.

According to the initiators of this new organization, the existing political structure in the Arab community does not satisfy the complex problems of this community, especially since most of the parties do not take the voting powers of the Arab citizens seriously. Worse yet, incitement against Arab citizens has become the common fare of most ministers in the government. According to the organizers of the new body, the recent statements of the prime minister and other ministers show the way for the Israeli public.

The Arab leaders maintain that such statements delineate a policy which will be anchored in anti-Arab laws, such as the Terror Law, the Civil Rights Law, and the Bedouin Law.

"You Are Right? What's Next?"

Attorney Muhammad Masarwa, former head of the local council of the village of Kara, is familiar with the mood in the Arab community in particular and in the political map of Israel in general. Creating a new organization, in his opinion, is a positive and necessary step. Masarwa maintains that "the incitement against Arab citizens including Arab students is a grave and unprecedented matter."

"We can take comfort in the fact that the present government is transitory, but its actions today are guidelines and instruction for the Israeli public," he goes on to say. In his opinion, "there are laws today directed against the Arabs, which will be very difficult to revoke once they have passed."

Masarwa relates how in recent years he has met with leaders of the Labor party and has tried to make them aware of the crying injustice Arab citizens were victims of. "Each time I met with Labor leaders I would hear the same reply: You are absolutely right. The question is, what's next? How can one cash in this promissory note of "you are right?"

As a legalist Masarwa mentioned several laws which discriminate against Arab citizens and legitimize acts of incitement against Israeli Arabs: "The Basic Law of Civil Rights was approved without taking into consideration the opinion of the representatives of the Arab community. The Bedouin Law, is designed not only to expropriate the Bedouins' lands, but also to deprive them of their right of appeal. The Tamir Law is directed against Arabs."

"Each Arab Has a Black File"

According to Masarwa, the Tamir Law came in the wake of the last speech of Member of Knesset Tufik Ziad in Nazareth. The intention of that law is not to allow any Arab students to remain in the universities, since as a result of this law every Arab student has to furnish a good conduct certificate for his daily conduct. There is quite simply a tendency to give every Arab a "black file." Masarwa argues that "in most parties there is a consensus to keep Arab representatives in the minority so as to minimize Arab influence in the decision making process. For example: in the Labor party it was decided not to admit more than 5,000-7,000 Arab members to the party. Most parties' attitude toward Arab citizens is one of "suspect him and respect him."

At the same time Masarwa does not see any contradiction between membership of Arab citizens in the new organization and their membership in political parties. Nor does he rule out the membership of any Arab professional body in the suprapolitical organization. Masarwa supports the establishment of such an organization, which will be similar to the American Jewish Congress.

Dealing With Burning Issues

Each member in the organization could belong to any political party, but the new organization will be a mass movement and will operate on a larger scale. "The new organization will have to determine its basic principles and be suprapolitical, but is is not unlikely for members of the organization to meet with representatives of the parties, including the leadership of the Alignment."

"I know that the Alignment will be an alternative to the existing government, but there is no reason for us not to announce unequivocally that we align ourselves with it. The new organization will have to work primarily in the political arena, since the burning problems of the Arab community cannot be delayed. The organizers of the new body will have to deal forthwith with daily problems. Contacts will have to be established with the representatives of the present government without ruling this government out. We must initiate a dialogue with the present government, and demand of the party which will rule after the elections to take a stand now. We will be able to tell the Alignment: We are ready for the possibility of cooperation between us, but we cannot remain in no man's land."

"To Prevent Taking Control"

Ibrahim Shbat, who discussed the basic principles of the new organization, said that "the new organization will be made up of sane people who believe that Israel is the common homeland of the Jews and the Arabs who live in that land. The new body will be a suprapolitical organization and will have to stand fast not to allow any other body to take control of it."

Shbat, analysing the political map in the Arab community, said that "RAKAH (the communist party) is a demagogic party which engages in slogans which are removed from Israeli reality, since the ears of the Jewish public are closed to RAKAH's statements. RAKAH widens the gap between the Jews and the Arabs in Israel, and narrows the bridge of understanding by mouthing slogans which change regularly by orders from the Kremlin."

"RAKAH, and all the organizations which are spawned by it, deal with a foreign policy which does not interest the Arabs of Israel. About 95 percent of its slogans do not deal directly with the daily life of Israeli Arabs."

According to Shbat, "the main preoccupation of the new organization should be internal Istaeli problems which affect the daily life of Israeli Arabs. Ninety five percent of its activities should quite simply be local affairs. The founders of the new organization should be patient, and not act in haste. The establishment of the organization should not be heralded with too much fanfare, and each of its steps should be carefully calculated." Shbat, too, sees the Alignment as the only framework which can be dealt with; "but until now the Alignment has dealt with us on the basis of charity rather than rights."

Shbat believes that sanity should be the guiding light for the founders of the new organization. "We must act sanely. Sanity should be our only quality and only in this way we may last."

Sbhat reiterates: "We see the new organization as an independent body which faithfully represents the problems of Israeli Arabs. We also regard the Alignment as the right address for cooperation without becoming dependent on it."

"Walking Through a Mine Field"

Attorney Jamil Shalhub, former Haifa councilman, is concerned that the intention of forming a suprapolitical organization open to everyone is like attempting to walk through a mine field. "We have tried all along to serve our constituency through the Alignment. We must make the Alignment aware of the gravity of the situation and to impress upon it that the patriotic duty is to right the wrong. Still, if we are looking to form a new organization--it must be the domain of those loyal to the labor movement, and we have to enter into dialogue with the leadership of the Alignment and make it aware of the grave situation of the Arab citizens. We have to emphasize the need for coexistence. The Alignment must be cognizant of our feelings and should not, in my opinion, put stumbling blocks before us and act like an ostrich. This means that our main task is to bolster the periphery of the Alignment in the Arab community, and the Alignment must know how to appreciate it."

Shalhub did not hide his reservations and misgivings. "We must act in a rational manner and not admit people who will spoil it for us. We must make the Alignment understand that it is the interest of both parties which guide us, and we must also explain another fact: until today the Arabs of Israel have been given rights on paper. The time has come to make those rights a reality."

PERES PREPARES PLAN TO REDUCE INFLATION, SPUR ECONOMY

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 28 Jul 80 p 7

[Article by Yosef Pri'el: "Peres Is Doing His Homework; Chairman of Labor Party Formulates Economic Plan Designed To Reduce Inflation and Revitalize Economy"]

[Text] Economic expertise is not, unfortunately, one of the things which have distinguished Israel's prime ministers. Circumstances have forced Israel's leaders to deal mainly with military and political matters, which have over shadowed economic matters and, in turn, have been exacerbated by them.

The chairman of the Labor party, Member of Knesset Shim'on Peres, is seriously preparing for the possibility of heading the next government. He is trying to learn from his predecessors' mistakes, mainly the social and economical ones--which in the final analysis have determined the fate of their governments. Peres is busy these days formulating a broad economic plan, and from a conversation with him it appears that he has familiarized himself with small details, perhaps more than necessary.

The essence of his approach is changing the course of the economy; reducing the inflation and stimulating economic growth. The next government will have to fight inflation mainly through drastic and realistic cuts in the budget. The first thing which must be done according to Peres is stop all allocations related to the settlements. "Between Hebron and flight hours, I prefer flight hours," Peres says. Yet he is aware of the need to significantly reduce the power of the IDF. This can be done through shortening reserve duty and compulsary service, and reducing the size of the regular army. In addition, the armed forces could perform civilian tasks since, according to Peres, reducing the military work force and creating new teams to work on new projects will be more costly and less productive than utilizing the existing military work force. Thus, it is not likely that the new sea canal will be dug by personnel of the IDF Corps of Engineers rather than by civilians employed by the administration which will be set up for this new project.

Peres strongly opposes unemployment. In a country with a high number of workers engaged in defense, there is no reason to consider economic recovery through unemployment. In order to provide work for those presently unemployed and for those who will lose their jobs because of cuts in the defense budget, Peres presents a vast program of investment to the tune of 10 billion dollars, in a relatively short period, which will revitalize the economy. This sum will be obtained through renewed commitments from Jewish investors from abroad for the development of Israel, as well as through a one-time request to the government of the U.S. and West Germany to defer payment of Israeli debts for investment purposes by renewing the loans. The burden will thus fall upon the shoulders of the Israeli taxpayer, especially through lowering the level of consumption of the more affluent classes.

Peres sees three major components in his plan of investment:

--Expanding some 20 established enterprises with a high growth and export potential.

--Establishing an industrial park for science-based industries in the Galilee, which will add 200,000 inhabitants to the area with a higher income level and higher living standards.

--Digging the sea canal with international capital (mainly European). Peres says that in its southern route the canal should be dug only through Israeli territory (within the green line) while looking for regional cooperation in the project (especially with Jordan).

The chairman of the Labor party sees a need to turn the tide by revoking the massive tax exemptions granted by the Likud government. He envisions the possibility of a short term package deal worked out by the government, the Histadrut, and private employers. This deal will include a price and wage control, and profit restraint. To stimulate exports Peres believes it is necessary to subsidize the added value of export, and to reinstate the subsidies for staples at the uniform rate of 30 percent, to enable the resumption of agricultural planning.

The plan which is being developed in consultation with Labor's economic and social expoerts, academicians, and Histadrut leaders, also deals with the housing crisis. It offers the possibility of giving land to tenants instead of builders, and building housing projects with subsidized rent.

Peres' conception of the economic team of the government he may be called upon to form calls for a consensus on policy before the formation of the government, thus overcoming the mistakes of previous governments which were severely undermined by interpersonal conflicts and disputes. Peres is not willing to reveal at this time who will be the members of this team. He only promises and hopes that they will be allowed to join the team, only if they agree ahead of time to work as part of the team and will agree on basic principles. It will be interesting to see whether the homework Peres is doing now will not be forgotten, if and when he is called upon to implement it.

GALILI APPOINTMENT TO PLATFORM COMMITTEE ANALYZED

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 30 Jul 80 p 9

[Article by Member of Knesset Ehud Ulmrat: "The Fig Leaf of the Doves"]

[Text] The appointment of Israel Galili to a central position, for the purpose of formulating Labor's party platform for the forthcoming elections to the Knesset, has caused emotional reactions. Thus, the issue became public instead of remaining an internal party matter. It is not common for rival parties to be concerned with such appointments, but this time the matter could not go unnoticed.

Most of the reactions to the Galili appointment cam from frustrated doves in and outside the Alignment. Yosi Sarid promised his supporters in Nazareth he would continue to proudly uphold the banner of the doves. His friends in the circle for alliance have shown consternation over Galili's hawkish stance. National Religious Party member Avraham M'lamed, who is on good terms within his own party with Greater Israel people like Z'vulun Hammer and Ben Tzion Rubin, has taken Galili's appointment as a personal affront, as though it meant breaking a personal commitment to him.

The gist of all these reactions is a fear that the Labor Party is about to foresake its patently dovish stands which Shim'on Peres has been espousing lately. It could conceivably return to its traditional stands which have represented the mainstream of the Israeli public for decades, and of which Galili has been one of the most salient and creditable spokesmen.

An Illusion of Change

This fear is unfounded. Peres has no intention of changing his position. He is definitely interested in creating the illusion of change, an outward appearance of toughness, a pretense of hawkishness. In actuality, he does not intend to create a new internal balance in his party, which will weaken the growing power of the extreme doves who provide most of his support within his party.

In recent years when Peres was linked to Dayan inside the Labor Party, he attempted to assist his senior partner in the fight against a consensus based on the Allon Plan. This fight gave birth to the compromise known as the "Galili Document." This document established a framework for the Alignment policy in the West Bank which attempted to continue the momentum of settlement within the restricted borders of the Allon Plan, the policy open bridges, and the bolstering of the Israeli foothold in those territories while denying the principle of territorial compromise.

The Alignment policy, as enunciated today by Peres, strives conspicuously to give up most of the territory in the West Bank. According to hints dropped lately by Peres, the Alignment under his leadership will be prepared to make these concessions on the basis of an interim agreement. In other words, even without a final and blinding peace, with the attending economic and diplomatic relations, Peres today is prepared for a near-total withdrawal, with "insignificant border changes."

A huge gap exists between Peres' present position and his past one. Whatever the reasons for this change, the fact is that his present position reflects the consensus of the doves within his party. No wonder that Yosi Sarid, Abba Eban and others are the main supporters of Peres in the Labor Party. It is also no surprise that MAPAM is not excited about the expected struggle between Peres and Rabin.

A Cosmetic Change

The sharper the public debate leading to the Knesset elections becomes, the clearer it will be to most voters that Peres' labor party is quite different from the party which ruled through a consensus among Golda, Dayan, and Galili. Peres knows that an excessive dovish image projected by the Alignment may hurt him in the elections. He needs an outward cosmetic change. This is why he has turned to Galili. Galili's role is not to shift the center of gravity within the party to new hawkish positions. He is rather expected to help change the image, and create the illusion of change.

We can understand Peres. It is a bit harder to understand Galili. Israel Galili has always appeared to his political opponents both on the left and onthe right as a man of stable views, who knows how, public pronouncements notwithstanding, to maintain a position known as balanced hawkishness. This position has striven tenaciously and systematically toward broadening the base of Jewish settlement in the territories, strengthening Israeli expansion in areas vital to its security, and making concessions only when it was vital and absolutely necessary to do so.

Galili has drunk the cup of bitterness because of members of his party who had put excessive blame on him and others for the events of the Yom Kippur War. He did deserve, however, some of the credit for being one of the architects of the policy, rightfully named after him, which contributed toward the expanding of the settlements, the proliferation of outposts in Judea, in the Jordan Valley, in the Golan Heights, and in the Gaza Strip.

In the present political reality, the Labor Party will not repeat, even with Galili, those past performances. Galili knows this better than others. In the best of cases Galili will be the fig leaf which will camouflage, outwardly, Peres' true intentions of returning the territories, including the settlements, most of which had been established by the Labor Party.

The question is not whether Galili deserves to be given a position in the Labor Party, but rather how will he reconcile the contradiction between his stance and the platform he is called upon to formulate. It seems to me that Galili's gift of drafting documents will not suffice to bridge the gap.

DETAILS REPORTED ON GAZA MAYOR'S ATTITUDE TOWARD EGYPT

Refusal To Host Egyptian Ambassador

TA222036 Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 1800 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Gaza Mayor Rashad al-Shawwa says that he will not meet with the Egyptian Ambassador. He made this statement to a group of Israeli newsmen in Gaza today. Among them was reporter Jerry Cheslow.

[Begin recording] [Cheslow] Political observers in the Gaza Strip say that Rashad al-Shawwa has been disassociating himself steadily from Egypt, and his statement that he would not meet with the Egyptian ambassador can be seen in this context. The mayor hinted that he thought that in his position the meeting would not be advantageous. But when pressed to explain more clearly, al-Shawwa replied:

[al-Shawwa] Well, there are many Arabs. I do not invite them all to my home.

[Cheslow] Al-Shawwa denied that there are growing commercial ties between the Gaza Strip and Egypt. This, in spite of the fact that more than half of the thousands of Gazans that cross into Egypt via al-'Arish weekly are businessmen trying to set up agencies to export Israeli goods or import Egyptian ones. The rift between al-Shawwa and Egypt is further aggravated by the question of universities. Until last year, about 2,000 Gazans were accepted by Egyptian universities annually. But then President al-Sadat closed the door and only 16 Gazans were admitted. Gazans who are close to Egypt say that al-Sadat has given clear signs that what would be required to reopen that door would be a visit to Cairo by a delegation from Gaza headed by Mayor al-Shawwa. This would give a nod to Egyptian policy. But al-Shawwa says the door was closed because of Egypt's large number of students and refuses to consider going.

[al-Shawwa] I personally don't see there is anything that would prevent such a delegation to go. But personally I cannot go. I have got a special status. I can't be in that delegation.

[Cheslow] Meanwhile, the Egyptian influence in the Gaza Strip continues to grow. Besides the preparation by Gazans to become an economic bridge between Egypt and Israel, 67 different Egyptian newspapers are sold in the Gaza Strip every day. And, from the Egyptian side, hundreds of people seeking jobs or higher pay are caught trying to sneak across the border each week and are sent back after 8 hours detention.

Rejects Autonomy Without Palestinian State

TA222142 Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 2030 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Gaza, 22 Sep--Today Gaza Mayor Rashad al-Shawwa expressed his opposition to a sudden and unplanned withdrawal of Israel from the Gaza Strip. Al-Shawwa, who met with newsmen who toured the Gaza Strip, said that Israel plans to pull its forces out of the Gaza Strip without prior announcement and to leave the region in a state of uncertainty as far as internal security is concerned.

According to al-Shawwa, Israel should determine "a timetable" of 2 or 3 years for a complete withdrawal, and then it will be possible to plan Palestinian independence. He again rejected the autonomy plan in Gaza and said that he, like any Palestinian, rejected a piece of an autonomy plan that would not clearly lead to independence and to the establishment of a Palestinian state. According to al-Shawwa, only a just peace with all the Arab states, while recognizing the full rights of the Palestinians, will bring about peace in the region. This will not be achieved by the Camp David accords, which are unacceptable to all of the 4 million Palestinians throughout the world.

In the presence of the commander of the area, Brig Gen Yitzhaq Segev, the mayor complained about the restrictions that limit his movements both to Israel and to Judaea and Samaria and abroad. He also complained about the shortage of policemen, the inability to control the traffic and the unruly situation in the markets due to the shortage of police.

Replying to a question, al-Shawwa voiced harsh criticism of the fact that Israel is developing the economy of the territories for its own purposes and prevents the occupied territories from gaining economic independence.

Mr al-Shawwa argued that he had never presented himself as the representative of Gaza or of the Gaza Strip but as a son of the Palestinian people. He expressed his views which, according to him, are shared by the majority of his people. He also rejected the accusation that he opposed holding elections for the municipality.

The commander of the region, Brig Gen Yitzhaq Segev, who was asked questions later on, denied the charges concerning the alleged restrictions on al-Shawwa's movements. He said that al-Shawwa had been abroad only 2 months ago, that 6 months ago he had visited Arab states and that his movements into Israel are completely unlimited.

BRIEFS

ARREST OF W. BANK MAYOR--The Qalqilyah Municipality has denied the accusations of the military government that the pamphlet published by the municipality about its achievements--which cause the detention of the Qalqilyah mayor--contains any elements of instigation. The Qalqilyah Municipality met in emergency session this afternoon and decided to send protest cables to the defense minister and to the Judaea and Samaria commander with the demand to release the mayor. Notables in Judaea and Samaria told our correspondent Arye Gus that the arrest of the Qalqilyah mayor is another step in the military government scheme to depose the mayors that have been elected by the population. Our correspondent Pinhas 'Inbari reported details from the pamphlet that led to the arrest of the mayor. In the preface to the pamphlet the Qalqilyah mayor wrote that he hoped the residents would continue to live on the fatherland's soil in spite of the difficult conditions of the occupation. He scores the former municipal council for having attached Qalqilyah to Israel's electricity grid. The pamphlet cover depicts the municipality emblem in the colors of the Falastin flag. About 1,000 copies of this pamphlet were printed, half of which were sent to Libya, which has adopted the Qalqilyah Municipality. IDF ARMS TO TERRORISTS, CRIMINALS--IDF arms and sabotage materials have been used in dozens of terrorist acts perpetrated by terrorists and underworld figures. The police command has recently warned against this in meetings with senior IDF officers and the matter has been brought to the attention of Chief of Staff Rafa'el Eytan. Many terrorist squads have used explosives stolen from IDF camps. Also the explosions in Jaffa, whose purpose involved settling accounts, used IDF explosives. The handgrenades thrown in Dimona were stolen from an IDF camp, and a few days ago the police captured a Ramla resident who tried to sell 10 IDF-made handgrenades to a Gaza Arab. According to information from the police, more than one weapon is stolen from the IDF daily. The police believe that criminal elements and especially drug addicts who were recruited into the IDF as part of mobilization and the uneducated, underprivileged youths steal arms and explosives in order to buy drugs. The police claim that the IDF does not do enough in the way of orderly supervision and registration of soldiers receiving arms. The criminal identification department has occasional difficulty identifying the source of the IDF arms found in the possession of terrorists and criminals. The police view the IDF--so I was told by a senior officer--as a major source of arms for hostile elements and the underworld. [Excerpt] [TA191518 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 19 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

SIGNIFICANCE OF PHALANGE OFFENSIVE AGAINST NLP DISCUSSED

Review of Past Developments

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 14-20 Jul 80 pp 6, 7

[Article by Yusuf Ibrahim al-Asmar: "The War of the Two Parties"]

[Text] What happened last week between the Phalange and Liberal Parties in the eastern area of Beirut and the areas of Matn, Kasrawan and Jubayl was a major turning point in the history of relations between the two parties and the whole situation in Lebanon. The consequences and dimensions of the bloody clashes witnessed by the eastern areas exceeded all reasonable expectations of the allies and supporters of the two parties. What happened was not merely "isolated incidents" or actions by "undisciplined" elements which happened and were dealt with by rapid contacts.

Although Camille Sham'un and Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil still proclaim their "unbounded" solidarity, the reality imposed by the "war of the two parties" has demonstrated indisputably that in the eastern areas, the Liberal Party has become a mere political party with no military strength.

However, the question raised by observers has been: Was the objective of what happened to contain the Liberals militarily preparatory to a political containment, or was it to consolidate party forces under the banner of "the Lebanese forces," as Phalangist forces have been eager to say since the bloody clashes began?

In trying to answer this question, one has to go back and spotlight earlier developments.

Two weeks ago, at a popular meeting with economic and social notables in Kasrawan, Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil was engaged in a dialogue marked by a high degree of candor. During this dialogue, there was raised the excesses about which the citizens were complaining in the eastern area as well as the imposition of the "payoffs" on them by every organization, something which was a real burden to them. Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil responded to these observations, acknowledging that there were excesses and affirming indirectly that the party machinery had failed to exercise contol in these matters. He moved on to a discussion of the role of "the Lebanese forces" at the present stage and raised the issue of the lack of their consolidation under an effective leadership. He focussed on the necessity of effective unification of all forces of the parties of the "Lebanese Front," bringing up the many attempts that had been made in this regard, and finally saying, "If these forces are not unified in an amicable manner, some madman will have to unify them by force, despite all the difficulties." He raised a slogan since he said that there could be no military unity of the parties under the shadow of political pluralism, using as a premise the necessity of preserving the democracy advocated by the Phalange Party "because there could be no Lebanon without democracy and no democracy without unarmed political and party pluralism and no civilian political pluralism without unified forces removed from politics."

Only a few days after the statement of Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, the incidents broke out in al-Ashrafiyah between the Phalange and the Liberals, the comrades of the one rank and the two members of the "Lebanese Forces." However, these incidents were able to be confined within a narrow framework and the two parties avoided facing "the stern test."

The First Downpour

A few days later there were clashes in Wadi Shahrur in Ba'abda District between the Phalange and the Liberals. The effect was isolated at first but then they spread and became general, beginning to move from one area to another and involving Basus, Kafr Shima, Batshiyah, al-Mardashah, Basaba, etc. These villages were reckoned as falling within the Liberal Party's area of influence and military officials there figured the Phalange's chances for loss there were great and that allied forces had doublecrossed them. One of the negative consequences of these battles was that there were a number of casualties, mostly Phalangists. These villages surrounded the areas of Badadun and Humal in 'Alayh District which for some months had witnessed clashes between the Phalange and Liberal Party ending with the army's entry into the two areas.

To prevent the situation from worsening in Wadi Shahrur and the neighboring area, the army came in with the approval of the two parties involved. The Liberal Party viewed what had happened as a victory for it within the context of the victories it had won when the army entered 'Ayn al-Rumanah and Farn al-Shubbak and, before that, al-Hadath following bloody clashes between the two parties. At the same time, Phalangist sources, particularly those close to Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil felt that the Wadi Shahrur incidents had been contrived and accused the army of collusion with the Liberals and with facilitating the movement of supplies to them which had made the battle unequal. The Liberals blew up Phalangist headquarters in Wadi Shahrur and Batshiyah and killed a number of Phalangists.

People in Beirut following the events noticed that Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil had refused to comment on what happened in Wadi Shahrur and declined to attend the meetings convened to deal with the deteriorating situation there. Statements coming from him to confidants carried a great deal of censure for the Liberals.

Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil recognized the gravity and ramifications of this interval, seeing a dark cloud on the horizon of the relations of the two parties, and hastened to get in touch with President Sham'un to contain possible events, particularly since the reports that the head of the Phalange had seen indicated that something was in the wind. The leading elements of "the Lebanese Front" held a meeting in Bikfaya marked by complete candor about the present situation. Al-Jumayyil proposed to Sham'un that the two parties should unite under Sham'un's leadership to cut the ground from under any dispute between the comrades of "the single trench." This proposal was announced to the reporters and Sham'un accepted it with thanks, praise and appreciation, announcing that it would be necessary for the proposal to be studied by the leading elements of the two parties.

The two allies decided to meet the following day to discuss this issue and to revive the activity of the joint committee that had been formed in the wake of the al-Ashrafiyah incidents two weeks earlier to take "steps in depth" to put a stop to the problems.

What Is Written Is Written

However, the course of events altered that day and neither of the two leaders knew that their efforts would be frittered away by unlimited clashes.

Just as each incident begins in an isolated manner, "the war of the two parties" began in Tabarja when a Phalangist official was seriously wounded by gunfire. This incident was the spark that ignited the whole eastern area.

There were fierce battles along the Kasrawan coast, particularly in the strongholds of the Liberals in al-Safra, Kafr Yasin, Tabarja and Adma. Along with this, the Liberals' headquarters were occupied, Deny Sham'un's home was burned and his sister was wounded. There was fierce fighting which left 50 dead in al-Safra alone. The homes of Liberals were blown up and others occupied throughout Kasrawan, and the Liberals were left with no more military presence in the area. Their major stronghold, the Ghasta barracks, also fell.

There were bloody clashes in al-Ashrafiyah lasting 2 days, followed by the occupation of 5 centers of the Liberals and a major barracks in al-Sayufi, attacks on the home of President Sham'un and firing on the Phalangist barracks. During a 48 hour period, the Liberals' positions fell, either through military force or voluntarily after President Sham'un ordered his fighters to withdraw from al-Ashrafiyah and to hand over the centers to the Phalange. So another stronghold of the Liberals in a sensitive area fell.

There was fierce fighting in the Jubayl area ending with the fall of the Liberals' 'Amshit barracks and the surrender of all other centers in Jurud al-'Aqurah and al-Laqluq.

There were sporadic clashes in the northern Matn which ended with an agreement between the officials in the Liberals an Shaykh Amin al-Jumayyil to spare the area of any conflict and the Liberals handed over their positions, barracks and the port in Dhabiyah to the Phalange voluntarily. There was only one incident in Barmana arising from an old score to settle between the two parties there.

Fuqra, where Dani Sham'un, secretary of defense in the Liberals, set up positions after his home was burned, fell and part of it was destroyed and he had to move to al-Hazimiyah after announcing his resignation from the party and attacking Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, describing what the Phalange had done as a "doublecrossing crime." Al-Jumayyil's son accused Sham'un's son of exploiting his father's position (President Sham'un) to become a leader of the Christians as his successor.

Security Operations In Earnest

While the Liberal Party accused the Phalange of resorting to genocide because of both its political and military presence, circles of "the Phalangist Military Council" say that what ignited the eastern area was "security operations which were undertaken by an extremely earnest decision to consolidate ranks, end the incidental clashes and put a stop to the internal strikes to which the Lebanese Front had been subjected." These sources went further, describing what had happened as "an operation to sort out the ground between the allies and allied subordinate elements." These sources drew a link between what had happened and the necessity of closing "the drug ports and the gambling and hashish clubs, of dissolving the joint financing and consolidating the military presence on the ground to make the slogans of unification a living reality."

These sources stressed that what had happened "was an attempt to disarm politicians and remove politics from the hands of the military out of concern for a unified position and a unified decisionmaking process on the one hand, and a unified fighting front for Lebanon."

However, Dany Sham'un held to another position since he viewed what the Phalangists had done as a plan to implement the policy of a single party, linking what had happened in al-Safra to "a second Ihdin operation" targeting him personally because had be been at home at the time of the attack against it, he would have been killed. He reiterated his rejection of any cooperation with the Phalange, announcing that he would refuse to meet with "the criminals" at the same table. He and his brother Dory chose to meet in al-Hazimiyah where the army has a strong presence with the area located under the control of the legitimate authorities.

It has also been reported that President Sham'un decided to leave his home in al-Ashrafiyah after ordering his supporters to withdraw from their positions and that he will move to the area of 'Ayn al-Rumanah, al-Hadath or al-Hazimiyah or, in the worst case, to Dayr al-Qamr where he began building a mansion some time ago.

It is clear that "the war of the two parties" resulted in a true estrangement, particularly on the grassroots level, since President Sham'un and Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil took pains to hold meetings and to appear together in Tyre and also in making statements.

The Sole One and the Strongest

Observers have proceeded to analyze the ramifications of what happened last week and summed them up in some specific elements involving the following points:

1. The Phalange Party has become the sole and strongest party in the eastern area of Beirut, regardless of whether what happened was under the slogan of facilitating unification or of "containment."

2. The party has proven that it is capable of taking decisive action, whatever the consequences.

3. The fate of "the Lebanese Front" is in jeopardy because the withdrawal of the Liberals from it, after former President Sulayman Franjiyah pulled out, reaffirms that the Phalange Party will tolerate no political or military partnership with any other party.

4. A contradiction has emerged in the positions of the Phalange because the attitude represented by Skaykh Amin al-Jumayyil does not agree with what happened, having opposed the occurrence of any incidents in the Matn area.

5. The Phalange will be more and more inclined toward political isolation and "the areas mentality" since the Islamic faction and "the nationalist faction" will take a harder line toward any possibility of cooperating with the Phalange.

6. Any attempt to form a national union government bringing together all Lebanese factions has been aborted given the increased number of parties who refuse to participate in the same government with the Phalange. This is what was implied by Dany Sham'un when he said that he had reservations about participating in any government which included Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil.

7. Apprehensions have mounted that the Phalange will venture to proclaim some specific step in the areas which they dominate now that it has begun to make political and military movements freely and unopposed, something that could whet the appetites of other quarters, particuarly in the north, for adopting similar positions.

8. Any role which the army could play in the eastern area of Beirut at the present stage has been eliminated since the Phalange Party does not agree to such a role despite statements made here and there in this regard.

In the opinion of observers, the specific elements brought forth by the "Phalange-Liberals war" have turned the political situation in the country upsidedown because they involve profound and manifold significant indications involving the relationship of the two parties with each other and then with other parties.

These people say that the deeprooted disagreement over policy between the two parties were behind what happened and that covering them by calling them isolated incidents was nothing more than an attempt to erase the real causes. Among these disagreements was the Liberals' unhappiness over the unilateral opendoor attitude of the Phalange toward Syria and the renewed courting between Damascus and the Phalange, with the Liberals left out of it, keeping in mind that President Sham'un had indirectly criticized the renewal of this dialogue and had advocated that any contact with Damascus should be through the Lebanese Government. Moreover, the contacts which Sham'un had made during recent days with the resistance on the one hand, and the Soviet ambassafor on the other had not left much satisfaction with the Phalange who, while having talked with the Soviets, were eager to attack the Palestinians violently. Also, the Phalange accused the Liberals of establishing security and political coordination with President Sulayman Franjiyah in the north.

While the Liberals are charging the Phalange with liquidating it politically and militarily, Phalangist sources say that what happened was nothing more than an attempt to straighten out the abnormal situation that prevailed in the area, a serious attempt to restructure the party political presence on a pluralistic basis and the party military presence on a unification basis. In this context, Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil said that the weapons that the Phalangists seized from the barracks of the Liberals would not be used against party members but for the sake of the pan-Arab and national objectives for which the Lebanese forces were working, "the most important of which was the continuation of the battle of liberation."

However, a question remains: Does what happened in the eastern areas go beyond the framework of military change to that of geographic change with the objective of partition, or does it fall within the framework of "the battle for influence?"

It is premature to answer the first part of the question though it might be in the negative as long as all parties reaffirm the importance of the unity of Lebanon and their struggle to keep it as one entity within political, social and democratic pluralism.

Analysis of Anticipated Events

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 21-27 Jul 80 pp 10-11

[Article by Yusuf Ibrahim al-Asmar: "Unification of Lebanon or Division of the Maronites?"]

[Text] To the same extent that the agreement of the Phalange and National Liberals Party and their cohesiveness constituted one of the most important components of the Lebanese war in the past, their bloody break constitutes a dangerous leap into the unknown and a dramatic step toward "the greater events yet to come" in Lebanon and, perhaps, in the area.

What is yet to come is a common subject of speculation, as newspaper headlines attest, some well known local ones refer to the partitioning of Lebanon, the emptying of the south and its economy, division of the maronites, prevention of entente, and the end of the rule of the "Emirs." Some which are not local refer to solution of the Palestine issue, putting all parties to this solution on the line, resettling the Palestinians, the Palestinian state, autonomy on the West Bank and Gaza, etc.

It is difficult for observers to define the goal of the Phalange in liquidating the military power of the Liberal Party which, as of 7 July, became "the ally of yesterday" in search of allies among "the enemies of yesterday." In the meantime, the Phalange has not managed to contain the situation of hostility between it and another "ally of yesterday," former President Sulayman Frankiyah, after the Ihdin massacre on 13 June 1978.

Some see what happened as a new phase in favor of "the conspiracy," one objective of which is to strike a blow at the Maronites or, at least, to split and weaken them, making it easy to resettle the Palestinians and, consequently, resolve the Palestinian issue.

There are also those who optimistically believe that what happened may prompt the largest illegal military force (that is, the Phalange) to use the dominant position it has won in favor of the legitimate establishment in return for the exclusive rights and privileges it can exchange it for.

The specific factors are still amorphous. What is certain but not in definite form is that what happened between the Phalange and the Liberals moved a piece on the chessboard of the solution in the area. As for Lebanon, there is nothing wrong with hoping for the best but everyone is asking: Will the decision be Lebanese?

Where is Lebanon Headed?

This is the question that is raised in political circles and official quarters after the Lebanese war entered the heart of two allied parties, almost becoming a Maronite-Maronite war after having been a Maronite-Palestinian war.

What is meant by a Maronite-Maronite war and what are its objectives?

Some of them say that the conspiracy against Lebanon which had schemed to displace the Maronites, ships even having been sent to take them from Lebanon and distribute them among the American countries to facilitate solution of the Palestinian issue on the basis of resettlement, failed because of the efforts of the Maronite fighting man so the aspect of the conspiracy transformed into a war from within against the defiant

Maronites with the objective of containing them, taming them and forcing them to accept the resettlement they now reject; otherwise, partition.

Others say that the Maronite-Maronite war may be the beginning of the implementation of a plot to create sectarian mini-states in the area as the best means to safeguard the security of Israel and, consequently, the security of the oil, the conspiracy which Dr Kissinger planned. The preoccupation of the United States with the presidential elections could be a propitious opportunity to implement it. It might also be the way to freeze conditions and prevent any solution, even a partial one, for the Lebanese crisis, even only its internal aspect.

When the Lebanese Government proceeded with the entente process in the hope of forming a government of effective elements who would deploy the army in all areas and restore the sovereignty of legitimate authority to them, it by this movement overstepped the red lines because it or any other party was forbidden to accomplish any solution ending the crisis before the picture of the comprehensive solution of the Middle East crisis had emerged.

Achieving entente among the Lebanese and formation of a government of effective elements would mean that the Lebanese crisis had ended or had been disengaged from the crisis of the area. This was unacceptable because it would nullify the schemes laid down to resolve the Middle East crisis as an outgrowth of the Lebanese crisis that was intensifying it.

Solution of the Lebanese crisis in isolation of a solution to the area crisis, by entente and formation of a government of effective elements, would require withdrawal of the Arab Deterrent Force from Lebanon and, consequently, withdrawal of the international forces from the south so that the Lebanese army could be deployed in all areas to establish the sovereignty of the state over all territory and there would no longer be any armed presence, Lebanese or Palestinian, except that of the legitimate government.

Is this possible now, before arrangements are made for the comprehensive solution of the Middle East crisis, keeping in mind that senior officials in friendly and sister states have repeatedly stressed that the crisis of Lebanon is linked with the Middle East crisis and that the only solution of the Lebanese issue will come with solution of the Palestinian issue?

So, how can there be a Lebanese decision to resolve the Lebanese crisis while Arab and international resolutions on the highest levels have been unable to resolve it, or do not want to solve it?

Any premature solution will fail through political action or a military blow as shown by the fact that when the nine European countries tried to present a solution for the Middle East crisis and to present an initiative in this regard, the United States hastened to direct a strongly worded warning to them and they stopped the presentation of any solution and merely announced principles. Even the Chancellor of Austria, Bruno Kreisky, halted any move for solution of the Middle East crisis until the American presidential elections are over on the argument that the important thing now is not to look for a solution but to use every possible means of pressure to prevent Israel from detonating the situation in the area in a way that would sabotage the principles that would be suitable for a just and comprehensive solution.

Therefore, while the recent security incidents have some positive elements such as establishing security in the eastern area and preventing excesses and crimes, the negative elements, or to put it better, the objectives that they intentionally or unintentionally achieved, involve freezing any solution to the crisis and strengthening the status quo, leaving no room for discussion to achieve entente among the Lebanese or to form a government of effective elements. This means that every party to the dispute on the Lebanese scene is still in place and there willbe no room to discuss the withdrawal of the Arab Deterrent Force of the disappearance of the Palestinian armed presence. The portrayal of Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil after the recent bloody events as the "bogeyman" for the western area and as having formed a force of 40,000 fighting men to liberate this area makes the leaderships there refrain from demanding the entry of the army because, given its present state, it could not provide protection for them and what can provide this protection is the continued Syrian military presence, in addition to the Palestinian armed presence.

A complex of fear now rules the western area. The leading elements there say: If this is what happened where things are good in the eastern area, what havoc would be wrought in the bad western area?

Does the situation now face a stage of stagnation until the American presidential elections and will any solution to the crisis of Lebanon be through a solution to the Middle East crisis with the way things are?

Will the solution be at the expense of Lebanon, bringing resettlement and partition or fragmentation or will the solution keep in mind the unity of the land, people and institutions of Lebanon, if one is to believe the statements of senior officials in friendly and sister countries?

Informed sources say that it will be difficult to restor Lebanon to what it was politically and geographically, particularly if resettlement takes place. All signs indicate that resettlement is happening, and that the sentence is being passed to be carried out at the appropriate time.

King Hussein, through his extensive activity, has been able to avert a solution at the expense of his country. He has agreed to enter negotiations with Israel after Begin's government departs and the Labor Party government comes in and, this would also be after anticipated developments and changes in the area permit the convening of an Arab summit that would authorize King Hussein to hold negotiations to regain the West Bank for establishment of a Palestinian regime linked with Jordan within the framework of a confederation.

This authorization would abrogate the resolution of the Rabat summit that treated the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and gave it alone the right to negotiate the restoration of the West Bank and to establish a Palestinian state on all or part of the Palestinian territory.

The proposal now is that the PLO should take part in the peace negotiations, as set forth inthe statement issued by the nine European countries in Venice.

In order to accomplish this, the same sources expect Israel to venture upon a military strike against the Palestinian resistance with the objective of containing and weakening it so that the proposed solution will then be on a par with its cause because this solution does not now measure up to the size of the resistance.

This military strike will deal with the steadfastness of Syria in the face of solutions that are not fair to the Arabs and do not give the Palestinians their full rights, the objective being to strike a blow at this steadfastness and to force syria to accept a possible solution to the area crisis.

They also expect this military strike to be followed by the fall of the Begin government. At that time, the peace negotiations will enter a new phase with moderate negotiators since the hardline negotiators will have disappeared or will have been contained and tamed. Execution of the settlement sentence will begin without constituting a death sentence for Lebanon; rather, the sentence will be commuted to hard labor, if not for life, for many years.

What can grow out of resettlement once the forces oppsing it have been struck or contained? The political fiefdoms which used to rule Lebanon could be transformed into administrative units in which a sort of autonomy is established within the framework of a confederation of federation.

These units are being defined in the light of what will have happened to the map of political leaderships in the country. Confirming it is what President Sarkis himself made public when talking about effecting political powers in the country, that is, augmented administrative decentralization without going into detail in defining this decentralization.

Prime Minister Salim al-Huss went into greater detail in explaining the decentralization he was proposing as part of an integrated reform plan he had prepared. In accordance with it, Lebanon would be divided into regions corresponding to the boundaries of the present provinces and departments corresponding to the present districts.

Each district, or department, would have an administrative council composed of a specific number of members elected by the mayors from among their own number and augmented by the deputies from the area, except for the capital, Beirut, whose administrative council would comprise members of the municicouncil, augmented by the deputies from the city. Each district would have the right to set up a reserve development and reconstruction budget besides its ordinary budget.

A special feature of this decentralization is that it keeps close at hand the sources of public services and the handling of citizens' affairs and the development of local development projects and preserves the unity of the homelanc and state, establishing a sort of close tie between local administration and the central administration through the governor because the proposed decentralization maintains the unity of the army, the internal security forces, educational programs, the general budget, development planning, legislation, information and foreign representation.

Will Lebanon move toward a system of canton or a federal system if resettlement is brought to it within the framework of a decentralization accomplished by agreement on delineating its borders and thereby achieving the security of Lebanon just as, through resettlement, the security of Israel and, consequently, the security of oil is achieved?

What Comes After the "7 July Movement?"

It will not be easy in the short term, at least, for relations between the Phalange and Liberal Parties to return to what they were before 7 July, the date "war" broke out between the two parties leaving, according to available information, about 150 dead.

This impression which has been formed by observers in Beirut is the talk of about all local and Arab political circles represented in Lebanon and the talk of Western and diplomatic circles. It appeared as well in the reception given by the French embassy on 14 July and also at the reception given by the Iraqi embassy on the anniversary of 17 July and so it was about time for the average Lebanese to encounter the same impression.

The war between the two parties went past all reasonable bounds and, given its results, turned into a set of factors preventing the restoration of any alliance between the two parties, at least on the rank and file level and certainly on the level of the military forces.

Day after day, information disclosed what had taken place during the 3-day war, aggravating the estrangement and cutting the ground from under any attempt to heal the cut. This estrangement is intensified by the disparate points of view of Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, chairman of the Phalangist Military Council and commander of the "Lebanese Forces," and Dany Sham'un, secretary of defense in the National Liberal Party and commander of the "Tigers of the Liberals" who suffered a major defeat during the recent incidents. The dispute between the two men, which had reached a final breaking point, has begun to threaten the future of relations between the two parties first of all, and then relations between their leaders, President Camille Sham'un and Shaykh Pierre al-Juamayyil, who despite what had happened had continued to maintain contact, meetings between them to find a new formula for working together having been revealed. On more then one occasion they stressed their "eagerness" to continue cooperation between the two parties although this "eagerness" had not been translated into any actual agreement to put a stop to reports of an imminent break.

Persons who met with President Sham'un the week after the incidents felt that he was deeply bitter over the results of the clashes and, in talking with his visitors, went so far as to raise question marks about the goal sought by the Phalange Party in what happened in the eastern area. He revealed to confidants that he would prefer to dissolve the Liberals' military forces rather than merge them with those of the Phalange were the two parties unable to reach agreement to restore matters to the status quo prior to Monday, 7 July, that is, restoration of the centers, barracks and light and heavy weapons now in the hands of the Phalangists.

Was Dany Sham'un Quick or Overhasty?

President Sham'un also disclosed to visitors that the Liberal Party had lost the battle militarily and some of its key leaders had been killed but it had made political gains from it and so was now stronger morally and politically but weaker militarily.

He also told his visitors that he would make no "dramatic" decision under the pressure of emotion but would continue to study the issue from all angles in the hopes of reaching a solution. He, however, expressed fears that it would not be possible to erase what he termed "the effects of the massacre" at any early date which means that for the immediate future, the situation will remain neither pending nor settled between the Phalange and the Liberals.

While the position of the elder Sham'un is to maintain an acceptable moderation toward the Phalange, the stances of his son, Dany Sham'un, have imposed a new reality which cannot be ignored since he is drawing pictures of new alliances on the horizon of Lebanese political relations which could turn the situation upside down politically and militarily.

Sham'un, who abandoned his caution and spoke harsh words about the Phalange and its leader, Skaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, and his son, Bashir al-Jumayyil, has been quick to take positions offensive to the allies of yesterday. It would appear that he took these positions on purpose to achieve political victories to make up for the military loss he and his forces had suffered.

In addition to accusing the Phalange of a powergrab and describing its leaders as "criminals," Dany Sham'un moved quickly, some say too quickly, to try to attract a large measure of support from the "enemies of yesterday," or at least those who had not been in agreement with the "Lebanese Front." He began his contacts with Walid Junblat and reached agreement with him on an early meeting. He met in secret with Yasir 'Arafat, head of the PLO Executive Committee. He went north and met with Sulayman Franjiyah and talked comfortably about "the Phalangist fascist terrorism," "the domination of one party" and "the perpetrators of the Ihdin and al-Safra massacres."

Although he only spent a short time in the north, Dany was able to sketch out for the former president the preliminary bases for the establishment of "a national Christian front" that would move to oppose "the Phalangist plan aimed at partitioning Lebanon." He proposed as candidates for this front President Franjiyah, President Sham'un, Doyen Raymond Iddih and "all Christians who had been harmed" or "who had been dispossessed from the eastern areas. Reportedly the effective agreement which was reached with Franjiyah was to coordinate things in depth politically and militarily and to consolidate action to achieve the overall objective which Sham'un wanted as a working basis, that is, to oppose the Phalange Party.

Dany set forth the broad lines of these bases to Prime Minister al-Huss when he visited him one night. He was accompanied to al-Dawhah by a force from the Syrian special units which provided him protection starting from the Sim'an Gallery to al-Dawhah, passing through Sabra, al-Awza'i, Khalde, al-Shayyah, etc.

The Gallows or the Electric Chair

Dany did not confine his contacts within this framework but also contacted ex-Prime Minister Sa'ib Salam and officials in the Murabitun, as well as a number of resistance leaders. An observer could sense from the statements Sham'un reiterated in the meetings the degree of antipathy he had come to feel toward any dialogue with the Phalange, particularly with Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, who he said intended to establish the state of "(shakhbut)" and whom he described as "a war criminal who deserved the gallows or the electric chair." In his criticism, he did not spare Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil who he said was "a liar and rejected the stationing of the army because he was a (fi'wi)." However, in the positions which Dany adopted, he did not propose any specific formula as a basis for action to counter "the schemes of the Phalange" which means that this formula is still vague or needs clarification. The point he made in everything he did was to criticize the Phalange and reaffirm his willingness to oppose it politically and militarily, emphasizing the importance of forming a Christian front to resist "the fascist type Phalangist outreach."

Observers have taken a long look at the contradictory positions of the elder Sham'un and his son. The former is still stressing his continued relationship with the Phalange while the latter is predicting the early "end of the Phalange and the liberation of the eastern areas." They are wondering whether roles have been assigned or whether President Sham'un is not really convinced that the Phalange can be politically and militarily shaken at the present time.

On a par with the positions of Sham'un and his son are discordant stands held respectively by Skaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil and his two sons, Amin and Bashir. The former is apparently taking pains to keep relations between him and President Sham'un on clear and firm bases and he is prepared to concede anything the head of the Liberals wants. Amin is pursuing a similar course as reflected during the meetings which he has held with Sham'un and his son, Dany, despite the strong language and accusations which Dany has used, and, on more than one occasion, he has been careful to strss the failure of the policy of violence, warning against continuing the tragedy to the point of no return.

Bashir Talks About Dany

Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil has taken a position different from that of his father and brother although he is in agreement with them on the necessity of preserving the role of President Sham'un and his political weight. Shaykh Bashir, who is considered to be responsible for the Monday, 8 July operation, has been careful to say that what happened that day was to control the way things were getting out of hand in the eastern areas, a situation that, in his view, would lose more of the positions which had been held by the "Lebanese forces," such as Wadi Shahrur, 'Ayn al-Rumanah and Farn al-Shubbak, which the army had entered following the party clashes. He stressed that the purpose of "the 7 July operation" was to reconsolidate the military strength of the "Lebanese forces" in a new framework and to halt the illegal smuggling and port closures which the Liberals had been accused of being behind. Bashir al-Jumayyil recognizes the gravity and ramifications of the operation and says that the Phalange faces two choices: Either the Monday operation is the end of the Lebanese cause and the beginning of the catastrophe that could ensue, or it is the beginning of deliverance and a genuine unification and reorganization of existing forces, the Lebanese Front" and the Lebanese Forces."

Bashir al-Jumayyil placed great stress on denying any Phalangist desire to impose one-party control in the Christian areas or to succeed in imposing autonomous security, emphasizing at the same time that the army will enter the eastern areas only if it also enters the Islamic areas, the south, the Biqa' and the north. He felt that what happened on Monday, 7 July, "was nothing more than a restructuring of the armed presence in the eastern zone until the state can enter the other areas to discharge its responsibilities."

Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil does not conceal his annoyance at the stands of Dany Sham'un, saying that he acted too hastily in taking steps that will hurt him as a person and as a party. He also says that he tried repeatedly to persuade Dany that he must give up protecting certain elements who are trying to injure both parties but he refused and, in fact, covered up their activities. He feels that the clashes between the Phalange and the Liberals stem from the presence of a number of "strangers" whom the Liberal Party had "embraced" after the 2-year war, including the pan-Arabs, the Syrians, the Palestinians, the communists and the leftists. He says that they are behind every problem. Besides this, Bashir says that Dany had not coordinated things with "the Lebanese Forces" and had refused to take part in their meetings and activities which left the Liberals' participation in the field only token participation, things having been left to the Phalange.

However, Dany replies to this accusation by saying that "the Lebanese Forces" were never allied forces "since the Phalangist Military Council controlled them and used them to serve its own interests.

The fact is that there is an endless file of accusations back and forth and each side has its comments on the other which may or may not be true but they exist and the two sides have been constantly exchanging them during the past 2 weeks and the newspaper columns have been filled with "the dirty linen" of the allies of yesterday.

Terms of the Elder Sham'un

While the military situation has quieted on the Phalange-Liberals front since the former has been able to impose its authority in the field, the issue is still interacting politically in the midst of developments which indicate that there will be no speedy reunification of the two parties.

The leaderships of each party have been unable to emerge with a common solution to ensure renewed agreement and understanding. All the formulas proposed in this regard have failed because of the two conditions laid down by President Sham'un in connection with restoration of weapons and the centers still have received no clear Phalangist response, according to Liberal sources. The Phalange does not object to returning the centers but will not agree to hand over the "confiscated" weapons, the issue being in the hands of "the Lebanese Forces." There are successive party meetings with no result except the issuance of statements of the "hear and be cheery" type.

Basjir al-Jumayyil's Mini-State and Isolation

The Phalange-Liberals dispute goes further to involve other parties, particularly the Muslim side and "the Nationalist Movement." Both sides were startled at what happened in the eastern area and went on guard for fear that Bashir al-Jumayyil wanted to establish autonomous security as a forerunner to partition of the country. Outcries followed one another from every side demanding that the incidents be stopped and that Bashir al-Jumayyil's mini-state be prevented. Participating in the anti-Phalange campaigns were Prime Minister Salim al-Huss who forcefully attacked the Phalange, as well as "the Islamic Grouping," "The Front to Preserve the South," "The Nationalist Movement" and the Palestinian resistance. The latter was not cautious but rather plunged into the fray and 'Arafat accused Bashir al-Jumayyil of coordinating things with Begin. Even Damascus, through the information media there, attacked the Phalange, accusing it of "wanting unilateral control over the Christian areas and the imposition of partition in Lebanon."

These campaigns kept pace with the positions taken by Dany Sham'un and his opendoor posture toward the Islamic areas and their leaders to form a link in the chain of movements designed to "isolate" the Phalange once again, the late Kamal Junblatt having tried to isolate it the first time in 1976 adter the 'Ayn al-Rumanah incident, the spark that ignited the 2-year war.

Many individuals tried to hasten to apply the principle of isolation but there were others who held off from proceeding with this scheme because any negative attempt along this line would bring the Phalange the full support and sympathy of the Christians, as had happened 5 years ago, causing the plan to fail and the Christians to rally further around the Phalange. A number of leaders sensed that an advocated using another approach for action the outlines of which have not yet crystallized. Even the Phalange Party itself blocked any new attempt at isolation, laying down a two-pronged plan of movement covering both the local and Arab spheres to explain what ahppened in the eastern areas, one essential element being to contact Damascus to find out what it really thought about the incidents and their consequences.

At the same time the party wants to firm up its relations with the Armenians to reassure them and to set up coordination between the Phalange and their parties to avoid any clash or involvement, particularly since there have been many rumors that the Armenians might share the fate of the Liberals if they do not surrender their arms. The plan also provides for gradually removing the Phalangist presence" from the streets and making "the Lebanese Forces" carry the responsibility for controlling the security situation and the illegal closure of the ports--this was done last week--and for trying those persons accused of the excesses which were brought out by the killing, theft and looting.

Phalangist sources feel that such steps will calm the nerves of the citizens and persuade them that the objective of "the Monday, 7 July operation" was not to eliminate the Liberal Party as a rival party as much as it was to put a stop to the excesses and to the persons demanding payoffs who were [word not understood] under the aegis of the Liberals.

What Alliances, What Agreement?

However the questions that remain are what shape will the new alliances take if the Phalange and Liberal Parties do not reach agreement, and if this agreement is reached, will it remain a partial one as long as Dany Sham'un refuses to sit down at the same table with Bashir al-Jumayyil?

It is hard to answer this question because what happened in the eastern area reshuffled the deck but the cards have not been redealt in a proper and clear fashion. It is premature to say that some alliance can be established between Dany Sham'un and "the Nationalist Movement," for example, or with the resistance to isolate or oppose the Phalange because of their disparate points on a number of issues. Moreover, Walid Junblatt is still moving slowly on reviving relations with Dany or even opening any speedy or effective dialogue. He has been so cautious that he has not invited Dany to visit al-Mukhtarah or the Shuf, for example, although Dany announced that he was prepared to go to this area and to Dayr al-Qamr in particular. Yasir 'Arafat, according to informed sources, tried to persuade Walid Junblatt that it would be beneficial to revive the dialogue with Dany Sham'un but he has not gotten any final, positive response.

With regard to an alliance with Damascus, the specific elements are lacking at the present time to bring it about because it is not enough for the Liberal Party "to be at odds" with the Phalange to restore normal relations with Syria.

The Possible Alliance Expected by Sham'un

There is still the question of an alliance with President Franjiyah. This could come about but it is still in a purely Christian framework because Dany Sham'un refuses to resume any dialogue with Prime Minister Rashid Karami who he regards as responsible for what happened during the 2-year war and, because of this position, categorically refused to visit him while he was in the north.

The fact is that there are attempts underway to create "some sort of a front or grouping" in which Dany Sham'un would be one of the key people since it has become difficult to relaunch relations with the Phalange despite the efforts being made along this line by Deputy Amin al-Jumayyil. During the latter's meetings with Dany Sham'un a few days ago, he took pains to emphasize the necessity of halting the media campaigns and resuming a dialogue in a calm climate, stressing that any solution must preserve the honor of all parties concerned.

However, in the view of observers, the real thing stopping the establishment of any new alliances at the present stage is that President Sham'un is continuing to hold to his positions toward the Phalange Party and is keeping a dialogue going with Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil. As long as he has not cut off the dialogue, the establishment of any new alliance or front with his son Dany as one of the key players would be ineffective because President Sham'un is still the flagship for the real Christain leadership and no one but he can take any fundamental or decisive position. The former president is still keeping an eye on the situation and, in anticipation of developments, has made no final decision.

Phalangist observers feels that given the present "no position" situation, Sham'un may be able to extract some "profits" from the Phalange which he might have lost or might be unable to extract were he to adopt a final position, whether negative or positive. Accordingly, for him to stay in al-Ashrafiyah and not to leave it is profiting him a lot and is making the Phalange take care to be responsive to him because, were he to decide to leave al-Ashrafiyah for another area, the Phalange would then lose a lot of the political cover it is still enjoying because of Sham'un's non-negative stand on what happened. This has prompted the former president to state frankly to the key players in his party that he is stronger politically because he now enjoys the support of those who do not support the Phalange, plus the support of those who originally supported him and the Phalange as well.

Until President Sham'un reaches a final decision, the situation will remain as it is, fluctuating between meetings and contacts and studying solutions and proposals. However there are apprehensions about any military development to which some will turn if the attempts to establish alliances fail and any military action would plunge the country into a civil war, the signs of which are looming on the horizon following the statements by Dany Sham'un which were supported by a number of "the new allies."

What about the position of the state?

On the surface the state is neutral. President Elias Sarkis has stated that he wants to deploy the army to the areas which saw the fighting but he said that this would be done only with the consensus of the parties concerned. He is still awaiting a positive response from the Phalange Party set as a prerequisite for the army to enter "its areas" that the army be deployed in the western area. Until this complication is resolved, Sarkis has been careful to announce that the state rejects any sort of autonomy, as a direct response to the intention of "the Lebanese Forces" to form a national guard, police, etc.

Anticipation of any development, a question remains: Will the contacts now going on behind the scenes be useful in softening the position of Dany Sham'un, restoring the rapproachement between the military wing in the Phalange and Liberal Parties, or will these efforts fail and contact between the Liberals and the Phalange on the political level throught the heads of the two parties continue until one of the leaders of the military wings of the two parties is able to overcome the other?

In such a situation, what alliances could be produced by the war between the two parties which was characterized by the radio station of "the Lebanese Forces" as "the 7 July Movement" which it talked about as if it was a rectification movement.

These are questions that may find answers soon.

SHIITE LEADER DISCUSSES TRIP TO IRAN, PROBLEM OF SOUTH LEBANON

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 27 Jun 80 pp 12-14

[Interview with Shiite leader Shaykh Muhammad Shams al-Din, by Amin al-Siba'i, in Beirut on 26 Jun 80]

[Text] Shaykh Muhammad Shams al-Din went on an official visit to Iran to spend 2 weeks beginning on 15 May. He spent a whole month there and was still not able to finish all his business. He will return to Iran to complete discussions he has started and to participate in two conferences that will be held there soon.

Aside from his personal belongings, the vice-chairman of the Higher Islamic Shiite Council carried on his trip a number of files related to several issues. The most important of these, of course, is the "problem of the south [of Lebanon]."

Upon his return to Lebanon last week, his house in al-Dawhah was packed with crowds of clerics and politicians of various denominations. He was showered with questions about the results of his discussions in Iran, especially since these discussions took place with Imam Khomeyni, President Abol Hasan Bani-Sadr and other Iranian officials, and involved Islamic and Arab problems, including the Palestinian problem and the dangers threatening south Lebanon.

It took Shaykh Muhammad Mahdi Shams al-Din a full week to explain the results of his visit to Iran and answer all questions, despite his urgent need for a period of rest, which he said he will not be able to take before the fall. Those who sought specific answers to their questions actually represented various groups and classes.

When AL-HAWADITH visited him at his home on 26 June with a long list of questions, the vice chairman of the Shiite Council was explaining to a large group of ulema [Islamic scholars] his views on the nature of objective, realistic handling of the crisis in the south and of relations with the government and the Palestinian resistance. He then moved to a circle of delegates from the Ba'labakk area, then to a circle of American University students, and after that, to a succession of groups, including delegations from various areas of the south.

Shaykh Shams al-Din enjoyed answering all the questions. While he was passing on information, his children were offering Iranian sweets made of "Manna," which the Iranians call "Gaz."

In the course of the never-ending questions, one of the ulema asked: "Where does our crisis stand, and how do you see it now in the light of the clashes and incidents that occurred while you were in Iran?"

Shaykh Shams al-Din answered: "The phase of fatalism and defeatism in the ranks and souls of Shiite Muslims is over. It will never return, despite the efforts of some to restore it. We have been reborn and we will continue to grow along diverse but clear lines in an Islamic environment. Our position will not be as proposed early in 1975, but will be a receptive cultural position.

"The second issue is the Arab national question. The state has to aim at wiping out mistakes in the actual conduct of its business, and to provide justice for people in all walks of life. Lebanon is part of the Arab world. AL-HAWADITH published an article I wrote over 2 years ago in which I said in discussing our problem that 'Lebanon is part of the Arab world with equal rights and obligations.'

"The driving force behind this loyalty is a combination of factors, including fear. We hope everybody believes us when we say that we are afraid. We have fears regarding our political fate in the face of the dangers surrounding the south and the dangers of occupation, partition and resettlement [of the Palestinians]. We seriously consider the matter of resettlement to be a real danger which was previously implicit in international maneuvering regarding the Palestinian problem and the Middle East. After "Camp David," resettlement became the principal element in the situation and in the objective of these agreements.

"Reference to the issue of resettlement gives rise to angry reactions or hurt feelings. But we bring it up, not to embarrass or condemn any side, but to warn against it and work to prevent it from happening.

"We would not be the only victims of resettlement. The Lebanese south and its people would not be its only victims. The Palestinian cause itself would also be its victim. This has been said many times but has not been understood very well. Honestly and truly, resettlement would be the graveyard of the Palestinian cause and of justifications for continuing the Palestinian struggle. This is because if resettlement took place here, it would not stop here, but would develop into a basis for a solution [of the Palestine problem] in all the Arab countries. The Palestine question would be done with and would turn into a cause of hollow slogans lacking a popular or political base.

"Resettlement would undoubtedly mark the beginning of a chain reaction all over the Middle East region. I would advise you to refer back to the Sykes-Picot agreement, to the Paris Peace Conference and to the projects to divide up the region on the basis of sectarian and tribal affiliations. All these projects would be revived by this [Palestinian resettlement] operation. It would be like throwing a rock into a quiet peaceful lake to create new waves which open the way for intervention by the big powers."

We asked Shaykh Shams al-Din: "Is it possible for you to shed more light on the Arab attitude or [sense of] responsibility in this regard?

[Answer] Unfortunately, the Arab mentality has grown accustomed to hold out in the face of problems until the last minute, and then to try to solve them at any cost, just to create an imaginary sense of relief, even if this generates greater and more serious problems. I imagine that we are now facing our destiny with this kind of mentality.

At least we, in Lebanon, will not allow this type of mentality to prevail. We will never allow that.

[Question] How? What capabilities do you have to confront this situation?

[Answer] The capabilities are that we exist and our political resistance exists. It will be enough for us to say "No," to hold on to our land and to return our refugees to their land despite all opposing forces.

[Question] From a practical point of view and with a few exceptions, the Arab position with regard to south Lebanon appears to be neutral, if this is the right expression. The Palestinian Resistance discussed the resettlement problem during the Damascus conference, and regard some of those who inflate the issue as intent on discrediting the true intentions of the resistance. The Resistance emphasized their clear commitment to refuse all forms of resettlement and to continue the fight to recover the land seized by Israel. What is the practical way to prevent the resettlement from taking place?

[Answer] This is what the Palestinians say, of course, and we are glad to hear it once again. I have heard this several times from the Palestinian brothers. It is important to find the political means to make this talk an existing political reality and not just a media slogan. Of course, I will seize the first opportunity to meet with Palestinian leaders, as there are many things that must be reexamined. The political formula is to refer to the facts. We face a security and political setup in the south which neither serves the political security of the south nor really serves the Palestinian resistance.

We know that the south is currently divided into three zones: The Israeli zone, the U.N. zone, and the Palestinian zone in a specific area. This is one reality. The other reality is that there are at least 200,000 [Lebanese] refugees from the south who live away from it. The frightening thing about this reality is that these people are forced to start a new life from scratch wherever they are now at. This includes economic life, social life, and adaptation to a new political environment. This is what we call "effective migration." At the same time, these people left behind them a void in the south. In this void, a new life, or parasites will grow. Or, the Israelis will have the political opportunity to deal with a vacant land in the manner that suits them best.

There is another reality which we all face. This is the reality of international political moves in line with "Camp David" and the substitute [schemes] that are currently being prepared. These moves are looking for a solution for the Middle East problem which would safeguard the raw material concessions enjoyed by the Western world. In my opinion, the price of this solution is Lebanon, particularly south Lebanon. We do not want to say that we can perform miracles, but there are possibilities of facing this danger. These possibilities begin with the Lebanese southerner living in the south and remaining on his southern land. If it means his death, let him die in the south. This is our concept of accepting life with minimal security.

Last winter we were faced with the catastrophe of new waves of refugees and campaigns to vacate the south and force its people to face the hazards of a new life elsewhere. We faced the possibility of maximum security in the south. This would mean elimination of any Palestinian presence in the south, and surrender to the political aspirations of imperialism against our Palestinian cause. It would mean fulfillment of the Israelis' wishes. We openly and loudly rejected such maximum security.

We were content with minimum security. This meant that after 30 years of hardship, and until the bitter end, we would continue to bear the dangers, anxieties and responsibilities of the Palestinian problem. It meant continued human, economic and other sacrifices for this problem. Being agreeable to live with a minimal state of security would allow the southern refugees to return to their cities and villages, and restore economic activity to the south, which would give the people work opportunities and a chance to rebuild their lives and hold out.

Steadfastness cannot be achieved by refugees in the streets of Beirut, but from within the south. The existing situation is one of defeat not steadfastness. Refugees are clear proof of defeat, while steadfastness means giving the people a chance to remain on their land and continue living, not safely, but in the shadow of danger. We have practiced steadfastness in the shadow of danger for 30 years, and we are ready to continue to do so for another 30 years. I believe that if we honestly deal with political realities in Lebanon we can find a formula for minimal security through the state and its agencies, if possible, or without the state until it becomes capable of providing it.

The south is now divided into three spheres, has three political identities, has no actual government authority, and lives in the shadow of Israel's refusal to maintain the truce agreement. The Israeli slogan is: "The south is a land with no master." I believe that by staying put and maintaining the present situation, we actually pave the way to lose the south and offer it as a new hostage to Israel, thus dispersing its people and turning them into refugees. Would this serve the Palestinian cause? Would it serve Arab nationalism? Would it serve the security of the area? I do not think the answer is positive to any of these questions.

The present situation is another defeat for the Palestinian cause and a new defeat for the Arab cause. It will create an atmosphere for sectarian and tribal partition in the area. It mainly serves the American purpose of keeping the area boiling until the late 1980s; until alternative energy sources are discovered to replace oil; or until the area is reorganized in a way that guarantees the continuous flow of petroleum.

Political wisdom is that which avoids catastrophes, not that which runs after them. Political wisdom is that politicians should avoid making mistakes, not make mistakes under the influence of imaginary success, and later try to remedy the results of such "success," as Arab politicians have done in the past. They tried to remedy disappointments in Palestine in 1936. Then they tried to remedy them with defeats in 1948, followed by setbacks in 1956, and disaster in 1967. It seems to me that the Arab mentality continues to subject reality to a romantic or poetic approach. The sad thing is that, in the past, this mentality was guided by morality and honesty. But now, I am sorry to say, it has lost the sense of honesty even with itself. Its characteristics have become hypocrisy and deceit, rather than innocence and honesty.

[Question] Your visit to Iran was long and took place during difficult Lebanese and Arab situations. It raised various questions which call for clarification of the truth and revelation of the results of your discussions with Imam Khomeyni and other Iranian high officials about the situation in south Lebanon and the possibility of finding new formulas to deal with this crisis.

[Answer] I begin with the results of the visit to say that, thank God, it was very successful. It received all the necessary political (answers?). Our visit to Imam Khomeyni and his welcome was one of our great pleasures. The meeting was characterized by great concern and exceptional care on the part of Khomeyni, which exceeded our expectations. He clearly and firmly revealed his great and continuing concern about the provision of security to Muslims in Lebanon, and, in particular, to Muslims in South Lebanon, as it is the area exposed to danger. All Iranian leaders share this same care and concern. They realize very well that any dangers affecting the destiny of south Lebanon would not stop at the Lebanese borders, but would spread to the rest of the area. They feel that these dangers cannot be resisted with hollow fantasies, but with effective action based on reality. Any political action must be based on facts.

[Question] Did Imam Khomeyni and the Iranian officials contemplate any definite moves relating to south Lebanon?

[Answer] They see the Israeli threat to the south as one of the leading threats to which they themselves are exposed, because the Israeli danger is a danger to the whole region. The weakest point is the south of Lebanon. They are willing to face this danger the way we decide to face it. The Iranian minister of foreign affairs clearly expressed the Iranian view when he visited Lebanon. Understanding the situation would never mean making peace with Israel. It means confrontation, but it must be confrontation which takes into account the objective dictates of reality.

[Question] You just said that the southern Lebanese refugee must return to his land. This would require the availability of the necessary resources to hold out, such as weapons, economic aid, political action, and the ability to rebuild social life. Without these elements, the southerner can neither bear the woes of war, hold out and fight resettlement and partitioning, or support the Palestinian struggle. How can the southerner be induced to return [to the south], and what are the possibilities of his getting help? Is he going to be urged to revolt or embark on a holy war?

[Answer] Yes. The southerners will return, and it is their duty to do so. With what spirit will they return? They will return with a defiant spirit, not the spirit of someone who is going to lead an easy life. They will have what we called the minimum level of security which allows steadfastness. We have to think first of use of the resources of the Lebanese state to support this steadfastness. This is a matter which we have previously discussed with the government and will work on now. The government has enough funds allocated to the south. We are not satisfied at all with the way these funds are spent. We believe that these funds should be allocated to civil defense organizations and to build a steadfast life, not for peaceful development. The responsibility of supporting steadfastness is ours as individuals and as a state. Of course, steadfastness has a religious war connotation; there should be no doubt about that. But we must understand, and hope our brothers inside and outside Lebanon will also understand, that this religious war readiness also serves as a positive element in Lebanese politics. This does not mean alienation from others, but the addition of a spiritual element that will add vitality to steadfastness and Lebanese safety. What is Iran's role? Of course, our brothers in Iran know and declare that their duty is to be ready and present in this domain.

[Question] What kind of presence?

[Answer] What kind of presence are you asking about?

[Question] Presence means the presence of men, or of material support, or of moral or other type of support. Does it not?

[Answer] We have repeatedly stated with regard to the presence of men, that we are not in need of the element of men to defend the south. In Iran, they are aware of their political responsibility with regard to the political fate of Lebanon, and the fate of the Muslims of Lebanon in particular. This is a very clear point in their minds. I say that the south is the object of attention by virtue of its being Lebanese as well as Muslim. They are aware that the south is not in need of men to defend it, because its own men who are concerned about it will be in charge of its protection.

[Question] How do you visualize the new relationship with the Palestinian resistance in the light of the consequences of the clashes that occurred in the southern suburb of Beirut while you were in Iran?

[Answer] I was following the sad news from the suburbs of Beirut practically on a daily basis. They were, of course, painful and very frightening. There were similar incidents in the past, and I am afraid there will be more in the future, as long as some groups aim at and seek to kill the new spirit of rebirth I talked to you about at the beginning of this interview. Through propaganda and assaults, it is intended to turn two political illusions into facts which can be easily exploited. The first illusion is repeatedly raised on diverse occasions in relation to a Sunni-Shiite sectarian problem. The second illusion is also frequently aired with regard to a Shiite-Palestinian problem. There is constant pressure to stir up rumors about the existence of a Shiite-Sunni problem and a Shiite-Palestinian clash. These are all illusions which some try to turn into facts. I say with absolute confidence, as I have already said to some political leaders, that there is no sectarian crisis or problem among the Muslims. The simple Muslim does not carry within himself any political problem. These are all illusions that some politicians have, because they can only survive by using scare tactics and appointing themselves as protectors of one sect or another. I say to those: "The Muslims are in good shape. The gentle, simple Muslims who espouse the cause of Islam do not base their political beliefs on being Sunnis or Shiites. Their thinking may be related to the region or environment they live in. But, in general, they think as Muslims and as Lebanese. I view with great suspicion the stirring up of fears over Islamic unity. Muslim politicians are called upon to work with one another as Muslims. Their groups should not work against one another as if each group represented a different nation, creating rifts and scars among the people. I am confident of the safety of the unity of Muslims in Lebanon--ideological, cultural as well as political. We are working to protect this unity and to express it in various ways.

The second illusion is the Shiite-Palestinian problem. There is a southern problem related to the security of the Lebanese southerner, whatever religion or sect he may belong to. In the Bika', there is no Shiite problem of destiny. In the south, there is a Lebanese, not a Shiite problem of destiny. The Shiites exist not only in south Lebanon, but throughout the country's regions. Why do people talk about a problem between the Shiites and the Palestinians? The problem in the south is a result of the particulars of the Palestinian presence in Lebanon. It also arises from the fact that Palestine is on the borders of Lebanon. Since the majority of the Lebanese southerners are Shiites, they are the ones who are the most affected by this problem. This brings us to our call to condition Palestinian activity in the south. I say frankly that the purpose of this is not to force the Palestinians out of the south. Its purpose is to ensure a minimum level of security, to overcome the dangers of living there, and to live with the intention of holding out. I cannot ignore the fact that we do have a problem, but we did not create it. We have to face it with the objective facts that we have frequently overlooked in the past. We have often thought that we could bypass these facts only to discover at the end that we cannot.

The southern-Palestinian relationship will [always] exist. It will be governed by considerations of Jihad, steadfastness and loyalty to the Palestinian cause. But to be able to stay in control of this relationship and to direct it along a national and Islamic course, our Palestinian brothers must assist us. We cannot work alone to keep this relation strong and sound. We need their help to remain the advocates of the Palestinians in Lebanon, and remain capable of inducing ourselves and our people to pay the tax for steadfastness and bear its consequences in terms of human and economic risks. As to the clashes that have taken place, I have conclusively determined that we were the victims. We were attacked. The only thing is that this time we did not keep quiet. Of course, we have bitter criticism for some of those with whom we shared the same trenches. But this criticism will remain in our heart and conscience, and we will not express it to anyone. This method of dealing with each other cannot continue. It would serve no one.

These clashes, in which we were assaulted, were intended to break our new spirit and extinguish it. But this will not happen. We are doing our best to prevent more clashes, even if we are wronged, because we realize that such clashes do not serve national stability, the Islamic cause, or the Palestinian cause. They only serve Israel and the enemies of Islam, be they inside or outside the country. Clashes are not in our interest at all. Everybody knows that since 1975, we, in the Higher Islamic Shiite Council, have not hesitated to toe the most difficult line of not getting involved in unrest, and not taking sides. This is because we believed that political reform to do justice to the Muslims cannot be accomplished through violence, but through civilian political action.

Our stand has not changed. Our involvement in 1975 and the following years will not be repeated. This painful war which takes place every once in a while in Beirut or the south is caused by those who benefit from it. Why are southern villages shelled for no reason? Why is the southerner insulted and his pride and freedom suppressed? Why can't the southerner express his opinion freely and clearly?

Who benefits from this military and intellectual repression? It only serves to promote despair and devilish ideas which cause deep splits within partisans of the same camp and objective. Why is one specific village surrounded and bombed as if it was an enemy village? Why is war declared on a whole quarter or a whole village, if only one person is suspected of doing wrong?

Who does this serve? We know that it serves to continue the discord in Lebanon. It maintains the benefits and effectiveness of those who take advantage of destruction and discord. We will not allow this. We will never allow it. We will not allow the south or the Beirut suburbs to be victimized. There is no power on earth that can force us to accept humiliation or suppression of freedom and dignity. No, we will never allow that. We are exerting every effort to prevent the renewal of abject sedition, and we ask God to help us in this. We also hope all our brothers will help us.

[Question] Dr Waldheim was clear in his last report when he held Sa'd Haddad responsible for obstructing a solution in the south. What is your opinion on the deteriorating situation resulting from the Israeli policy applied by Haddad?

[Answer] The Israeli occupation phenomenon in south Lebanon, called the Sa'd Haddad phenomenon, is the basic cause of the disasters and risks that south Lebanon is subjected to. It gives political and security justification for the continued tragedy of the south. It is a phenomenon that no one should allow to continue and it should be resisted with all means and methods. The first thing we can think of are the reactionary political elements which find ways to justify their silence about this phenomenon inside Lebanon. There are Lebanese political forces which bear a great responsibility for providing justification and cover for the continuation of this phenomenon and finding imaginary reasons for its existence. It should be looked at not as a Lebanese phenomenon of departure from normality, but as a real Israeli occupation covered up by a number of Lebanese who should rectify their attitude. If they do, we will be in a better position to deal with the situation in the south than we are now.

What means does Sa'd Haddad use to spread his influence beyond its strip and into and beyond the UN forces' zone? We are seriously looking into this dangerous reality and reject it as we did from the beginning. We call on all people in Lebanon to stand in the face of this phenomenon and fight it in any possible way to free Lebanon from the Israeli occupation that hides behind the name of Sa'd Haddad.

[Question] What is new in the case of the disappearance of Imam Musa al-Sadr?

[Answer] Imam Musa al-Sadr's case was naturally a major topic in all my discussions in Iran with Imam Khomeyni, president Bani-Sadr, government and political leaders in Qum and Tehran, and various Islamic parties and revolutionary guards. Our Iranian brothers consider Imam al-Sadr as one of their deep and main concerns. Adversaries of this case who imagine that the Iranians are not very concerned about it will discover that they are wrong. The difficult questions about this case will be asked by our Iranian brothers. We have to appreciate the great problems that the Islamic revolution is facing in Iran and which sometimes make some people think that the Imam al-Sadr case has been shelved. I was happy to realize that it was not in the shade, but under a bright light. It is a matter of deep concern and has reached the Majlis and the Islamic Consultative Council. It is and will remain on its agenda. As soon as this council convenes, the Imam's case will be on its agenda among major Iranian and Islamic issues. The investigation committee, which was going to investigate [the Imam's disappearance] and was delayed due to certain complications, will be reestablished to begin its mission. There are many other ideas under discussion regarding this case.

[Question] Is there any new information in Iran about the fate of Imam al-Sadr and his two companions?

[Answer] I cannot specifically say there is information. But if we carefully, or even not so carefully, review Imam Khomeyni's expressions during his talks with us, they clearly point to the fact that Imam Khomeyni has great hope in his heart that Imam Musa al-Sadr is safe. Frankly, he prayed for his safety, saying: "May God keep him safe." We know that Imam Khomeyni does not speak at random. This prayer is only said for the living. Imam Khomeyni, in his elevated position, has access to far more facts and hypotheses than we have.

RADAR DETECTION OF TERRORISTS--UNIFIL troops in southern Lebanon have recently begun to use sophisticated radar to detect terrorist squads. UNIFIL has over 60 radars in its 8 battalions. Our military correspondent Shmu'el Tal reports: UN troops have recently begun to adopt a firm attitude toward the terrorists in southern Lebanon. They are carrying out ambushes and surprise patrols at day and night even in locations they did not check in the past. The Norwegian soldiers are accompanied by trained dogs in their night patrols and have scored several successes. The latest innovation introduced by UNIFIL is a sophisticated radar to detect forces moving on the ground. As said, the UN has over 60 radars of this kind. They enable UNIFIL's permanent positions and patrols to follow terrorist movement during the day and at night even if they move through wadis. The radar also makes it possible to track vehicles at night and to distinguish between caterpillar vehicles and cars equipped with rubber wheels. The miniature ground radar has a range of several hundred meters, depending on topographic conditions. We were told that the radar is very effective. DECISIONS AFFECTING PUBLIC CORPORATIONS--Nouakchott, 25 Sep (AFP)--A compulsory annual profit will be set for the public and semi-public corporations in Mauritania, the military committee of national salvation (CMSN), the ruling power of Mauritania, decided at the end of an ordinary session. This measure falls within the framework of the improvement of the operations of public and mixed status corporations, an official communique states. The CMSN on the other hand, has recommended the broadening of the jurisdiction of the special military court of justice so that it can handle acts of embezzlement of public funds, corruption and maladministration. The CMSN also recommended a linking of the cities of Nouakchott and Nouadhibou (northwest) with the international telecommunications network; the development of selective tourism which preserves the cultural, moral and religious values of the society; the integration of the information sector within the process of development strategy, as well as the establishment of a compulsory national service for all young Mauritanians who wish to continue their studies on the state's account. SOCIALIST FEDERATION OFFICIAL DISCUSSES DOMESTIC THREATS

/Article by Khalil al-Taqi: "A Talk with the Syrian Socialist Union Party Assistant Secretary General, Safwan al-Qudsi: What We Are Experiencing Is More Serious Than Assassination Attempts"/

/Text/ Although Mr Safwan Qudsi was not appointed minister in the Syrian Arab Republic cabinet of Dr 'Abd-al-Ra'uf al-Kasam formed after the cabinet of Mr Muhammad 'Ali al-Halabi, which resigned in the wake of the Seventh Regional Conference of the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party--which political observers considered an important, illuminating prominent point in the history of the party because it came at a time when Syria was going through its most intense struggle domestically and in the Arab and international contexts since the dawn of independence--Safwan Qudsi has not ceased his political activity. Indeed, he has developed it, in order to take care of all details and seek out its true and grave dimensions. Mr al-Qudsi has marshalled his literary resources on behalf of the nation's struggle, from his position as a writer who has a specific vision of Arab nationalism and the unity of the Arab nation.

In a meeting with Mr Safwan Qudsi, editor in chief of the magazine AL-MAWQIF AL-ADABI, which is issued by the Federation of Arab Writers in Syria, and the assistant secretary general of the Arab Socialist Union party, he says:

"What is happening on the Syrian stage, in its capacity as the center of the struggle, and the plotters' goal of trying to destroy it, is more serious than the assassination acts which a wayward group is carrying out against important figures in the country under a factional covering which Syria did not experience in the past, cannot accept at present and will not embrace in the future. It is deeper than the sabotage acts and explosions to which various economic institutions have been exposed since the Egyptian president started his peace voyage and went over to the ranks of the enemies of our Arab nation, alongside racist Zionism and American imperialism.

"Counterrevolution is not just a political term; it is at the same time an intellectual and cultural one.

"In fact I can go beyond that and say that before counterrevolution declares itself in one political form or another, it declares itself in one intellectual and cultural form or another. It starts with an idea and culture in order to end up with a policy.

"In this sense, counterrevolution is preparing for its political outburst with an intellectual and cultural one. It breaks out intellectually and culturally, then politically."

Brainwashing

Mr Safwan Qudsi continued his discussion on the counterrevolution, saying,

"I am trying to state that counterrevolution does not flinch from preparing for its political action through cultural and political action. It disappears from sight politically but always engages in intellectual and cultural activity. When the suitable moment arrives, counterrevolution also starts to pursue its political activity as well.

"Thus one can say that counterrevolution always exists, exists in one form or another, but declares itself politically only after it has prepared the stage. It declares itself only after it has engaged in a group brainwashing process which it carries out in one sector or another.

"I can go a step beyond that and say that, in confronting this counterrevolution, our efforts must proceed along a path which is parallel to our political efforts.

"Why?

"Because as long as the counterrevolution is an intellectual and cultural fact, it will quickly declare itself politically when it finds that the time has become ripe for such a declaration, and the real revolution, which counterrevolution was established only to react to and enter blatant confrontation with, must take into account the fact that political action will be sufficiently effective and influential only when it relies on a clear intellectual and cultural foundation which will result in no form of ambivalence or misunderstanding.

"In order for this intellectual and cultural action, which we say constitutes the natural prelude to political action, to be sufficiently effective and influential, it must be based on a group of facts.

"It is correct that we cannot set ourselves apart from others through fanaticism or one dimensional vision.

"It is also correct that we cannot allow ourselves to be transformed into racehorses with blinkered eyes obsessed with revolving around themselves.

"This is all correct, but it is also correct that we must have clear vision which will allow us to retain our intellectual identity and cultural personality, because, without this identity, without this cultural personality, our political existence will appear fragile and breakable.

"When one of us proceeds to look closely into the written and unwritten history of major revolutions, he quickly puts his hand on a fact, the gist of which is that these revolutions would not have got where they did had they not completed the formulation of their intellectual identity and cultural personality. This intellectual identity and cultural personality are the cornerstone of any revolutionary structure which wishes to achieve major national and social goals. It is the basis of this cultural personality, and the basis of its existence which any political edifice is built upon. Indeed, it is a base without whose existence there can be no decisive political action."

The Shot and the Voice

Mr Safwan Qudsi, continuing his discussion with AL-QABAS, says:

"More than that, counterrevolution is not a political expression of a single intellectual trend, it often is an expression of mutually opposed intellectual trends, which, however, are all in agreement on one goal, which is to bring down the revolution.

"The difference, which is really striking, is that the forces of counterrevolution are in agreement over a single goal which they will not dispute under any circumstance; the goal over which the forces of counterrevolution are in agreement is a stupid hostility to Arab nationalism in all its political and social aspirations and ambitions. It is true that our partisanship of Arab nationalism has various roots, but it is also true that the partisanship is of a force which causes these mutually conflicting and contradictory forces to be in agreement over a single goal, which is to bring down the national socialist revolution.

"After that, let me move on another step and state that it is incumbent on us, in confronting this counterrevolution, to act in two directions at once.

"These two directions are the liquidation of the intellectual and cultural base of the counterrevolution and the construction of the intellectual and cultural base of the national socialist revolution. Indeed, one cannot basically liquidate the intellectual and cultural basis of the /counter/ revolution without starting to build the intellectual and cultural base of the national socialist revolution.

"In a previous discussion I said that the counterrevolution is not just a shot fired from the barrel of a gun but is much greater than that.

"Let us clarify the matter as follows: the shot fired from the barrel of a gun is only the last quarter hour of a 24-hour day. It is the last page of a book which contains hundreds of pages.

"In this sense, one can say that this shot is not the counterrevolution but is the voice by which the counterrevolution declares itself.

"I am trying to say that the counterrevolution is not just a passing fancy, a fleeting fit, temporary stupidity or a momentary technique--it is an organized effort which is ultimately expected to realize a political objective, one result of which will be to turn the table upside down and make us walk on our heads rather than our feet, performing a collective brainwashing and making our muscles grow at the expense of our minds.

"More than that, the counterrevolution is not a random shot in the air but a shot at a specific target, which when it hits it will result in destroying this genuine experiment in national and domestic action, knocking out the sensitive nerves in a body which is trying, as much as it can and is able to do so, to make something of significance. It is a shot in the direction of our national experiment, in which, no matter how much talk is made about it, the positive outweighs the negative. It is a shot in the direction of our social experiment, of which President Hafiz al-Asad has made a statement whose gist is that to build a society with one class, that is, to dissolve the differences between the classes, which was the favored expression of the great leader Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir, is the objective and destination of this experiment."

Rearranging the Chemical Composition of the Arab Mind

Mr Safwan Qudsi continues his talk by saying,

"Then the counterrevolution does not arise in a vacuum. It is founded on an intellectual and cultural base which is founded on reducing the stature of our national values, reducing the significance of our social struggle, and stirring up doubts on the effort exerted to build our national experiment.

"In this sense, the counterrvolution is not a social structure or economic formation alone--it is, first and foremost, an intellectual and cultural structure.

"Building on this statement, one can say that it is through thought and culture that we build, that is, through intellectual structure comes the beginning.

"The social or economic base on which the counterrevolution is founded is not the only thing which one must work to extirpate and uproot; there is also the intellectual and cultural base. When the counterrevolution succeeds in snaring a given citizen and strengthening a given group, that means we have not given thought and culture the attention they deserve.

"When the counterrevolution proceeds with attempts which are made to rearrange the chemical composition of the Arab mind, when the counterrevolution proceeds in its attempts to carry out a collective brainwashing and when the counterrevolution continues in its efforts to ensnare the Arab mind and deprive it of its history and its national reality:

"When the counterrevolution does all this, the response to it is to smash its intellectual and cultural foundation and build an alternative one, the foundation of national socialist revolution.

"Once again, the counterrevolution is not a social structure, or an economic structure, alone, but, at the same time, is an intellectual structure and a cultural organization.

"When the counterrevolution is an intellectual structure and a cultural organization, venturing on a decisive confrontation with it will take place through reliance on an intellectual structure and cultural organization which will have the effect of extirpating this counterrevolution by its deepest roots, by which I mean the intellectual and cultural ones."

Yes to a Review, Not a Regression

Mr Safwan Qudsi, the assistant secretary general of the Arab Socialist Union party in Syria, talks about the causes which led to the removal of Fawzi al-Kayyali from the party command at the beginning of last May, saying:

"It is not my nature to give in to attempts to force me to change my intellectual and political convictions, and it is not my nature to surrender to any heated efforts to make me decide to change my ideas at the same speed as I change my clothes.

"At a certain time, some people who were afflicted with the symptoms of intellectual and political confusion intended to make attempts of this type, and the effect of yielding to it would have been to make me, in turn, fall under the influence of this political intellectual confusion and consequently to make me move from the position in which I am standing to a totally different one.

"When I was engaged in a dialogue with those certain people on a given subject, I made statements which were limpid in their clarity, namely that I do not adhere to any idea, or any position, except insofar as I possessed the deep-rooted conviction that this idea is still correct to some degree and that this position is still based on solid ground--indeed, I made more intensely clear statements, which were that I was prepared to review my convictions when I felt that there was something calling for such a review, and when I felt that these convictions were no longer firm in my mind and conscience in a manner which made me most secure in them.

"When I expressed this readiness to conduct this review, I immediately realized that what was expected of me was to regress, not to review. This was beyond what I could bear or endure.

"It is true that I am not like people who are content to be lax in the face of intellectual and political persuasions which do not evolve or change.

"It is true that I am not among the partisans of this intellectual and political certainty, which I view as a malady which we must not allow to destroy our minds and consciousnesses.

"However, it is also true that I am not one of those people who fall lightly under the influence of any form of intellectual and political opportunism, or any style of viewing ideas as being no more than a piece of clothing which we take off and put on whenever we want.

"It was clear that these certain people who were afflicted with this intellectual and political confusion accepted nothing less than that I strip myself of all my convictions and put new ones in my mind which would have the effect of making me a new being which my self would reject and my being would loathe.

"Should I say more than that?

"Should I say that this intellectual and political confusion prompted those certain people who were afflicted with it to declare ideas and positions of which the least that could be said is that their links with their national roots are severed?

"Shall I say that this political and intellectual confusion has made these certain people continue to exert efforts which it is hoped will spread this confusion to every mind by contagion?

"Shall I state that this intellectual and political confusion has caused these people to proceed to make efforts which it is hoped will cause a given party organization to reject its history, to turn itself inside out and to leave its skin?

"However, some of us still are immune from this intellectual and political confusion.

"If a given head has been afflicted by this confusion, many other heads are still able to retain their equilibrium.

"This is exactly what happened on 1 May 1980 when new leadership was formed for the Arab Socialist Union in Syria."

INTERNAL SECURITY SEEN AS GOVERNMENT'S TOP PRIORITY

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 p 26

/Article: "Field Courts Paralyze the Brothers!"/

/Text/ The statements Western papers have made to the effect that the Syrian regime has begun seeking the aid of security officials from the Soviet Union to quieten the domestic disturbances which were aggravated recently may not be true, but it is true that the severe measures the regime has taken have started to do their work in stabilizing the security situation and paralyzing the Moslem Brothers' activities.

It was clear, from the formation of the field courts and the People's Assembly vote on the law to execute the Moslem Brothers, that the Syrian government is putting the security question at the top of the priorities. The strict punishments, in which there is no leniency, do not just fall on active persons belonging to the Society of Moslem Brothers but are indeed the lot of their relatives, family, aides and others who are dependent on them. This intensified activity has had a noticeable effect on domestic security, especially since the government also considers ordinary people responsible for security and requests them to pursue any element who might be suspected of having a hand in sabotage activities in public places.

Before the law was issued and put into effect, Syrian security agencies conducted broad dragnet operations involving the cities of Aleppo and Hume and most northern towns, a number of people were arrested, arms caches were discovered and diverse skirmishes occurred in which dozens of people were killed or wounded.

It appears that the dragnet operation was so extensive that it encompassed other opposition people besides the Moslem Brothers. Some of these opposition figures, who had no connection with terrorist activity, believe that the latest security laws will embrace them in the end because the charge of membership in the Society of Moslem Brothers is hard to prove, especially in exceptional circumstances like these.

The Syrian regime chose the execution law and intensification of security in making use of a group of factors which cause it to refrain from acting more liberally toward other forces or from giving concessions to opposition forces which are not affiliated with the brothers. It realizes that national forces, either participating in the progressive front or outside it, are condemned to support and reaffirm the security measures the government is taking against the Moslem Brothers, however intense they may become. It also knows that Iraq and groups in sympathy with it cannot support the Moslem Brothers' movement, since that poses a similar danger to them. What the al-Da'wah Party in Iraq gets at the hands of Iraqi security agencies is no less intense than what the Moslem Brothers get at the hands of the Syrian security agencies. The Syrian regime itself has not referred to Iraq either secretly or openly in this context. When President Hafiz al-Asad declared at the Perseverance and Steadfastness Summit held in Tripoli last April that neighboring countries were involved in stirring up unrest within Syria, stating "I prefer not to enter into a war of words with these countries but have decided to crush the reactionary forces in Syria itself," some people thought he was referring to Iraq. However, Minister 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam soon mentioned Jordan by name, saying that his country had categoric proof that the Society of Moslem Brothers receives its training in Jordanian camps. However, Jordanian officials who visited Damascus recently returned with another impression, the gist of which is that the charge was not directed against them.

Unconfirmed rumors also state that quantities of weapons have found their way into Syria from Lebanon.

What applies to the Syrian regime's position on Iraq concerning the Moslem Brothers applies to its position on Saudi Arabia. It did not refer to Saudi Arabia strongly or fleetingly in this context, although the British conservative newspaper DAILY TELEGRAPH pointed to what it called "Saudi hands in the Syrian disturbances." However, observers in London do not take this talk seriously but consider it part of the touchiness between Britain and Saudi Arabia that arose recently from the crisis over the film "Death of a Princess!"

It may be inferred from the corpus of press and diplomatic reports being circulated in Western capitals that President Hafiz al-Asad has succeeded in establishing order and security in Syria. A British diplomat who has worked in the Middle East for a long time states that the Syrian regime, by the standards of the Middle East, is a relatively stable one because it has stayed in power the longest. The length of duration in power is the soundest criterion of stability, regardless of the miscellaneous events which may occur here and there in corresponding patterns of time. What has helped it, in his estimation, is the lack of a reliable alternative. The regime is strong because the opposition is weak; even if the regime is weak, the opposition is weaker.

There is a feeling on President al-Asad's part, as those knowledgeable about the inner nature of things in Syria say, that his campaign to liquidate the Moslem Brothers is one aspect of the problem and while he has given it priority because of its security repercussions, he has not ignored the other side, which involves the pursuit of a difficult, painful cosmetic operation on the ruling party's agencies. It is stated that the investigating committee on unlawful gain will resume its activity now that Mr Ahmad Dhiyab has resigned from the chairmanship of it, because of his inability to rid the country of bribery and corruption, and Mr 'Abdallah al-Ahmar has taken his place. Reliable Syrian sources say that al-Ahmar may also resign from the committee after a conflict with a German company which was to have executed a contract for 4.5 million German marks to out fit the Ba'th House in Damascus with furniture and aluminum partitions which caused the Syrian government to proceed to abrogate the contract although Ba'th House was to have been a model modern building.

The German company, known by the name MFVB, claims that it paid a commission of 700,000 Syrian pounds to get this contract, but so far only the payment of 200,000 Syrian pounds has been proved, to the engineer Ghassan Taraqji, who is said to have arranged the deal, causing the Syrian government to abrogate the contract in its entirety without cause.

It is said that the Syrian government has decided to ride a difficult vessel in dealing with the internal situation, whether that be the committee to liquidate the Moselm Brothers or the committee to clean house from within, now that it has become clear that foreign remedies will not work. Because of the domestic situation in Lebanon and Iran, the possibility that an effective Syrian-Iranian-Palestinian alliance may be created which could upset the balance of forces in the region has become weak. Foreign pressures to which Jordan has been exposed because of the Camp David agreement have in turn reduced the possibility that the Jordanian-Syrian alli ance might be revived as it existed some years ago. Above and beyond that, there are the disturbed relations between Syria and Iraq since last July, following the collapse of the union talks between the two countries and Saddam Husayn's rise to power as a result of broad party purges. At the time Baghdad said that was a plot in which the Syrians had a hand, though the Syrians deny this and state that it was the Jordanians who provoked the Iraqis against them!

With the success of the Syrian regime's campaign against the Moslem Brothers, the refrain in the west to the effect that Syria is determed to sign exceptional agreements with the Soviet Union to cope with domestic foreign dangers has let up, in spite of the increasing number of Soviet military and non-military delegations to Damascus. Perhaps this was one of the reasons which prompted the Syrian regime to adopt the decision to make a decisive confrontation itself, to prove that it was still able to cope with the situation domestically and abroad.

It is apparent from this that the Syrian regime has transcended the latest crisis, to which it has devoted great efforts over the past year.

Nonetheless, many are anticipating developments, foremost among them the corrective measures President al-Asad is said to be busy studying as a prelude to executing them.

AGRICULTURE IS PRONOUNCED TOP NATIONAL PRIORITY

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 31 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] Moncef Ben Hadj Amor, minister attached to the prime minister for civil service and administrative reform, chaired on Friday in Soliman a regional sectorial conference on agricultural development organized by the Nabeul Coordination Committee to discuss irrigated crops in Cap-Bon.

During the opening session--held in the presence of the governor and the Coordination Committee secretary general--Moncef Bel Hadj Amor underlined the importance of agriculture in view of the key role it plays in the national economy. It is a fact that the agricultural sector alone employs half of the country's labor force.

The minister mentioned how interested the party and government are in developing that sector and how the head of state is anxious to turn agriculture into the country's green weapon.

This solicitude explains the importance that our development plans attach to agriculture with a view to guarantee our food supplies and promote our exports of agricultural goods.

Expansion of Irrigated Areas

In this connection, the minister specifically mentioned the government's efforts in the sphere of investments which are constantly increasing, so much so that 810 million dinars were invested during the 10-year period now ending compared to 272 millions invested during the sixties.

He noted that 38 percent of these investments went into irrigation. The remaining 62 percent was allocated to agricultural machinery, afforestation and livestock.

Bel Hadj Amor pointedout that these efforts had led to an expansion of the irrigated areas, now covering 200,000 hectares, and to a 50 percent increase in the agricultural production.

Consequently, during this last decade the average production of olive oil amounted to 115,000 tons compared to 55,000 tons in the sixties. During that same period, a similar rate of growth was registered in the production of citrus fruits which jumped from an average of 77,000 tons to 140,000 tons.

As for farming in Cap-Bon, the minister stressed its importance given that area's contribution to the development of the country's economy and given the essentially agricultural character of that region which is famous for the diversity of its production and for the vast expanse of its arable lands (174,000 hectares of arable lands out of a total area of 290,000 hectares).

Agricultural Loans: Substantial Reduction of Administrative Formalities

But this expansion is curtailed by the water shortage in that region since its yearly water requirements amount to 90 million cubic meters. In this connection, the minister said that a project to bring water from the north into the Cap-Bon area, a project included in the plan, will improve the water situation without completely solving the problem mainly because the water requirements of the various sectors are always increasing.

In this connection, Bel Hadj Amor urged local farmers and experts to resort to methods of artificial irrigation which allow a more efficient utilization of the existing water supplies. He pointed out if they used the method of irrigation by sprinklers they could cut down consumption by 40 percent while increasing production. Other methods of irrigation, such as utilization of residual waters from purification plants, could also be used.

The minister went on to speak about the agricultural loans policy and said that the new trend adopted by the government is to authorize banks and their local branches to grant loans to farmers with considerably less administrative formalities.

He stressed the role which these institutions are being called upon to play by giving guidance to the farmers.

Sixth Plan: Agriculture Gets Preferential Treatment

On the subject of the decentralization of the services of the agriculture department, Moncef Bel Hadj Amor started by recalling the measures recently adopted to bring the department of agriculture closer to the field noting that with the new allocation of senior cadres throughout regional offices more than 78 percent of those cadres will now be working in the regions. The remaining 22 percent of those cadres will continue to work in the central administration.

This step is part of the policy to give guidance to the farmers and to popularize modern farming methods.

After noting that the government has given preferential treatment to agriculture in the forthcoming plan encouraging that sector and providing the means to guarantee a stable and decent income for the farmers, the minister mentioned the changes registered in agricultural wages and in production. The purpose of these changes is to maintain a balance between the interests of the producers and those of the consumers.

Among the reforms envisaged by the next plan, Bel Hadj Amor mentioned the project to restructure the marketing distribution chain. For instance, the price of some agricultural products will be set even before the season gets underway. Also, a balance will be established between imports and exports of agricultural products on the basis of the needs of our domestic market and our foreign markets requirements.

To Make Our Agriculture More Competitive

The minister emphasized the need to make our Tunisian agricultural products more competitive in foreign markets in general, and in the markets of Arab countries in particular, as well as the need to attract Arab investors to agricultural projects in Tunisia to insure that our products are better represented in the markets of our brother countries.

The minister devoted the second half of his speech to the question of the administrative reform aimed, he said, at bringing the administration closer to its beneficiaries. On this subject, he said that it was necessary to work together to ensure the successful outcome of this reform.

Finally, he said that he was certain that all the interested parties along with the representatives of national organizations and local authorities will not spare any effort to achieve the development goals which we have set ourselves in conformity with the directives of the Supreme Combattant.

At the end of the meeting, the participants sent a message of support to the president of the republic.

YOUTH URGED TO CONTRIBUTE TO PARTY OBJECTIVES

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Rachid Sfar, member of the Political Bureau and minister of public health, chaired on Sunday evening, at the Palace of Congresses in Monastir, the opening session of the Fourth Conference of the Socialist Destour Youth which is meeting from 31 August to 3 September under the theme "An Effective Participation in Political Life."

The opening session was attended by Abdessalem Dimassi, secretary general of the UFOJ [Tunisian Federation of Youth Organizations]; Mohsen Gheminade, secretary general of the Destour Youth National Bureau; by the governor, the secretary general of the Coordination Committee and representatives of large national organizations with offices in the governorate of Monastir.

Rachid Sfar started by conveying to the conference participants greetings from the Supreme Combattant, from the party secretary general and from members of the government and of the Political Bureau.

He then asked the particpants to observe a minute of silence in memory of the martyrs of Monastir who died on 31 August 1953 on the field of honor under the bullets of the colonial authorities.

The minister also pointed out that the closing session of this Fourth Conference will take place on the anniversary of 3 September 1934, the day when the leader Habib Bourguiba was deported to southern Tunisia, a measure which signaled the beginning of the demonstration of force launched by the Neo-Deatour against the supporters of the protectorate.

Rachid Sfar also remarked that the conference had opened on the anniversary of that day, in 1955, when documents were exchanged granting internal autonomy to Tunisia. In this connection, he urged the Tunisian youths to muse over the lesson contained in all these historic events which illustrate the perspicacity and political genius of the Supreme Combattant.

Then, the minister underlined the importance of the current period in Tunisia's history now that the next development plan is getting its finishing touches, a plan--he said--that calls for the united effort of us all if it is to be carried out. He noted that on that score the Destour youth has been assigned a crucial task and has the duty of always standing on the frontline of the militants setting an example for other groups of young Tunisians.

Mr Sfar went on the declare his certainty that the Fourth Youth Conference will not fail to achieve results calculated to increase the party's influence and to enable the Socialist Destour Youth Organization to continue acting as the designated spearhead in the political and civic education of young people, as the uniting element of the living forces of the nation to further increase the ranks of the party.

He also emphasized the great responsibility assumed by this organization to defend the Destour options and to mobilize the youth in the party arena.

The minister of public health also said that he was very pleased to see that an overwhelming majority of the people favors the development strategy adopted by the party and he pointed out that the Destour youth has the duty to constantly enrich its own Destour culture and consolidate its education so as to be in step with progress and contribute to the implementation of the party programs and objectives.

All the same, Mr Sfar pointed out that neither the state nor the party claim to have arrested all facets of under-evelopment, nor have they given concrete form to all the aspirations but, nonetheless, they are driven by a firm determination to fill the gaps and to eliminate the last effects of underdevelopment. "Although we still have a long way to go on the road that leads to the final takeoff," he said at the end of his address, "The fact that we now have enough cadres capable of leading the march of development under the bestpossible conditions is a good reason to feel optimistic."

Earlier, Mohamed Ben Nasr, Abdessalem Dimassi, Mohsen Gheminade and Khelifa Jebiniani, the conference chairman, spoke to the participants emphasizing the importance of this Fourth Conference of the Socialist Destour Youth in the decisive period through which the country is living in its effort to become a developed country and they underscored the role assigned to young people for the success of this endeavor.

Afterwards, Rachid Sfar paid a visit to the mausoleum of the martyrs of Monastir where he recited the Fatiha in memory of the martyrs of the events of August 1953.

PALESTINIAN LEADER CALLS FOR WIDER REPRESENTATION WITHIN PLO

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 25 Jun 80 p 14

[Interview with 'Abd-al-Fattah Ghanim, member of Political Bureau of Palestine Liberation Front by Ibrahim al-Barghuthi; date and place not given]

[Text] Abd al-Fattah Ghanim, member of the Political Bureau of the Palestine Liberation Front (PLF) said that the Zionist enemy will increase terrorism and assassination attempts against members of national movements in the occupied territories, following his attempts to assassinate three West Bank mayors.

He called for representation of all organizations (Palestine Liberation Front, Popular Front, Palestine Communist Organization, and People's Resistance Front) on the executive committee and all other institutions of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). He called for an end to individualist and autocratic actions and internal alignments. He asked for severance of links between the PLO and reactionary symbols and personalities in the occupied territories, as well as a decrease in the number of independents on the PLO executive committee.

In an exclusive interview with AL-WATAN, he warned against attempts to dress up the European initiative, which is nothing more than an extension to the Camp David agreements, resting on the same set of premises. Here is the interview:

Uprising in the Occupied Territories

[Question] What is your assessment of the present situation in the occupied territories following the assassination attempts on three West Bank mayors?

[Answer] The growing uprising of the masses in the occupied homeland is assuming unique dimensions characterized by the offensive nature of the uprising against occupation forces and Zionist settlements in the occupied territories; the defeat of the Israeli decision to expel the fighter Bassam al-Shak'ah; and the forcing of the Zionist enemy to cancel the Alon Moreh settlement. The popular movement in the occupied homeland is clearly taking on universal dimensions. In addition to widespread uprisings on the West Bank, solidarity movements have appeared in the triangle and Haifa, and the uprising has moved to the Gaza sector. All these developments have forced the enemy to form, so to speak, a secret Israeli army along the lines of what the French did in Algeria, when the balance of power started to swing in favor of the continuously growing movement of the masses.

I would like to discuss two incidents. The first is the expulsion of the mayors of Hebron and Halhul as well as the sharia judge of Hebron. In the past, Israel attempted to give its repressive and fascist deeds an appearance of so-called legitimacy, and expulsion of Arab nationals required the consent of higher Israeli courts. However, the Israeli ministry of defense this time dispensed with these formalities and gave orders to hand over the three fighters--Fahd al-Qawasmah, Muhammad Milhim, and Shay'kh Rajab al-Tamimi--directly to the forces of the Israeli agent, Sa'd Haddad in southern Lebanon. The second incident is the recent criminal attempt to assassinate the brother fighters, Bassam al-Shak'ali, Karim Khalaf, and Ibrahim al-Tawil, which marks a transition of the government of the Israeli enemy into open gangsterism. We believe that what is going on can only be the beginning of a real predicament for Israeli occupiers of our lands. This predicament is revealed in the sharp exchange of accusations between Weizman and Begin, and between Weizman and Barlev, in a clear attempt on the part of enemy leaders to clear themselves of responsibility for what is going on in the occupied territories.

We can clearly see the growing influence of the Palestinian national cause in the fact that the three fighters' expulsion became an international issue discussed by the UN Security Council. The expusion of al-Shak'ah a few months ago was also of interest to the entire international community. The UN General Assembly took a clear stand at the time, holding that the Israeli decision was illegal. We can also emphasize that the criminal actions of the government of the terrorist Begin have been totally exposed. This is so much so, that American imperialism itself was unable to use its veto in the Security Council in the face of the complete unanimity of all other members in condemning the expusion and calling for the return of the three fighters.

In our estimation, these developments call for more advanced forms of popular resistance, which will entail redevelopment of the existing organizational structure in the occupied homeland. This calls particularly for merging all elements of the Palestine revolution and all national and democratic forces into the Palestine National Front. It also calls for providing the necessary assistance to secure the steadfastness of the Palestine National Front in its struggle against the Zionist forces of occupation; severing links with reactionaries such as Hikmat al-Masri, Rashad al-Shawa, Elias Fray, and Anwar Nusaybah; and channelling funds appropriated to support the steadfastness of our people in the occupied homeland in such a way as to actually serve the steadfastness of our national organizations.

National Council Meeting

[Question] In the light of your analysis and the 15th meeting of the Palestine National Council, what should be achieved politically and organizationally by this session?

[Answer] At the 14th meeting of the Palestine National Council, revolutionary groups agreed on a step-by-step political program. In spite of this, the organizational program decided upon at that meeting faltered. Important and dangerous new political developments have taken place since that meeting, namely, the complete switch of the Egyptian regime to the camp of the historic enemies of the Palestine revolution and Arab liberation movement; the overthrow of imperialism's agent in Iran; the achievement of several victories by world forces of liberation in Afghanstan, Zimbabwe, and Nicaragua, and the growing efforts of the reactionary imperialist-Zionist alliance to impose its aggressive plans on the Arab world, the most obvious example of which is the autonomy talks. In addition, there have been attempts to dress up the European initiative, which is nothing more than an extension of the Camp David agreements and is based on the same objective of destroying the exclusive legitimate representation character of the PLO.

These important new political developments call for a clear position regarding the European initiative which would unmask its sponsors and the dangerous schemes they intend to finesse through it in our area. The PLO is the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Any form of delegation of authority or attmept to create a partner for the PLO in representing our people is rejected.

The revolutionary situation in Lebanon must also be given special attention, since the Lebanese theater is the major center of gravity and impact on the Palestinian revolution. This requires strengthening bonds of militant relations and common destiny with the Lebanese National Movement, and preventing the fascists and isolationists from achieving their programs in Lebanon. These programs are just another facet of the Camp David agreements. It is also necessary to attach special importance to the struggle of the masses in the occupied territories, to intensify military operations against the occupation, and to stick to armed conflict as the primary form of the national Palestinian struggle at this stage.

The National Council must also emphasize the importance of the Jordanian arena, since it contains huge segments of the energies of our Palestinian people, and should once more become a focal point of the Palestinian revolution. This calls for intensifying the struggle for the right of the Palestinian revolution to exist in Jordan, and to use that country as a base. The National Council must challenge all attempts to place restrictions and difficulties in the way of the free movement of our Palestinian people in most Arab countries.

Emphasis must also be placed on regarding American imperialism as the principal enemy of the Palestinian revolution. The role of the PLO within the steadfastness and Resistance Front must be reinforced.

"No," to the Policy of Internal Alignments

On the organizational front: In order to make it possible for these political positions to be faithfully translated into practice, we must have the organizational tool to do so creatively and realistically. We should be free of individualist or autocratic action or of internal alignments which aim at dividing our united national effort and weaken national Palestinian solidarity at this time.

On this basis, we in the PLF believe that it is quite necessary to represent all elements of the revolution and national democratic forces, including the Palestine Communist Organization of the West Bank, on the executive committee of the PLO and all its subsidiary organizations within a framework of close national unity. At the same time, we see the necessity of decreasing the number of independents on the executive committee and other institutions of the PLO, while increasing representation of mass organizations, so that members of these institutions may become accountable in their work to elements of the people.

The best message that the Palestine National Council could send to our people in the occupied territories, in appreciation of their valiant uprising, would be for it to unite national forces by defeating American imperialist plans embodied in the Camp David agreements, the autonomy conspiracy, and the European initiative. It should also move to escalate national resistance to destroy the occupation and enable the Palestinian people to determine their own destiny and create a democratic nation in their homeland.

I would like to point out the democratic nature of the Palestinian revolution during the past years. Democratic commitment requires persistent efforts to deepen democratic practices within every element of the Palestinian revolution and among all ranks of its national progressive forces. This is based on our belief that promoting democracy releases the energies of our Palestinian masses and channels them in the service of our national interest during the inevitable struggle against our enemies.

PALESTINIAN LEADER DISCUSSES MIDEAST, CRITICIZES PLO, FATAH

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 22 Aug 80 p 17

[Interview with Nayif Hawatimah, in Beirut; date not given]

[Text] For 3 long hours, AL-SIYASAH discussed with the secretary general of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP), Nayif Hawatimah, the Middle East's hottest problems. The interview dealt with Lebanon, the Arab world, and issues of international import. Items discussed included terrorism, the wave of political assassinations, the war in Lebanon and what lies ahead for that country, American interests and inter-Palestinian relations. The text of the interview follows:

[Question] The Palestine National Council (PNC) was expected to hold a new session late in August of this year. Have you reached an agreement with the other Palestine resistance groups on what might be accomplished?

[Answer] The committee in charge of preparations for the next council session has set up an agenda aimed at ironing out differences over political and organizational issues, as well as reaching a consensus on future plans of action. We can say at this point that we are moving in a positive direction. Our hope is that our aspirations will be translated into concrete action. The agenda includes a number of the more important political issues facing the Palestinian revolution and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). Foremost among these are:

1. The situation in the occupied territories and Israeli plans;

2. The Camp David alliance and possible developments as a result of the impending changes in Israel's political leadership;

3. An assessment of Palestinian-Jordanian relations in the light of 2 years of work by joint committees;

4. An assessment of Palestinian-Arab relations in the light of our experience of the past 20 months, with particular emphasis on recent serious Arab moves that could jeopardize our cause and endanger directly the position of the resistance movement and the PLO.

5. An assessment of the [recent] political moves by West European countries leading to the Venice declaration of 13 June 1980, and the subsequent moves by the United States, which are expected to intensify after the November elections.

In addition, the council must consider potential American-Israeli efforts to rescue the hard-pressed Camp David accords and push them to completion. All these massive political issues demand the attention of the council. Furthermore, the actions of the PLO during the past 20 months in connection with the phased political program which the PLO has endorsed, are giving rise to many legitimate questions among our people and fighters. The PLO does not appear to have lived up to its commitments in this regard. In fact many significant PLO actions have been contradictory to the phased program, and have failed to serve the interests of the Palestinian people or to advance its case with respect to self-determination and the creation of an independent state. These actions have also failed to advance the unconditional return of other occupied Arab territories. On the contrary, PLO actions have, in one form or another, fallen in line with Western plans in general and with the Camp David accords in particular. Of particular concern in this connection is the 5-point program advanced by Khalid al-Hasan.

All these issues are on the agenda of the planning committee. The agenda also includes a number of organizational matters dealing with the occupied territory; the need to implement the PNC's resolution of January 1979, which called for beefing up resistance in the occupied territory; and a review of the PLO's organizational structure and makeup for the purpose of carrying out democratic reform which would check the detrimental influence of corrupt, bureaucratic elements. These are the problems on the agenda of the planning committee, and we are in the process of debating them. Our hope is that they will receive full and serious attention and that we will succeed in agreeing on a number of political, organizational and military decisions, which, collectively, will form a modest, but qualitative improvement in the posture of the resistance movement and the PLO.

[Question] What are the chances of reaching such an agreement?

[Answer] That does not depend on us alone; it depends on the various resistance groups and their willingness to accept a common denominator, a joint policy that is more effective than the one pursued so far. The agreement reached at the last session of the PNC was a big step forward. Unfortunately, that agreement was not put into practice on the political or organizational level. Example: The phased program is against favoring the new American-West European initiative, and contradicts the position expounded by Khalid al-Hasan during his tour of Western Europe.

The organizational program adopted at the last session of the PNC emphasized collective leadership of the revolution and the PLO from top to bottom. However, during the past 20 months, we have witnessed repudiation of collective leadership and efforts by individuals to gain and monopolize control. We shall attempt at the next council session to scale our decisions to our actual ability to implement them. We would thus avoid creating a glaring gap between our ability to adopt resolutions and our ability to carry them out as happened at the last session. Example: During the last council session, guidelines were laid down for Palestinian-Jordanian relations in the best interests of both peoples and the Arab nation at large. These guidelines were designed to insure implementation of the Baghdad summit conference resolutions dealing with Palestinian-Jordanian relations and other resolutions resulting from previous Arab summit conferences. The joint committees, however, failed to implement these guidelines.

We are determined that the next session should remedy this situation and generate resolutions which can be implemented. We must also end the struggle for political leadership within the PLO if we are to gain credibility. Our most valuable assets are our people and the Arab masses, together with all progressive forces throughout the world. If the gap between our resolutions and our capacity to implement them continues, the PLO will lose its credibility and the support of the masses.

[Question] Do you really believe that forthcoming resolutions will be more successful than previous ones, keeping in mind that things have not really changed?

[Answer] It is true that many previous resolutions were shelved, giving rise to skepticism. But we must not forget that the Palestinian posture has improved noticeably. Support among our people has grown, and the revolution is on a firmer footing. Our leaders are being watched more closely, and their ability to execute important policy decisions is coming under greater scrutiny.

We must also follow through on the positive efforts of our people with the occupied territory and outside it. We must limit the gap between what we say and what we do, between decisions and our capacity to implement them. We must also note that our enemy is becoming increasingly isolated, with little room for maneuvering. It is hemmed in between the PLO and the Arab and world community. In light of these developments, we hope that the next council session will produce resolutions capable of implementation. Otherwise, no resolutions are necessary.

[Question] Together with Fatah, your group was among the strongest supporters of the phased program--the program calling for the creation of an independent Palestinian state in stages. But, judging by the resolutions adopted at its fourth conference, Fatah appears to be retreating from its former position in favor of a hardline strategy. How will this affect your position?

[Answer] It is true that the Democratic Front and Fatah were the strongest defenders of the phased program for our people, the revolution and the PLO. Even those who originally opposed the program accepted it unconditionally in January 1979. As it turned out, this program proved to be the only meaningful answer to Zionist expansionist policy and [Sadat's] surrender policy. It is also evident that the program will be the only viable countermeasure to the Camp David accords and future designs connected with them, following the American elections in November 1980 and the Israeli elections in May 1981.

The central issue of the Middle East conflict is the Palestinian issue, the right of the Palestinians to return to their homeland, determine their own destiny, and to create an independent state. This is precisely what had been denied at Camp David and in subsequent declarations such as the Venice declaration. This is also the line that will be pursued after the American and Israeli elections. The Israeli Labor Party is proposing a post Camp David program for the creation of a Palestinian-Jordanian federation. The proposal is new ploy to further divide the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Consequently, our most effective weapon is to adhere to our program and insist on the right of return, self-determination, and establishment of an independent state. These demands must be the essence of our continuing struggle. We must also insist on the unconditional return of all occupied Arab territory.

As for the resolutions adopted at the fourth conference of the Fatah organization, observers are wondering about the apparent hardening of the organization's position. Frankly, I do not share this view and wish that that was indeed the case. The resolutions of the fourth conference are exercises in generalities. They do not pertain to the exigencies of the present situation, nor do they respond to the immediate problems facing our people, the revolution, the PLO or the progressive forces throughout the Arab world.

The resolutions of the fourth conference deal with long range problems relating to future Palestinian Arab-Israeli Jewish relations in the framework of one democratic state yet to be created in Palestine. The resolutions bypassed present problems: What to do about the situation in the occupied territory? What are the options? What are the means to implement them? How do we close our ranks? What is the status of the revolution within the occupied territory, and what is its immediate outlook? Under what banner do we continue the struggle? What is our principal option in the steadfast front?

The resolutions of the fourth conference ignore all the current American and West European tactics, initiatives and plans. These should be a central issue at any political conference in the Arab world, especially a Palestinian conference. None of these matters was discussed.

We will gain greater control [of our destiny] when our conferences begin to seek solutions to our immediate problems, and when we stand united against imperialism and the designs of imperialism against the Palestinian cause. We will become stronger when we begin to deal democratically with each other, in a manner calculated to solidify our relations with our people in the occupied territory, rectify Palestinian-Jordanian and Palestinian-Arab relations; and reform conditions within the PLO itself by exposing the elements whose real intentions and strategies are kept concealed. For this reason, the political declaration issued by the Fatah conference will have no effect on the coming PNC session. The political declaration is a rehash of old positions. It is not a step forward. We need a more meaningful program.

Ever since the political declaration was issued, there has been no noticeable change in the policies of our Fatah brethren, despite the new realities of our present situation. We need answers. There has been some revived adherence to the phased program, as expressed in the speech of Abu al-Lutf before the emergency session of the United Nations General Assembly. In general, however, there has been a continuation of policies preceding the [Fatah] conference, such as with respect to internal Palestinian, Palestinian-Jordanian, Palestinian-Arab, and Palestinian-international relations.

[Question] Do you expect any noticeable changes in the composition of the Executive Committee? If so, what kind of changes?

[Answer] We are working to get a committee that is committed to the phased program and to upholding the council's resolutions. Our experience of the past 20 months is evidence that the present committee would not provide these assurances. Palestinian groups which bear the bulk of the responsibility for the struggle must be represented adequately on the Executive Committee. Similarly, the so-called independent groups must receive special consideration.

[Question] But, in view of the current state of affairs, don't you think that this demand is a little too ambitious?

[Answer] I believe that the balance of forces as well as public Palestinian sentiment are such as to make this possible. We have already witnessed the defeat of numerous rightist tendencies.

[Question] There is much talk of "settlment" these days. Are there any serious settlement programs being proposed, and how do you feel about them?

[Answer] It is evident that the Camp David accords have reached a deadend. But America and Israel refuse to retreat and to accept this new fact of life. The Camp David accords are meaningful only to the Egyptian-Israeli front. They are devoid of legitimacy on the Palestinian, Arab, regional, or international scenes.

In view of this reality, a serious attempt is being made to find a new opening for the Camp David accords, in the form of a complementary, follow-up move. West European initiatives appear to be premised on such a move.

After the American elections, Western Europe is expected to submit a new resolution to the Security Council. It will support the legitimate rights of the Palestinians, including the rights of self-determination and representation on any conference on the Palestine problem, but will stop short of mentioning an independent state or the PLO, in order to avoid an American veto. This initiative appears to have been coordinated with a large number of Arab capitals, and is based on hopes that it would have the support of some Palestinians.

Preparations are under way for the return of the Labor Party to power in Israel. The Labor Party, known for its strong support of the Camp David accords, is ready to implement self-rule in the Gaza strip in order to satisfy al-Sadat's demands and to get him out of his dilemma. This party is also preparing to propose the creation of a Jordanian-Palestinian federation and to renew its effort to divide the West Bank further. Under this proposal, the Labor Party hopes to annex 40 percent of the West Bank to Israel, leaving 60 percent for the federation.

This proposal will also be offered as a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem. While some of the refugees will be permitted to settle in the territory belonging to the federation, others will be settled in Arab and foreign countries. These steps are some of the links in the unbroken chain of events that began with the Camp David accords and which will continue. The question is: How will this proposal be implemented? We believe that the proposal will be met with unrelenting Palestinian resistance, stronger than the one put up-to-date against the Camp David accords.

The question of Palestinian rights is no longer a local or regional issue; it is an international one. Nearly the whole world is clamoring for the rights of the Palestinian people. Furthermore, our experience in resisting such proposals, the worldwide support for our cause, and the development of our armed forces and the PLO will prevent this proposal from becoming a reality. We must, however, be aware beforehand that the dangers implicit in such a proposal include the following:

1. An attempt to paralyze the PLO, if and when it undertakes to enlist Palestinian or Arab aid in resisting any of the Camp David follow-up moves;

2. An attempt to destroy unity in the Arab world, which is solidly opposed to the accords. The attempt may take the form of an appeal to persuade some Arab countries to save what they can. The success of such a move will divide the Arab world into two groups: those who go along, and those who remain faithful to the phased program.

3. An attempt to recast the Palestinian problem as an internal Arab issue, rather than the world issue which it is. Such a move will attempt to pit some Arab countries against the PLO, in a bid to force the latter to accept post-Camp David proposals. This is precisely what our enemies and the Camp David alliance wish to accomplish--a transformation of the problem into an inter-Arab conflict. It is precisely what Henry Kissinger alluded to when he called for turning the Palestinian problem from a world issue into an Arab one.

[Question] It seems that [Palestinian] Resistance is beginning to rely more on diplomacy than on arms. We no longer hear of daring operations as was the case in the mid-70's. Any reasons?

[Answer] Armed resistance remains the principal form of our struggle. Our major problem now is how to develop that form of resistance within the occupied territory, in addition, of course, to other forms of resistance from outside. Any deviation from this basic policy is an error, regardless of who proposes it.

Our struggle must be integrated on the military, political, diplomatic, and ideological fronts. But the principal form of our resistance must remain the armed struggle. It must be noted that armed as well as other forms of resistance have developed significantly, and have become more effective in the occupied territory, despite the fact that they are not laced with spectacular events of propaganda value in the Arab world and abroad.

According to Israeli statistics, there is an average of 2 military operations every 3 days. Palestinian accounts claim more. These operations are carried out without letup against the enemy and his administrative and police agencies. The enemy is kept constantly alert and bleeding. In addition to the armed struggle, there are other forms of resistance in the occupied territory, with great effect on world public opinion. Israel, which for too long has been an expert in the art of complaining, is being faced with a reverse effect. It is now the target of complaints. This is the result of its occupation policy.

We are constantly working to make our armed struggle more costly to the enemy and less costly to us, particularly with regard to losses in human resources. This is a step forward despite the fact that it does not possess the spectacularness and propaganda value of past suicidal missions that took place at Ma'alot, Sakhoi, and Bisan. Our suicidal missions reached their highest levels in the years 1974, 1975 and especially 1976. But in the occupied territory our armed resistance is being mounted on a daily basis, and has been so for the past 2 years. Israeli reaction to these has been more violent than it was to our more spectacular missions. One result of these daily operations has been the direct 1978 Israeli invasion of southern Lebanon, which was followed by an 8-month long war of attrition. Our new tactics are hurting the enemy more than ever.

This does not mean, however, that large-scale operations have no place in our resistance strategy. On the contrary, these operations will remain indispensable. The only proviso is that they become extremely costly to the enemy. As we prepare to carry on the resistance for a long time, we should not for one moment lose sight of the necessity to escalate the struggle on the political, diplomatic, and ideological fronts. We should not forget the example of the Vietnamese people, who, while fighting in the field, carried on their struggle on the political, diplomatic, and ideological fronts. At any rate, and with respect to our armed resistance, we cannot but refer to the obstacles placed in our way in certain quarters. We, therefore, have no choice but to rely principally on our efforts within the occupied territory.

[Question] You mentioned earlier that you expected a large-scale explosion in Lebanon in the near future. On what factors do you base this assessment?

[Answer] Anticipated developments on the eve of and after the American elections, and follow-up moves to bolster the Camp David accords, all point to one direction. We can expect a hot period politically and militarily. The American-Israeli enemy is determined to implement the policy aimed at Arab surrender. It threatens our people's rights, and simultaneously tries to convert the Palestine problem into an Arab issue by forcing a confrontation between some Arab countries and the PLO.

This is why we are cautioning loudly and have already taken measures to avoid being caught by surprise. As one example, we are studying the attempts to create a government of reconciliation in Lebanon, one comprised of all political factions. While the effort appears innocent on the surface, its ultimate designs are evil. Should such a move succeed, it would in a matter of months deliver a powerful blow against us.

Under the cover of forming a government of reconciliation, those behind the move plan to station the sectarian [Lebanese] army in East and West Beirut as well as in the city's suburbs, in order to pin down the Palestinian forces in their refugee camps and deprive them of their protective belt. A second aim of this move is to force the deterrent force [Syrian army] out of the capital and its suburbs. All this is to be accomplished under the cover of a noble effort to bring about a political reconciliation. The real intention, however, is to create new problems between the resistance forces and their allies in the national movement, as well as dissension within the Palestinian resistance. But, thanks to strong opposition from the independent Nasirites, the "Murabitun Group," and Sulayman Franjiyyah, as well as to changes in the Syrian position, the move wil not succeed.

[Question] What form will this conspiracy take? Will it, for example, be a return to open war as happened in 1975-76?

[Answer] The conspiracy could be carried out in a variety of ways. In the occupied territory, the conspiracy could take the form of a greater tightening of the iron-fisted occupation policy, particularly in response to the mounting [Palestinian] resistance in that territory. In Lebanon, the conspiracy could take the form of a severe blow to the Palestinian revolution and its allies in the Lebanese National Front. The blow will be delivered by Israel in south Lebanon, and will be accompanied by new initiatives by rightist, isolationist groups. The two-pronged attack will aim at sandwiching the Palestinians between Israel and the agent Sa'ad Haddad in the south, and pitting them against the isolationist front and its supporters in the capital [Beirut].

[Question] In the wake of the wave of assassinations in the Arab region, the future appears extremely gloomy. All indications are that the wave will intensify. What, in your opinion, is the motive behind this campaign of terror?

[Answer] The problem of assassination is a complex one. As you know, we in the Democratic Front, condemn any form of individual terrorist activity, be it politically motivated assassination, a skyjacking, or a Munich type attack. The aim of the current wave of assassinations is to demoralize the national forces and weaken the common effort to conduct a united struggle politically and militarily. Political assassinations are intended to create havoc and sow fear and suspicion. They are symptomatic of the increasing bankruptcy of certain groups who seek to protect their deteriorating positions by turning to this form of terror. Resorting to this form of violence reveals that the perpetrators are in deep trouble and that their end is in sight.

[Question] Do you expect the wave of assassination to spread?

[Answer] Yes. This form of terroristic activity is likely to spread, particularly since some governments--those not serious in their opposition to imperialism and Zionism--insist on solving their problems in this fashion. These governments are unable to solve their social problems, which, as a rule, is the result of a vast gap between an increasingly impoverished majority and a small selfish minority whose legendary riches were built on the sweat and blood of the poor majority. Faced with discontent, these governments resort to individual assassination as a tool to eliminate opposition and maintain economic, political, social and educational control of their people. But the harder these governments seek to impose their authority, the harder will progressive national forces resist, and the greater will be their determination to achieve economic justice, end this transitional period, and take control of their countries' affairs.

[Question] You say repeatedly that the Camp David accords are in deep trouble, but don't you agree that our national forces are the ones in trouble?

[Answer] We have never denied this. Anyone who peruses the Democratic Front's documents will observe that we are portraying the situation as it really is. While we say the Camp David accords are in trouble, we do not deny that failure to scuttle them is due to the crisis that our revolutionary, progressive, and liberation Arab forces are going through. The Palestine revolution, the PLO and the entire Front of Steadfastness are in a crisis.

We do not hide the fact that the means to defeat the Camp David accords and preempt further developments that may ensue from them is to change the strategy of the revolution, the PLO, the Steadfastness Front and all the liberation and progressive forces in the Arab world. We have already pointed out some of the needed changes in the PLO's structure. As for the Steadfastness Front, a series of far-reaching democratic changes are necessary. The liberation forces in the Arab world, particularly the Leftist and the Democratic wings, must adopt a realistic revolutionary program, one capable of implementation and providing solutions, and must enlist the support of the masses.

Do we have the capacity to accomplish this? The answer is yes. We have what it takes to begin. The Palestinian masses, for example, are strong enemies of imperialism and Zionism. Political sentiment within the Palestinian movement appears to move toward a more progressive political philosophy.

[Question] The American elections are almost here. If you had a choice, which of the candidates, Carter or Reagan, would you opt for?

[Answer] We have no choice in this matter and the argument is academic. We must observe, however, that America's imperialist policy is not determined by a single person. America's foreign policy is based on a number of aggressive colonialist principles designed to guarantee America's interests. Any occupant of the White House is bound to implement these policies. Will Reagan prove to be more stridently opposed to our cause than Carter? We cannot answer this question despite the fact that Reagan's platform suggests as much.

We must remember that Nixon was more aggressive than his Democratic opponent. The Republican Party is traditionally more conservative and rightist than the Democratic Party. Yet when Nixon won the presidency he opened the way for the signing of the SALT I treaty. The Helsinki conference to settle post-World War II boundaries and relieve tensions in Europe also took place during the Nixon Administration. Nixon was also the one who went to Peking.

As another example, consider President de Gaulle. He was to the right of the Fourth Republic. He came to power with the support of French generals extremely dedicated to the maintenance of France's colonialist policy in Algeria. They, in fact, led a coup d'etat to insure the survival of that policy. Yet de Gaulle was the one to offer his "Peace of the Brave" proposal, followed later by an offer of self-determination and, ultimately, an agreement giving independence to Algeria.

This is why we must concentrate on the substance of things. I am reminded of an editorial in AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI, a reprint of an article that appeared in 1944 in AL-NAHAR by Father Jubran al-Tuwayni. In that article, Father Tuwayni discussed American presidential elections in terms identical to those used in the Middle East today.

We must be extremely careful in discussing the Palestinian problem and America's policy with respect to it. The same care must be used when discussing the positions of the Democratic and Republican parties with respect to Zionism and Israel. The Democratic Party has consistently given more aid to Israel and the Zionist movement than the Republican Party. The clout of the Zionist lobby is concentrated in the Democratic Party. The Republican Party has traditionally been the party of big business, big oil and the military-industrial complex. The party's commercial interests in the Middle East are of a different character. The battle between Carter and Reagan, between the Democrats and Republicans, should not concern us. We must concentrate on America's foreign policy and plan accordingly.

[Question] Some Palestinians view Begin as their friend, because his extreme hostility has served the Palestinian cause. Would you rather have Begin continue in office or do you prefer a return of the Labor Party?

[Answer] The martyr Kamal Nasir once said: "Israeli fanaticism is more helpful to our cause than Arab nationalism." Begin, with his legendary inflexibility, leaves no room for maneuver to anyone else. His "generosity" to Egypt meant demilitarization of the bulk of the Sinai desert. According to the Israeli-Egyptian agreement, Egyptian military units must remain 250 kilometers away from Egypt's international border. On the other hand, Israeli forces are within 3 kilometers of the border. Israel, at a moment's notice, can mount a lightning raid and reoccupy Sinai for a fourth time.

Begin's "generosity" with Egypt reached its highest level in connection with the autonomy proposal, the scheme to give Palestinians administrative authority over their affairs. The Labor Party, in my opinion, is not less dangerous than Begin. While the Likud Party appears more ominous in tactics, the Labor Party strategy threatens to liquidate the Palestinian problem by converting it into an inter-Arab dispute, a question of boundaries between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Jordan in particular. The Labor Party is prepared to propose a regional solution at the end of the 5-year transition period stipulated in the autonomy proposal.

Begin is an undisguised enemy in an undisguised fashion. He leaves no room for maneuver. Things will be more complicated and difficult when the Labor Party returns to power. We should never forget that the Palestinian tragedy and all the subsequent tragedies visited upon the Arab world took place under the Labor Party. This party is responsible for four Zionist invasions. It is responsible for Zionist immigration, for the creation of the enemy state, and for four wars. The Labor Party is the one which annexed Jerusalem 2 weeks after the city was captured; it is the one which built a series of settlements extending from Sinai to the Gaza Strip, from the West Bank to the Golan Heights.

[Question] We have learned that you have met with President Ceausescue of Romania. Do you think Romania will play a special role in Middle East affairs in the future?

[Answer] We do not believe that Romania and a number of other small countries could have a direct, serious and effective role in Middle East problems, despite the fact that each of them has an opinion on our situation. But we cannot ignore the fact that the Romanian leadership is privy to a great deal of information and knows about the plans and tactics of many countries, a fact that is useful to us in our discussions regarding the Middle East and other international hot spots.

We have had frequent and long discussions with President Ceausescu in which both sides expressed their views candidly. Our views were different on Egypt, al-Sadat's policy, the Camp David [accords], and the current situation in the Middle East. President Ceausescu, for example, favors the convening of an expanded international conference to deal with the Middle East without the prior condition of declaring the Camp David accords null and void. We do not agree on this point, and insist that the Camp David accords, the Egyptian-Israeli treaty, and the autonomy proposal should first be voided. Only then could such a conference search freely for a political solution to the Middle East problem.

FRENCH SAY MIDEAST SECURITY DEPENDS ON REGIONAL NUCLEAR BALANCE

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 11 Jul 80 pp 35-36

[Article by Hasan Hamadah: "Giscard Changes Direction of European Initiative, But Refuses To Give It Up; Middle East Security Depends on Regional Nuclear Balance; Story of Secret Contacts Which Put Off Abu 'Ammar's Visit to France"]

[Text] When a senior Arab official visited Paris this year, he urged the French government to take its time before submitting a draft resolution on the Middle East, opposing the Camp David accords, to the Security Council.

The French were surprised by this approach by a prominent Arab official representing a nation opposed to any separate peace with Israel which does not include the PLO.

French amazement was increased by the fact that the Arab official was expressing a point of view similar to that of the Soviet Union.

In subsequent discussions it appeared to the French that the Arab official, a man totally opposed to the principle of the Egyptian-Israeli negotiations and their resultant damage to the Palestinian cause, was trying to avoid the minefields planted by the Americans and the Soviets around their respective positions. The French and the official reached mutual understanding of each other's position, in spite of the official's apprehensions regarding the opposition the French initiative will run into, and the French disregard for this opposition.

However, the French subsequently changed the direction of their initiative, without giving it up. Thus, they concurred with the official, although they had not disagreed with him on substance. French diplomacy then directed all its efforts to achieve a united European position on the basis of which the European Community would submit a resolution to the Security Council. Thus, the idea of the European initiative was born.

While the Americans openly expressed their opposition to the European initiative, the Soviets were not sympathetic either, although it would return them to negotiations they had been driven out of by the Americans. The reason is Soviet conviction that American fumbling of their policy would be beneficial to the Soviets, while the emergence of the European bloc as a new principal party in the Middle East would be harmful to them. The Soviet Union does not want anyone but itself to replace the United States in Middle East negotiations. But why should it openly oppose the European initiative so long as the Americans will prevent its emergence? And if the Americans should fail to stop the European initiative, the Soviet Union could always use its right to veto any resolution submitted to the Security Council as a result of the European initiative.

Also, how could it benefit the Russians to contribute to the electoral defeat of President Carter so long as his Republican opponent is an unknown quantity and is inexperienced? The Soviet Union inevitably influences the American presidential election through the positions it takes, and the Camp David agreements represent the big horse the American president is betting on in his reelection campaign.

The French had all these considerations in mind as they concentrated their efforts on removing the American stumbling blocks in the way of their (European) initiative. They failed, slowed down their effort, and convinced their partners to issue a communique at the end of the 12-13 June European summit in Venice, in which the members of the European community declared their support. However, at the second Venice meeting, which included the heads of government of the Western industrial nations, nothing concerning the Middle East was announced.

Nevertheless, the French initiative reappeared with new impetus, clarity, and "radicalism" at a press conference held by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing a few days ago. Giscard's comments on the Middle East included three new points and put emphasis on a fourth, and all were set forth with clarity unprecedented in French foreign policy.

The first new point is that the security of Israel and her neighbors is tied to the types of modern (nuclear) weapons that the area may acquire and does not depend on occupation of land and strategic positions. In the course of his talk about Israel's security needs, president d'Estaing said, "I wish to warn that the real threat to Israel's future security will not come from 'specific' borders or from across a specific river, but from the introduction of new weapons into the area that have greater capability and range than weapons currently available. In the past, I had an opportunity to take steps to prevent the introduction of such a new type of weapon, knowing that negotiations on contracts introducing such a weapon were under way." President d'Estaing continued: "Therefore, international guarantees would be appropriate and would be available."

High level sources in the French foreign ministry explained this passage of d'Estaing's news conference as meaning that France views the existence of nuclear reactors in Israel, and the nuclear weapons which could be developed in the Jewish state, as adequate security guarantees negating any need to occupy and hold Arab lands for their strategic position. This concerns Israel. Concerning Israel's neighbors, the French president's words clearly indicate that their possession of atomic weapons would constitute a greater threat to Israel than any return of lands or "strategic" positions to their Arab owners.

The high level source in the French foreign ministry emphasized that President d'Estaing used the phrase "in the past" in the course of his reference to his opposition to the introduction of new kinds of weapons into the Middle East. The use of this phrase has two meanings. The first is that "in the past" does not apply to the present or future. The proof of this is that contracts previously signed with Iraq, for example, concerning nuclear reactors are still in effect, and are being carried out exactly as stipulated in the contracts. At the same time, France denied such reactors to Libya and Pakistan. The second meaning of this phrase is an assertion to Israel that its security is tied not only to the United States but also to international guarantees including France. President d'Estaing brought up this point after warning Israel about its recklessness and lack of respect for international guarantees. Mutual security in the Middle East will eventually rest upon a regional nuclear balance, which is contrary to the theory of "security through superiority," which Israel and the United States adhere to.

This new [French] theory is being aired for the first time and will constitute a new factor in the life of the Middle East in the future. It removes absolute control over the region from the hands of the United States and the Soviet Union, and turns France into one of the powers responsible for guaranteeing any future Arab-Israeli security agreement or peace. The Soviet Union would perhaps be more affected by this new factor than the United States. This is yet another reason for the Kremlin to oppose and view with great suspicion the French initiative aimed at resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The second new point made by President d'Estaing is that withdrawal from the lands occupied in 1967 is not a matter for negotiation between Arabs and Israelis [and must precede negotiations]. The American position is that there should be negotiations on the withdrawal and its extent, which means that withdrawal would come as a result of negotiations and not vice versa.

The third new point is France's adoption for the first time of the idea of establishing a completely independent Palestinian nation. D'Estaing used the phrase "the Palestinian people should organize themselves" following Israel's withdrawal from occupied lands, starting with the West Bank and the Gaza strip. This new French position is based on the following scenario: Israel withdraws from the occupied lands, and the Palestinians organize their affairs and form a state. Therefore, the Palestinian issue is an Arab and not an Israeli issue, because the Palestinian nation will be established on "truly Arab" land. President d'Estaing considers that the right of the Palestinians to organize themselves must be absolute and "recognized without restrictions, except the recognized borders of neighboring countries," because they have "the right to self-determination as do all other peoples of the world."

The high level source in the French foreign ministry said in explaining President d'Estaing's statement, that the French government has definitively approved the principle of an independent Palestinian state, and that the president's remarks point in that direction.

It is worth mentioning that the French foreign minister, Jean Francois-Poncet, announced in Washington 2 days prior to the first Venice summit that an independent Palestinian state is one of the proposed solutions, but not the only one. Nevertheless, President d'Estaing tried to include a reference to this issue in the final "Venice declaration." Italy agreed, but Britain and West Germany objected. So, this effort failed. The Italians subsequently announced their "total agreement on all subjects with the American government." This was during President Carter's visit to Rome on 19 June, when he said: "The Camp David agreements are the only effective framework for solving the Middle East crisis." For this reason, France decided to clarify its position in a final and definitive manner.

The fourth point is that the French president did not use the phrase "the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people" in referring to the PLO. The French foreign ministry source did not explain why. However, the emphasis on the Palestinian's right to complete self-determination and to establish an independent state; the statement that creation of a Palestinian state is an Arab and not an Israeli issue; and the fact that the PLO is a full member of the Arab League and is recognized in the Arab world as the sole representative of the Palestinians, make it logical that France would recognize the PLO as their sole representative.

The reasons for Abu 'Ammar's [Yasir 'Arafat] not going to Paris, in spite of rumors of a visit, continues to be a source of speculation. Is it France's nonrecognition of the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people which has prevented a visit?

Definite facts which have not yet been published indicate that the French government contacted the PLO at the end of the summer of 1979 and extended an invitation for Abu 'Ammar to make an official visit. Abu 'Ammar sent a special representative to Paris to arrange for the trip, and a decision was made for the visit to take place on 4 November 1979. Several meetings followed at the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs between three members of the Palestinian Resistance and Mr (Robin), the director of political affairs at the foreign ministry. The French asked that a communique be issued at the end of the visit containing references to a number of issues. The Palestinian Resistance preferred not to get involved in these issues which had no relation to mutual recognition between the PLO and Israel. The Resistance then insisted on not issuing a communique following the visit, so that neither side would embarrass the other.

The negotiations stumbled, and the French government sent (Robin) to meet with Abu 'Ammar secretly in Beirut with the intention of solving the problem regarding this communique. Robin met with the Palestinian leader at the Resistance headquarters and discussed the matter with him, but returned to Paris without reaching any conclusions. The Resistance took the position that the proposed communique contained points they would prefer to omit. When the French insisted on their position, the PLO leadership proposed a substitute communique containing excessively revolutionary passages. The French then refused to accept these passages, describing them as obstructive. Thereupon, the Resistance asked that the visit be postponed indefinitely without such postponement affecting PLO-French good relations. The French consented, and the two sides parted on friendly terms and agreed to maintain contacts.

Following this, Jacques Chirac, former prime minister and leader of the Gaullist party, suggested to the Resistance the idea that the Paris mayoral council extend an invitation to Abu 'Ammar. The latter declined saying that his first visit to France should be at the invitation of the French government, during which he would meet with President d'Estaing at the Elysees Palace. He likewise declined when the leader of the French Communist party, Georges Marchais, extended a similar invitation.

The Resistance justified its rejection of these invitations because of what happened in the summer of 1979 with regard to the meeting of Abu 'Ammar and the Austrian Chancellor, Dr Bruno Kreisky. At that time Abu 'Ammar was on an official visit to Czechoslovakia, and the Austrians contacted him and told him of Kreisky's desire for a meeting. The Vienna government had previously expressed a desire to meet with Abu 'Ammar, and decided to take advantage of his presence in Prague to arrange a meeting with him there, so as to avoid arousing public feelings by inviting him to Vienna. However, Abu 'Ammar responded that he would only meet Kreisky in Vienna or at the Sabra camp in Beirut. Negotiations continued, and it was decided to officially invite Abu 'Ammar to Austria. Thus took place the Vienna visit, and the meeting with Kreisky and former West German Chancellor Willy Brandt.

All this indicates that something affecting the Middle East is developing in Paris on the basis of supporting the Palestinian position and Arab demands and pursuing a surprise initiative with regard to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Therefore, it is not surprising to hear d'Estaing say at his press conference: "I could say more about the [new] proposals, but I leave that to our diplomats."

What are the exciting proposals that the French president has yet to announce?

Would there be anything more exciting than peace through regional nuclear balance?

GUERRILLAS PUSH WAR AGAINST RUSSIANS

Reporters View Battle

Milan PANORAMA in Italian 18 Aug 80 pp 46-49

[Eyewitness reports on the war in Afghanistan and four interviews by Herve Valette and Lucien Zanella: "The Broken Army"]

> [Text] Moscow's tanks do not dare to venture into the mountains. On the plains, Islamic guerilla warfare gives the Soviets no truce. Here are witness reports, collected at various points at the front, of the bloody struggle between the turbaned Muslims and Brezhnev's cohorts.

Every now and then threads rip in the tight net that shrouds the war in Afghanistan, barred to witnesses, and some word on what is happening there leaks out. But the obstacles against obtaining information are innumerable. To gather the facts in Afghanistan is not easy--from the Soviets and the government virtually impossible. But recently, two Swiss journalists, Herve Valette and Lucien Zanella, of the NOUVELLISTE ET FEUILLE D'AVIS DU VALAIS, a Sion daily, brought an arduous exploit to a successful conclusion. With a few tricks and some personal risk, the two went into Afghanistan twice, the first time to join the guerrillas, the second, a few days later, to meet with Afghan communists. Here, published exclusively in Italy, is their account.

"Do you want to watch a fight between the guerrillas and the Soviets? It's not hard." So we were assured by Ahmad Sayed Gaelan, chief of the biggest formation (he says) of Mujahedeen, the Islamic National Front, numbering 90,000 armed men deployed mainly in Kabul, Wardak, Kandahar, Moquor and Herat. "I warn you, however," he added, "that you must do a lot of walking." Gaelan's house stands on Warsak Road in Peshawar, Pakistan, just beyond the Afghan frontier. Like the houses occupied by the chiefs of the other five or six guerrilla movements, who maintain their headquarters in this extraordinary capital of the resistance, his home is surrounded by a walled enclosure and guarded by armed men.

We are entrusted to the man responsible for the Front's military operations, Hassan Sayed Gaelan, nephew of the chief (in the other guerrilla groups, too, the military command seems to be largely a family monopoly), who briefs us. It will be a 4-day journey, the first day by car, the other three on foot, at 109° F [43° C] in the shade and with forced marches of 8 hours each across rocky mountains. We are given a "paklum," the national Afghan dress, a brown tunic and very wide trousers. We must always wear the turban, which descends into a shawl to cover the face. We will be accompanied by 10 armed men, who have been ordered to participate in no battles but only ensure our safety. And we must do everything possible to pass ourselves off as one of them.

For one day we travel jammed together aboard a small Toyota truck to the village of Myramshah, the last before the frontier, and spend the night in the home of a family of Mujahedeen. The next morning we cross the frontier (nothing more than a chain across the road) on foot, almost without realizing it. No one inspects our documents, we do not even have to lift our shawls; we only get an indifferent glance from the two guards, likewise in paklum, who ask no questions about our submachine guns, highly efficient Soviet Kalashnikovs, and ancient British Enfields.

On the Afghan side, there is no border control. It will take a 2 day hike to arrive at our [first] destination, the base camp at Taddi; from there, another day to reach the Khwost plain, where we have been promised a battle. The plain is an immense shell over 100 kilometers in circumference, surrounded on all sides by rock-strewn mountains, 5,000-6,500 feet [1,500-2,000 meters] high. In the middle of the plain stands Lalegai Base, one of the Soviets' biggest in Afghanistan. At least 20,000 Soviet and Afghan troops occupy the base, the surrounding villages and the nearby town of Zadran.

They are isolated on their plain, although not actually besieged. All means of overland communications are controlled by the Mujahedeen, nevertheless the Soviets and Afghans, undisturbed, receive their supplies from the sky via an airport where their Antonov planes and helicopters land. The law of this guerrilla warfare provides that the Soviets control the plains and air routes, the Mujahedeen the mountains and practically all roads. One side cannot appropriate the other's territory because the Russian tanks cannot drive up the mountains nor can their cannon flush out the rebels hiding among the rocks, while the Mujahedeen lack the strength to take the plain and have no ammunition to knock out the tanks or bring down the armored Mi24 helicopter "flying wagons."

"We're prepared to fight for years until we decided to leave," explains our guide, Mirwais, a 25-year-old engineer and Kabul graduate, who speaks a little English he learned from books. "The Russians can never catch up with us. Outside their tanks, they're no good on this terrain. But we can march for 3 days and nights without food or drink."

At sundown of our second day's trek, we arrive at the base camp. We detect nothing until the very last moment. From a distance the camp looks like any clump of trees. Instead, under the trees and bushes we find a swarm of at least 200 men, with a few tents and mattresses set up under the branches, now and then a bonfire. Here supplies arrive from Myramshah--mainly fresh foods because the mountains have nothing to offer--shared by some 20 small camps situated within a range of a few hundred yards to several kilometers.

We are received in the tent of the chief, Maharam, who offers us refreshments--water, tea brewed from local herbs and a drink made of curdled milk, called lassi. "It'll be tomorrow afternoon at 5," Maharam informs us, explaining his overall plan of action. The guerrillas will try to approach Lalegai Base as close as possible to cut the only conduit that furnishes the Soviet and Afghan troops with water, tapped from several sources on the mountain. Should their exploit succeed, it will be a serious blow to the invaders. But the Mujahedeen have no doubts about the outcome of the battle.

The next day, another 8 hours' hike to cross the mountain ridge and descend on the other side. There below is Lalegai Base, about 2 kilometers away as the crow flies. We count 100 tanks and about 30 helicopters. From above, we watch the movements of men and motor vehicles.

The battle begins punctually at 5. We see about 30 Mujahedeen swoop down the mountainside, firing their light arms. They have neither artillery nor missiles. We are told that other units are also descending from various points. The entire valley comes alive with resounding shots and cries. The base replies with cannon, rockets and heavy machine guns. Puffs of smoke burst over the mountain slopes--random shots fired against an enemy who keeps invisible beyond a very short distance.

We observe some tanks attempting to climb up toward us. They can only advance along the dry beds of a few streams up to a certain point. This is a mortal trap. Sooner or later some tank will be stuck between rocks, unable to move forward or backwards. Thus it becomes an easy prey of the Mujahedeen, who assault it with handmade bombs or Molotov cocktails, the only antitank ammunition they possess, some losing their lives inthe fray. This is how a T-54 and an armored troop transport, both of the Afghan regulars, end up. Three guerrillas sacrifice their lives for those two quarries, while the dead on the other side number 10. The next day we return to view the corpses and the tanks, still smoking.

The battle continues until far into the night, during which three helicopters spray the mountain with machine gun fire and drop bombs. The guerrillas have nothing to repel these airborne monsters. Their shots and machine gun fire rebound off the thickly armor-plated fuselages. "If we only had some rockets!" Mirawais sighs, pointing at a helicopter flying undisturbed a few hundred feet overhead.

In the small hours of the night we return to the base camp as the firing dies away. Later three radiant Mujahedeen arrive at Maharam's tent, carrying a pipe about 20 inches long: a segment of the water conduit they've blown up. This bit of pipe has cost the lives of 5 Mujahedeen (and 10 of the enemy), all the same it signals a victory for the guerrillas. Under tomorrow's implacable sun, the lack of water will compound the invaders' woes.

Afghan Soldier Defects

Milan PANORAMA in Italian 18 Aug 80 pp 48, 49

[Text] The phenomenon that worries the Soviet military strategists more than any other is the fact that over a period of 8 months, the regular Afghan army has been decimated by desertions. The revolt of the 14th Afghan Motorized Division stationed at Gazni and only recently subdued by the Soviets with heavy losses on both sides, is only the latest in a long series of similar episodes. By Western calculations, of the 80,000 effectives in service at the time of the invasion, perhaps 50,000 have deserted. Eventually the Soviets could find themselves confronting the Islamic rebels alone, without even the pro forma support of a local army.

The following is the account of a deserter, Mohammed Zahed, a 35-year-old artillery captain.

Question: Who is now commanding the Afghan Government army?

Answer: General Mohammed Raffi. I know him well because we're the same age and he's been my companion-in-arms for many years. He commanded the army's armored troops and he's a first-rate specialist in tanks. He comes from Parman, 25 kilometers from Kabul. When Mohammed Daud pulled off his coup d'etat against King Zahir Shah in 1974, Raffi, then commanding an armored battalion, helped him considerably.

Question: Why did you decide to desert?

Answer: Because both the factions of the Khalq ("people") Communist Party, the first to hold power, and the Parcham ("banner"), now in power, have no other objective than to sell the country to the Russians.

Question: How and when did you desert?

Answer: On 8 May at 1600 hours I received an order from my superiors to wipe out the Mujahedeen infesting the area south of Kabul. The fighting had already begun, so I had to make a quick decision. As commander of the artillery, I knew I'd have to make carnage of my Islam brothers. So with the help of four officer friends, I killed all our superior officers, and then we raised the Afghan national flag over the camp and gave ourselves up to the Mujahedeen, with all our arms.

Question: Yet, before deserting, you led actions against the partisans.

Answer: Yes, but in a somewhat special way. Through clandestine connections I had established with the guerrillas, I warned them in advance of every attack. When we had to fire on them, I gave the order to aim our cannon above their positions so that no one would be hit. By fraudulent means, I even arranged for parachute drops of weapons and supplies to the guerrillas.

Question: Do you mean that the Afghan regulars only pretend to fight the guerrillas?

Answer: Many of them are behaving as I did. We still maintain excellent communications with the men who haven't yet been able to desert and join the Mujahedeen.

Question: What are the Soviets doing to prevent the desertions?

Answer: They're afraid of a general revolt, so they've scattered the Afghan regulars around the whole territory to isolate them from the population. At night they lock them up in their barracks. They shoot many of those who refuse to obey their orders or try to escape.

Question: How do they go about calling up new recruits?

Answer: Often by force or on pain of death. They compel boys of 15 to fight for them.

Interview with Former Ambassador

Milan PANORAMA in Italian 18 Aug 80 p 49

[Interview with Touryalli Osman, former ambassador to Italy]

[Text] For 3 years during Daud's regime, Touryalli Osman served as Afghan ambassador in Rome. Now he has been in Peshawar for several days, having been obliged to flee Kabul precipitously to save himself and his family from arrest. Osman, in fact, had organized a resistance group in the capital. His story is the first detailed report on the activities of the clandestine movement in Kabul.

Question: What was your group doing? Who formed it?

Answer: It was a group of about 30 intellectuals, all long-time friends (you can't risk including informers; it's too dangerous). In all, the resistance movements, mostly of limited dimensions, number about 20. Our aim was to write and distribute typewritten manifestoes in preparation for the people's uprising.

Question: What was the content of your messages?

Answer: For a long time we urged the people to keep calm, to avoid rushing into isolated, hopeless acts. We said that the revolt was being organized in two separate phases: first the preparation, second the action. Now the first phase is concluded and the second is just beginning.

Question: How did you distribute your manifestoes?

Answer: That was a very tough job. Paper is scarce, and to find an old typewriter, we had to deal with eight different persons and wait over a month. The manifestoes were then distributed, mostly by students.

Question: To whom?

Answer: To the few remaining intellectuals, but also to the common people and even to Soviet occupation troops. I'm sure it was this intense clandestine propaganda that incited a whole garrison of 240 Soviet soldiers from Tajikistan to mutiny.

Question: What happened to them?

Answer: As far as I know, they were all shot. Another 16 Soviet soldiers of Muslim origin deserted to fight with the Mujahedeen. First we got men from the areas bordering on Afghanistan, men who spoke our language and looked like us. Now they're all Ukranians, tall, blond, and blue-eyed.

Karmal Brainwashed

Milan PANORAMA in Italian 18 Aug 80 pp 50, 51

[Interview with Aziz Afghan, member of royal family, exiled in Europe many years]

[Text] Member of the royal family, physician, exiled in Europe for many years, Aziz Afghan is one of the few outstanding intellectuals of the Afghan resistance movement. In this interview he tells about the rapport between the Babrak Karmal, president of the Afghan Republic, and the Soviets.

Question: Who is the real head of Afghanistan today?

Answer: It's number four of the Soviet Embassy in Kabul, Vassili Safrantchuk. Today only Soviets are heads of the administration and the party.

Question: People say that with their invasion, the Soviets have succeeded where all Afghan governments failed: in uniting the different ethnic groups in the country. Is that true?

Answer: Afghanistan is populated by a multitude of different peoples. With their invasion of our country, the Soviets have indeed incited the various clans to unite.

Question: Yet the resistance movement is still split into six groups.

Answer: Recently five of them banded together around a united resistance committee. Only Gulbuddin Ekhmatiar, chief of the Afghan Islamic Party--the strongest--chose to stay out. The others--Mojaddedi's National Liberation Front, Gaelan's Islamic Revolutionary Front, the Islamic Revolution of Mohamadi, Rabani's Islamic Group, and Golkan's tribe--are now beginning to cooperate. In any event, these chiefs and clans existed before the communists came. It isn't altogether true to say that there's hostility among them; they've divided up different regions geographically and ethnically.

Question: What nations are actively supporting the Afghan resistance?

Answer: Pakistan, Iran, the other Muslim countries or the Western nations do not want to get involved in the war. They're all afraid of the Russians. Only from Egypt and Iraq do we get anything at all, but very little.

Question: How do you explain the incredible courgage of the guerrillas, who hurl themselves against Soviet tanks with only their bare hands or homemade bombs, knowing they'll be killed?

Answer: Faith in God. For us Muslims, to kill a Soviet--an atheist--is to earn a place in paradise. To be killed by a Soviet is to become a martyr, therefore also to earn a place in paradise. The Afghans identify paradise with their own country, their own people. This is the real secret of the Mujahedeens' heroism.

Question: Who is Babrak Karmal actually?

Answer: My family knows him well. Under the reign of Zahir Shah, Karmal was a deputy in the National Assembly in Kabul. He opposed the monarchy and espoused very nationalistic ideas. Karmal was then an excellent politician, gifted with an exceptional talent for public speaking. Knowing Babrak Karmal, we cannot accept the falsehood that he is willingly betraying his country or that he is doing it in full command of his mental faculties.

Question: Are you implying that the president's mental condition is not normal?

Answer: We have followed Karmal's speeches on television. His face is no longer the same, his speech is broken, hesitant, poorly articulated; his eyes are empty, he's shaken by strange tics. Therefore I think I can say with assurance that the Soviets have brainwashed him. He's under the influence of some drug. Certainly he's living in a sort of ivory tower, converted into a prison. He doesn't know that his people are being exterminated by his own regime. He doesn't know that the Soviets are massacring students in Kabul and burning villages with napalm. Karmal is being kept in total isolation. What's more, he has attempted suicide--not only once, as they've been saying, but three times.

Jalalabad Communist Leader's Views

Milan PANORAMA in Italian 18 Aug 80 pp 49-51

> [Text] The war will end with a triumph for the communists. That is the belief of Nassir Charki, leader of the Jalalabad Communist Party. "It will be a political, not a military, victory. Our people are in agreement with the Soviets."

It is night at the Spinghar (White Mountains) Hotel in Jalalabad. Officially we are two students of archaeology (Western journalists don't get visas), and we can remain in Afghanistan for 4 days. A man about 40 years old approaches us. "Foreigners?" he asks in French. "Yes," we reply. "Communists?" he wants to know. "Yes, we're Swiss communists." A shadow of mistrust disappears from our interlocutor's face and gives way to a broad grin.

Thus began our friendship with Nassir Charki, secretary of the Afghan Communist Party for Jalalabad Province and the highest political authority in the district. We told him we were reporters for communist publications. That was the opening he was waiting for to expound his authentic view of the Afghan war.

"The Soviets came to our assistance because the Western imperialistic powers were laying hands on Afghanistan," he explained. This is the official pretext frequently repeated by communist sources. But Nassir Charki's authentic view became more interesting and original as, little by little, he got down to particulars. "The Soviet contingent consists of no more than 10,000-12,000 men," he informed us. That's one-tenth the number known in the West. "And they'll pull out when all our problems are solved." Jalalabad's party chief predicted that the Soviets will take their leave sooner than anyone expects--"The end of this year or in the first months of next year," he swore. That is, within 6 or 7 months at the most, the war will be over, ending in a communist victory, of course. It won't be a military victory but a political one."

A wierd type, this Nassir Charki. Convinced that practically the whole population is on his side, nevertheless he travels around with an escort of seven bodyguards armed with Kalashnikovs, and he is armed himself. He said he'd been a Communist for 14 years, but confessed that he hadn't yet arrived at a satisfactory level of ideological preparation. For example, he didn't yet understand all the implications of historical materialism.

For now, his convictions are few but ironclad. Babrak Karmal is a genius. And if he allows himself to be photographed occasionally with some mullah, he only does it to give a little weight to that sector of the population which is still ignorant and religious. "Here, too, to abolish religion it will take at least 20 or 30 years," he says. In his view, there is no doubt: it's religion that keeps the people backward. "What's all this foolishness about Ramadan? What sense does it make to fast from morning to night for 1 month? It debilitates the body and the mind, it drains the will to work, certainly it doesn't help a people to develop." In that month of Ramadan, he ate and drank without a trace of guilt.

Tomorrow this Parcham boss of Jalalabad will have an official car waiting for us in front of the hotel, a white Volga. Two soldier escorts will show us the town, and we'll see that all is calm. The bazaar is open and teeming with people, as usual. We see Soviet soldiers buying wares. Soviet and Afghan tanks circulate through the streets, and every 5 minutes a patrol of three helicopters streak across the sky. At strategic points, voices blare out political slogans over loudspeakers. This must be normal in Jalalabad since no one seems to pay any attention to the tanks, the helicopters or the slogans.

Four kilometers away is the city's air base, one of the most important in the country. From afar we behold some 60 helicopters and 20 Antonov transport planes. Seemingly unperturbed, Nassir Charki wants to know something about communism in the outside world. He's heard about Georges Marchais, PCF secretary, but he doesn't even know the name of Enrico Berlinguer. "Is he a friend of the Russians or the Chinese?" he asks somewhat anxiously, and to quell his fears, we give him the answer he wants to hear.

"When it's all over I want to come to Europe to meet Berlinguer and Marchais in person," he says. "Certainly they, too, are honorable men, beloved by their people, like our Karmal."

AIRLINE EMPLOYEES ARRESTED IN PLOT AGAINST KARMAL

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 31 Jul 80 pp 1,6

[Article: "Employees of Ariana Airlines Arrested for Plot Against Karmal; Plan to Destroy Plane Taking Babrak to Moscow Masterminded by Gulabzoi, Minister of Interior; Mujahidin Free Nandraj and Ali Nagar Districts of Laghman Province"]

[Text] Kabul, 30 July (APP/PPI)--The Mujahidin have badly defeated the Russian army in various places in Afghanistan. Many Russians were killed in a day-long battle in (Arshak) District of Takhar province. Seven tanks were also destroyed. The Mujahidin attacked a Russian company in (Shajo) district Zabol [province] and, in an all-day battle, killed many Russian soldiers and destroyed seven trucks and a jeep carrying wireless equipment. They also burned 24,500 kg of wheat.

The Mujahidin attacked a Russian company which was leaving (Maroof) in Kandahar province for the state's capital and fought it for five days. One hundred Russian soldiers were killed and 15 tanks were destroyed in this battle. In two other battles fought in Kandahar province, 140 Russian soldiers and 17 Russian agents were killed, and three Russians were captured.

According to another report, the Mujahidin have liberated (Ali Nagar) and (Nandraj) districts of Laghman province. The Mujahidin killed 60 Russians and wounded another 60 in that battle. One armored truck and two regular army trucks were also destroyed. This is the first time that a Bulgarian commander is reported to have taken part in a battle in Lugman province.

According to another report the Mujahidin killed 18 communists in (Mausi) Khel in Paktia. In a fierce battle in Kandahar, 300 Russian soldiers were killed and the Mujahidin seized a large amount of ammunition.

The 12 employees of Ariana Airlines convicted of mutiny were connected with the Khalq Party. They were accused of kidnapping the president of Ariana Airlines who is a staunch supporter of Babrak Karmal. According to some sources, the minister of interior, Sayed Gulabzoi, had masterminded this plot to overthrow the Karmal government. The plan was to destroy the plane carrying Babrak Karmal to Moscow. Two of the 12 employees were first sentenced to death, but this sentence was later changed to life imprisonment. The remaining ten were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

According to some experts, Russia needs 250,000 more soldiers if it is to control Afghanistan. At present, it has a total of 120,000 soldiers, an increase of 30,000. In the cantonments of (Khairkhana) and (Bala Hissar), there is increased military activity due to the increase in the number of soldiers. Last month, a squadron of Mig-21 fighter planes and two squadrons of helicopters were seen here. Now, there are two squadrons of Mig planes and the airport is crowded with helicopters.

The Russians and the Mujahidin are both strengthening their positions in Kabul.

BRIEFS

ISLAMIC COUNCIL FORMED--Kabul, 29 July (PPI)--The common people of Afghanistan have set up a 68-member Islamic council. Hasan Gaylani, a graduate of Kabul University and commander of the Mujahidin in (Paktia?), has been appointed president of this council. Mr Hasan Gaylani said that the purpose of this non-political body is to find ways to make the Jihad more effective and foster unity among Afghans. Babrak Zai, formerly a high court judge in Afghanistan, has been elected vice-president. Mohammad Hakim will be secretary and spokesman. Mr Gaylani has appealed to everyone who loves Afghanistan to help the council. He said that the Afghan people are fighting for their lives. Unarmed people, innocent children, and women are falling prey to the Russian atrocities. He further said that this council will establish branches all over the country, and that a central government with a president, a prime minister and several ministers will be announced in the near future. IRAQ DENOUNCED FOR HARBORING ANTI-KHOMEYNI RADIO STATIONS

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 31 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] A recent article in the Financial TIMES dealt with the Persian-Language broadcasts that are now being beamed daily into Iran from abroad. In addition to the old established American, British and Russian radio stations there are now others, based most probably in Basrah in Iraq and in Cairo, which pour daily abuse on the Islamic Republic of Iran and do their utmost to spread discontent, stir up opposition to the new regime and encourage dissidents.

Of these stations, the most prominent are "Radio Iran", which disseminates the messages and propaganda of Shapour Bakhtiar, and the "Free Voice of Iran" which acts for Gholam Ali Oveisi, the notorious brutal general of the former shah. Both of these stations are situated in Iraq, and the expenses for their operations are commonly assumed to be paid for out of the budget of the CIA.

The existence of these stations is a natural outcome of the deeprooted oppositions of the present Iraqi regime towards its Islamic Republican neighbor.

An interesting talk on "the background to the Iraq-Iran crisis" by Muhammad Iqbal a member of the Moslem Institute in London throws new light on the reasons for this implacable hostility. Iqbal traces the rise of the Middle Eastern states that emerged from the collapse of the Ottoman Empire after World War I, the virtual take-over of Iraq by Britain under its mandate from the League of Nations, and the rise of the Ba'th Socialist Party. Iqbal then describes how emerging Arab nationalism in Iraq looked first to Communism for ideas and support, and how the Ba'athist regime turned back again to the capitalist West when clerical opposition to Communism made it realize that the main obstacle not only to the drift towards the left but to Iraqi Arab nationalism itself was the Moslem clergy and people.

In Iran, the Pahlavi dictatorship has propagated Iranian nationalism and racism, to the detriment of Islam, and though the opposing nationalisms of the two neighboring countries inevitably led to conflict, it was eventually realized by both sides that the real enemy of the two regimes was Islam. As soon as it was seen that they had too much in common to waste their energies in pointless hostilities, their long-standing feud was swiftly patched up.

But now that the Islamic Republic has been established, and has vowed to export its ideology, the Ba'thist regime once again sees Iran as the major threat to its existence. The Republic's success represents a constant encouragement to its own Moslems, particularly the Shi'ite population, and a grave threat to its own power. Hence the new collaborations of the Ba'thists with the formerly despised capitalists in fomenting a counter-revolution in Iran; hence the murder of the Iraqi Shi'ite Leader Muhammad Baqer al-Sadr, the expulsion of tens of thousands of Moslems to Iran, and the constant stream of subversive propaganda, directed at the Islamic Republic.

CONCEPTS FOR KHOMEYNI SOCIAL POLICY OUTLINED

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 1 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] The current issue of the weekly magazine SOROUSH contains a commentary under the title of 'Social Stratification and its Effect on the Government.' Referring to social stratification in Iranian society and the moral, social and ideological characteristics of the different strata, the article says, "Generally speaking, Iranian society consists of two different strata the first, including the majority of society, is desirous of independence, freedom and the Islamic Republic of Iran.

It comprises all classes, including workers, farmers, students, intellectuals, bazaar merchants, guild men, the clergy, teachers, etc.

This group is quite prepared to tolerate poverty, shortages, economic and political pressure, even famine. They have risen up for Islam, not for materialism, and are ready to struggle against the pressures imposed by foreign powers, wielding the weapon of faith in Islam. For those who follow the line of Imam Khomeini, the honesty of the imam is an unquestionable principle.

The second including stratum comprises the small minority that is after economic prosperity. From the very beginning of the victory of the revolution, this group has endeavored to achieve this aim. Being unable to bear a prolonged struggle, they are ready to remain economically dependent so as to ensure their economic welfare. They never think of the day when the gap between the developed countries and an independent Iran will be filled and political and economic relations are balanced and just. This class acknowledges the backwardness of Iran and thinks that the only way to escape it is to resort to Western styles.

However, the arming of the revolutionary system against the old regime's institutions will further help the establishment of the Islamic Republic. The members of a responsible government should obviously be selected from among the first stratum, that is, from those who are faithful to the "ideal of" independence, freedom, and an Islamic Republic! The wrong policies of the provisional government (of Mehdi Bazargan) stemmed from the fact that some of its members thought first of economic prosperity. Any coalition of people from these two strata would be an obstacle to the progress and the export of the revolution. Therefore, the new cabinet should consist of united, sympathetic ministers.

The article then refers to the more sensitive and influential posts of the government and analytically describes their main duties and responsibilities as follows:

1) The Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The foreign policy of Iran should be based on the spirit of the Islamic Revolution and the guidelines of the imam. The imam has emphatically repeated that "we will export our revolution to the world," that we should support world liberation movements and all the oppressed peoples. The main duty of the Foreign Ministry is to introduce the Islamic Revolution of Iran to the world.

Iranian embassies abroad should become centers for the propagation of Islamic culture and the Islamic perception of reality. Psychological war is one of the most destructive weapons of the enemy, who is therefore energetically seeking to impose this war by forming and coordinating a front including SAVAK agents, fugitive army officers, counter-revolutionaries, proponents of economic prosperity, and disatisfied groups and organizations.

2) The Ministry of National Guidance. This ministry has the duty of resisting the propaganda of the enemy inside the country. Preparing the people to encounter a prolonged fight is another duty of the ministry. The psychological war imposed by the enemy with the help of SAVAK mercenaries and pro-essional anti-revolutionaries inside the country, can be easily nullified by the efforts of the National Guidance Ministry and the mass media.

3) The Ministry of the Interior: This can be the main designer of the internal policy of the country. The future fate of the revolution depends on the judicious appointment of the Interior Minister, governors-general, governors and police heads all of whom have wide authority. Selecting these people from among the second stratum (the proponents of economic prosperity) will endanger the future of the revolution.

4) The Ministry of Culture and Higher Education: one of the duties of this ministry is to train individuals who can carry the Islamic Revolution forward to its final stage. The 'educational revolution' launched against the western educational and cultural system dominating our society will achieve its final results with the help of this ministry.

5) The Ministries of Agriculture, Industries and Mines and Labor. The stronger the officials of these ministries are in leadership, the closer will we be to the economic independence of Iran.

COUNTRY'S FOREIGN INVESTMENTS DIVERSIFIED

Zurich NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG in German 17 Sep 80

[Article by Ug: "Diversification of Kuwait's Investments--Insufficient Absorbing Capacity of Domestic Economy"]
